modern Carmarthenshire. Rhys, son of Arthvael, one of the princes who succeeded Morgan in the sovereignty of Morganwg (according to an ancient manuscript formerly in the possession of Mr. Thomas Truman, of Pantllwydd, near Cowbridge, a transcript of which is inserted in the Appendix to Williams' History of Monmouthshire), built many castles and ships, and obliged every one that had land in the Vale of Glamorgan to sow corn on one half of it, and every one that had land on the mountains, to sow corn on a quarter of the same; while all the land that neither grew corn nor was grazed by cattle was to be forfeited to the king, unless it was wood or forest: this law caused Glamorgan to become distinguished above all districts for its fruitfulness.

Notwithstanding the advantages arising from this circumstance, the territory became subject, with the rest of South Wales, to the authority of Rhodri Mawr, or Roderic the Great, Prince of Gwynedd, by the marriage of this sovereign with Angharad, the daughter and heiress of Gwgan, King of Caredigion, or Cardigan, to which territory was attached the supreme authority over the other principalities of South Wales. On the death of Roderic, it became for a time part of the kingdom of Caredigion, or South Wales, under the sway of his son Cadell, and subsequently of the son of Cadell, Hywel Dda, who united all the three great sovereignties of Wales under his own dominion. The reigns of none of the petty princes of Glamorgan, after this period, exhibit in the Welsh annals any feature of historical interest, until that of Morgan ab Owain, known also by the names of Morgan Hên, Morgan Mawr, and Morgan Mwynvawr, who lived about the middle of the tenth century. The country was at that time greatly infested by marauding parties of Saxons and Danes, who plundered the inhabitants, and demolished the churches and other religious edifices; and these enemies Morgan repeatedly vanquished. The other military operations of this chieftain were, for the most part, directed against the princes of the house of Dynevor, who had invaded the district of Ewyas, in the Vale of Usk, and that of Ystrad Yw: this affair, according to the Welsh Chronicle, was referred to Edgar, the Saxon monarch of England, who decided in favour of the Prince of Glamorgan, and forbade the further progress of the invaders. Eineon, son of Owain, Prince of South Wales, or Dynevor, taking advantage of the distractions which then prevailed throughout Wales, soon after invaded Gower, which, under pretence of opposing the Irish and Danes, he twice devastated. It was during the reign of Morgan Hên that a question arose, whether the tribute of the petty princes of South Wales should be paid to the king of North Wales, or to the king of England, as lord paramount, which was finally determined, in 962, by the appearance of Edgar, with an armed force, at Caerlleon, who bound the princes to the payment of it to the English crown. In 987, the Danes landed on the coast of this county, in which they committed great ravages, burning the churches of Llanilltyd and Llandaf, with other religious edifices. As Morgan Hên advanced in years, he resigned the government to his sons, of whom Owain and Ithel are expressly mentioned in the Welsh annals, as reguli of the country during the lifetime of their father. Ithel, surnamed Ddô, or "the Black," from the colour of his hair, lived occasionally at Ystrad Owain, and had a summer residence at a place called Ton Ithel Ddû, a few miles to the north of Bridgend: he survived Owain, and, about the year 990, his territories were attacked and ravaged without mercy by Edwin, son of Eineon, who, in alliance with Meredydd, sovereign of all Wales, and aided by parties of Saxons and Danes, entered them from Carmarthenshire through Gower; but Hywel, the younger brother of Ithel, exasperated to heroic exertion by the depredations which these invaders every where committed, suddenly raised the country in their rear, and, having assembled an immense multitude, armed with the first weapons they could obtain, fell upon them on their return, at a place called Cors Eineon, in the parish of Llangyvelach, routed their forces with great slaughter, and recovered the plunder which they were carrying away. Ithel died in 994, and was succeeded in the government of Glamorgan by his son Gwrgan, who is described as an enlightened and peaceable prince, and who gave to his subjects a large common in the northern part of the county, for the depasturing of cattle and sheep, and the cultivation of grain, which has ever since been called Hirwaun Wrgan, or "Gwrgan's Long Meadow:" he died in 1030, prior to which, according to Caradoc of Llan-carvan, he had associated with him in the government his uncle Hywel, the third son of Morgan Mawr, to whom he left his entire dominion, in preference to his own son Iestyn, whose profligacy had rendered him universally abhorred. Iestyn, however, succeeded to the government at Hywel's death, in 1043; and having espoused Denis, daughter of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, Prince of Powys, he built a castle a few miles to the west of Cardiff, which he called, after her name, Denis Powys, and this designation is still preserved, under the modern name of Dinas-Powis, as that of one of the civil divisions of the shire. Iestyn's son Rhydderch usurped the sovereignty of South Wales, on the death of its prince Llewelyn; and his sons Rhydderch and Rhys also laid claim to it, a few years after the death of their father, and, raising a powerful army in Glamorgan, in support of their pretensions, they encountered Gruffydd, who had subjected all the rest of Wales to his sway, in a sanguinary but indecisive battle. Soon after this event, some of the partisans of Caradoc, son of Rhydderch ab Iestyn, passed from Gwent and Glamorgan into the present county of Carmarthen; and having there formed an alliance with some of Gruffydd's discontented subjects, attacked the possessions of his friends, and put some of them to death; but Gruffydd soon punished his rebellious vassals, by laying waste their estates in Dyved, Ystrad Tywi, and Gower. In 1056, Rhys, brother of Gruffydd, led an army into Glamorgan and Gwent, and committed great devastations; but the inhabitants, rising in their own defence, drove him towards the marches, and, having taken him prisoner, cut off his head, and sent it to the English monarch, Edward the Confessor, who was then at Gloucester. Shortly after, Caradoc, son of Rhydderch ab Iestyn, having raised a large army in Gwent and Glamorgan, prevailed on the Saxon chieftain, Harold, afterwards king of England, to join him with a powerful force, and their united army defeated Gruffydd in a great battle, in which that chieftain was slain. Caradoc, in calling the English to his assistance, had calculated on obtaining for himself the principality of South Wales;

but Harold, after the death of Gruffydd, banished him from the country, and gave the sovereignty to Meredydd ab Owain. Caradoc, however, in 1069, profiting by the important change which had taken place by the death of Harold, and the elevation of William of Normandy to the throne of England, engaged in his cause a considerable body of Norman soldiers, with whom he marched into South Wales, and defeated and slew Meredydd near the confines of this county; but dying the year following, in consequence of a wound received in battle, he was succeeded in his government of South Wales by his son Rhydderch, who was afterwards treacherously slain by a kinsman.

Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of Dynevor, in the year 1080, invaded the territories of Iestyn ab Gwrgan of Glamorgan, and sacked his castles of Dinas-Powis, Llanilltyd, and Dindryvan; but he had no sooner withdrawn his troops than Iestyn retaliated by ravaging Carmarthenshire and Brecknockshire, where he obtained valuable booty. Eineon ab Collwyn, one of the leaders of an unsuccessful rebellion against Rhys, fled for refuge to the court of Iestyn, who entered into a negotiation with him, according to which Eineon was to receive the hand of Iestyn's daughter, and the lordship of Meisgwn, now called Miskin, if he could succeed in engaging for the service of the latter some of the Norman knights with whom he had formerly served abroad under William of Normandy. Eineon departed for London, and easily prevailed on Robert Fitz-Hamon, a near relative of the Conqueror, to come to Glamorgan, with such other knights as he should choose to engage under his command: on the arrival of these auxiliaries, consisting, besides Fitz-Hamon himself, of eleven knights and three thousand men at arms, Iestyn took the field, and commenced active hostilities against Rhys, whom he defeated, with the loss of nearly all his troops, on Hirwaun Wrgan, the extensive common before-mentioned, at the foot of a high mountain about two miles north of the present village of Aberdare, in this county, near the border of Brecknockshire. The Welsh Chronicle, contrary to the opinion of Mr. Theophilus Jones and some other writers, states that Rhys fled from the field of battle to Glyn Rhonddû, a sequestered valley some miles to the south, where he was taken by Iestyn and beheaded, from which circumstance the spot is said to have been since called Penrhys: his son Goronwy fell in the slaughter, and Conan, son of Goronwy, escaping with a few troops, was drowned, in his flight towards Carmarthen, in the lake of Cremlyn, now an extensive marsh, situated between Briton Ferry and Swansea. Iestyn rewarded his Norman auxiliaries conformably to his engagements, paying them in gold, on a common three miles west of Cardiff, which has ever since been called "the Golden Mile;" and they marched towards the coast, with the view of embarking for England: but refusing to fulfil his promises to Eineon, the latter hastened in quest of the Norman commander, and, after stating the treacherous conduct of Iestyn, represented to him how easy it would be to obtain possession of the country for himself and his followers. Fitz-Hamon, with his knights, immediately retraced his steps, and was shortly joined by some of the native chieftains, who were exasperated at the tyrannical and unprincipled conduct of Iestyn, who was wholly unprepared to oppose so formidable a confederacy : he hastily collected what forces he could, and awaited the adverse troops on a common in the neighbourhood of Cardiff, where, after a short engagement, his army was totally defeated, and himself obliged to seek safety in flight. Thus was annihilated the British kingdom of Glamorgan ; and the overthrow of Iestyn having left Fitz-Hamon entire master of the country, that leader proceeded to apportion it among his followers and some of the principal Welsh chieftains, reserving for himself the towns of Cardiff, Kenfig, and Cowbridge, with the surrounding domains.

The lordship of Glamorgan, thus established by Fitz-Hamon, was a lordship marcher, or royal lordship, the possessors of which owed obedience only to the king of England, and exercised within its limits jura regalia, that is, the trial of all actions, both real and personal, with pleas of the crown, and authority to pardon for all offences except treason. Besides the body of the lordship, which formed a county of itself, containing eighteen castles and thirty-six knights' fees and a half, and a great number of freeholders, and in which the lord had his chancery and exchequer at the castle of Cardiff, there were eleven lordships, members of the same, in each of which jura regalia were exercised ; except that, in case of wrong judgment being given in any of the courts of the said members, it should be reversed by a writ of false judgment in the superior county court of Glamorgan, holden at the castle of Cardiff ; also that all matters of conscience, happening in debate in any of the said members, should be heard and determined in the chancery of Glamorgan, before the chancellor thereof. Fitz-Hamon, who was afterwards created Earl of Gloucester, and raised to the office of lord of the privy chamber to William II., after he had allotted their several portions to his knights, proceeded to abrogate the ancient laws and customs of the country, and to introduce in their stead the feudal system which had been already established in England. But the native landholders, many of whom still retained their estates, could ill brook the servitude by which the feudal tenures bound them to the lord, and embraced the first opportunity of emancipating themselves from so galling a yoke. In 1094, while the Norman settlers were invading Gower, and pushing their conquests on the west, the people united in great force, and, headed by Payne Turberville of Coyty, near Bridgend, one of Fitz-Hamon's retainers, who had married a native heiress, the granddaughter of Iestyn, took several of their castles, and put the garrisons to the sword. Turberville then led the insurgents to Cardiff, where he besieged Fitz-Hamon in his castle ; and the latter, being unprepared to resist so powerful a force, thought it prudent to enter into terms, by which he restored to the people their ancient rights and customs. The success of this insurrection encouraged the Welsh, a few years after, to attempt the expulsion of their invaders, who, being defeated by them in a pitched battle, were under the necessity of sending for reinforcements from England. Being joined by the Earl of Arundel and other Norman leaders, Fitz-Hamon and his knights, in their turn, assumed the offensive : the Welsh retreated into the interior, where the hilly nature of the country gave them the advantage over the heavy-armed troops of their enemies, upon whom they suddenly turned round, and defeated them with prodigious slaughter near Gellygaer, compelling the few that escaped to seek refuge in their castles. This desultory warfare, though it procured for the native population some immunities, which the Norman settlers for their own safety deemed it politic to concede, obtained for them few permanent advantages of any importance ; and the succours which Fitz-Hamon and his successors were able to procure from England, on every emergency, gave them at length the entire mastery of the country, and enabled them to reduce it to complete subjection. The district of Gower was wrested from the sons of Caradoc ab Iestyn, about the end of the eleventh century, by Henry Beaumont, Earl of Warwick, who established in it a colony of English settlers from Somersetshire, whose descendants yet remain there, distinguished by their language and manners from the more ancient native population. Fitz-Hamon was a firm supporter of Henry I., in opposition to the claims of that monarch's elder brother, Robert Duke of Normandy, who was committed to his custody at Cardiff, by Henry, after he had become his prisoner.

On the death of this nobleman, in 1107, he was succeeded in his estates and honours by Robert, the natural son of Henry I., by Nèst, daughter of Rhÿs ab Tewdwr, to whom that monarch gave in marriage Fitz-Hamon's daughter Mabel, or Mabli. After attaining possession of the lordship of Glamorgan, Robert attempted to enforce the feudal laws which his predecessor had failed to impose on the native landholders : this again roused the spirit of the Welsh ; and Ivor ab Cadivor, also called Ivor Bâch, or Ivor the Little, who was lord of Senghenydd, and resided at Morlais castle, on the confines of the present county, led the insurgents against the castle of Cardiff, which they took by storm, making prisoners of the Earl of Gloucester and his lady. Negotiations for their release were entered into with the English monarch ; and they were at last liberated by Ivor, after the king had guaranteed to the Welsh of Glamorgan, by oath, the unmolested enjoyment of their ancient usages. A few years subsequently, Gruffydd, son of Rhÿs ab Tewdwr, late Prince of South Wales, entered Gower with a large body of native troops ; but failing in an attack on the castle of Abertawe, or Swansea, he set fire to the suburbs of that place, ravaged the adjacent country, and returned into Carmarthenshire loaded with booty : in the following year he again entered Gower in like manner. A Welsh prince, named Cadell, towards the middle of the twelfth century, made repeated incursions from the castle of Carmarthen into the territories of the Norman settlers in the neighbourhood, more particularly into Gower, in which district, in 1150, his brothers Rhÿs and Meredydd took the castle of Aberllychwr. Soon after, Madoc ab Meredydd, Prince of Powys, led a powerful force into Glamorganshire, where he devastated the lands of Morgan ab Caradoc ab Iestyn, and took and destroyed his castle of Aberavon : Morgan and his followers took sanctuary in the churches and monasteries, and placed themselves under the protection of William Earl of Gloucester and lord of Glamorgan, who had succeeded to the titles and possessions of his father Robert, in 1147, and who, after the demise of his only son, constituted Prince John, a younger son of Henry II., his heir. This prince, having married Isabel, the youngest daughter of Earl William, enjoyed these possessions until his divorce from that lady, after his accession to the throne of England, when they were given as her dower to the Earl of Essex, whom she next married, and afterwards to Hubert de Burgh. On the death of Isabel, the family title and possessions fell to Almaric, the son of her eldest sister Mabel, who died young and without issue; and the whole of them passed to Richard Earl of Clare, who had married the only surviving daughter of Earl William, and in whose family they remained until the early part of the fourteenth century. Early in the thirteenth century, Glamorgan was invaded from the west by the Welsh chieftain Rhys ab Gruffydd, who succeeded in taking all the castles of Gower, besides several other very strong ones, including that of Senghenydd, afterwards called Caerphilly. After the death of Gilbert de Clare, in 1230, Richard, his eldest son, being then in his minority, the Earl of Pembroke, his maternal uncle, obtained the custody of the Honour of Glamorgan, by paying five hundred marks to the crown of England: in 1244, this Richard was engaged in hostilities against the Welsh, who had attacked his possessions in Glamorgan; and in 1257, when king Henry III. meditated an attack on North Wales, he was invested with the command of all the forces in Glamorgan and other parts of South Wales. By the death of his descendant, another Gilbert de Clare, who was slain in the battle of Bannockburn, in 1314, and left no issue, the family honours and estates devolved on Eleanor, eldest sister of the latter, who transferred them by marriage to the younger Hugh le Despencer, the favourite of Edward II. In 1315, a formidable rebellion was excited in Glamorgan, by Llewelyn Bren, who, with ten thousand men, assaulted and took the castle of Caerphilly; but it was soon suppressed by John Gifford, lord of Bronllys, who had been appointed custos of the lands of Gilbert, the late Earl of Clare, in Glamorgan, and Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, general of the forces in this expedition; and the Welsh chieftain and his two sons were taken prisoners, and sent to the Tower of London. In consequence of this, however, the Welsh inhabitants of Glamorgan obtained a considerable alleviation of some of the most oppressive of the old feudal services.

At this period the violent proceedings of the younger Spencer, with a view to the extension of his possessions in Glamorgan, threw the whole country into a state of the greatest disorder. The circumstances, according to Carte, were as follows: William de Breos, lord of Gower, had two daughters, the elder of whom, Aliva, was married to John de Mowbray; the younger, to James de Bohun, of Medherst: William, therefore, by a special deed, granted to John de Mowbray and his wife, and their heirs, the honour and lands of Gower; and to Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, he gave the rest of his estates. By virtue of this grant, Mowbray entered upon the lands without any license from the king, of whom it was held in capite, and this served Spencer as a pretext for prosecuting him, in order to procure a sentence of forfeiture: but Mowbray and the Earl of Hereford both alleged that the entry was made according to the customs of the Marches, and insisted upon their rights; and, as these were questions affecting the tenure of all similar domains, the lords marcher were unanimous in resisting an enquiry, at the same time exclaiming loudly against the rapacity of Spencer. Seeing that they had no remedy but force, they demanded of King Edward, in open arms, that that favourite should either be banished the realm, or imprisoned and brought to trial; and, finding these efforts unavailing, they committed terrible ravages upon Spencer's lands in Glamorgan, as also in the western parts of Wales, slaying and imprisoning his servants, and pillaging, burning, and destroying his castles: the insurgents then entered into a strict league with the Earl of Lancaster, and thus became sufficiently powerful to enforce that sentence of banishment against the obnoxious favourite which was soon afterwards rendered null by Lancaster's defeat and death. Queen Eleanor and the young Prince Edward having seized Bristol, and hung its governor, the elder Spencer, before the castle of that city, within sight of his son and the king, the latter made their escape in a small vessel, purposing to retire to the little island of Lundy, in the Bristol channel; but, after combating with adverse winds in that arm of the sea for eleven days, they were at last constrained to land on the Glamorgan-shire coast, and take refuge in Caerphilly castle. From that place the king issued divers commissions to his military tenants in the county palatine of Pembroke, and other parts of South Wales, and to the vassals of the lordship of Glamorgan, enjoining them to take arms in his defence; but being disappointed in his expectations of military aid, he sought an asylum in the abbey of Neath, leaving Spencer in Caerphilly castle, where he was soon besieged by the queen's forces, who compelled the garrison to surrender; but Spencer made his escape and rejoined the king, with whom he was shortly after taken prisoner at Llantrissant, in this county, and conveyed to Hereford, where he was tried and executed by the queen's party, and his estates escheated to the crown. Hugh, his eldest son, was, however, received into favour by Edward III., and restored to all, or most, of the manors and castles which had belonged to his father in this county; and in the seventeenth of that reign, we find him styled Lord of Glamorgan. On his death he was succeeded by his brother Edward, whose grandson, Thomas Le Despencer, succeeded in obtaining the restoration to his family of the title of Earl of Gloucester, and of the remainder of the forfeited estates of his great grandfather. This nobleman, on the accession of Henry IV. to the crown of England, was deprived of all his honours and estates, and, after he had been put to death by the common people of Bristol, was declared a traitor, and his estates confiscated; but those in Glamorgan were afterwards granted to his widow, and passed by descent to his daughter Isabel, who first married Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Abergavenny, afterwards created Earl of Worcester, and, on his death, Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, whose son Henry, by this his second wife, succeeded to the family estates of the Spencers, which, after his death and that of his daughter, were transferred to his sister Anne, then wife of Richard Neville, Earl of Salisbury, who was shortly after created Earl of Warwick, and who so highly distinguished himself in the wars of the Roses. After the death of this nobleman, at the battle of Barnet, in 1471, his countess was deprived of all her estates, which were conferred on her two daughters, one of whom had been married to George Duke of Clarence, and the other to Richard Duke of Gloucester, to the latter of whom descended the Welsh possessions. The daughters of the Earl of Warwick being dead, Henry VII., in the third year of his reign, restored to the countess, by act of parliament, the estates which had belonged to her husband, the whole of which, in the same year, probably in consequence of a previous understanding, she made over to that monarch, and the lordship of Glamorgan is enumerated among the possessions thus conveyed to the crown. In the succeeding reign, when the independent authority of the lords marcher was abolished, the territory of Glamorgan was erected into a separate shire, with its present limits, and subjected to the laws and judicature of England. Henry VIII. gave the lordship to Jasper Duke of Bedford; but, as this nobleman died without issue, it again reverted to the crown. In the reign of Elizabeth, the greater part of the manors and subordinate lordships was sold to individuals; and the remainder, in subsequent reigns, changed owners in like manner, the paramount lordship itself being converted into a lord-lieutenancy, similar in all respects to those of the English counties.

About the end of September, 1642, the Marquis of Hertford, with a party of royalists, escaping at Minehead, in Somersetshire, on board of some coal vessels, from the pursuit of the Earl of Bedford, passed over to the Welsh coast, and secured possession of Cardiff castle. The marquis having announced his intention of seizing all property belonging to the Earl of Pembroke, who had espoused the cause of the parliament, the inhabitants of this county assembled, attacked him at Cardiff, and killed about fifty of the royalists. In June 1647, this fortress being then in the hands of the parliament, the gentry and people of the county, to the number of a thousand, or upwards, took up arms and assembled at Llandaf, to resist the proceedings of the parliamentary committee at Cardiff. They sent to the governor of the latter place a declaration that they had risen not to oppose the parliament, but for self-defence. The Monmouthshire committee threatened them with military execution; but the matter seems to have been settled by negotiation, and a declaration was published in the following July, entitled "The Heads of the present Grievances of the county of Glamorgan, declaring the cause of their late rising and taking up of arms, published for the satisfaction of all other counties of England and Wales who groan under the same, or the like, burdens of oppression and tyranny, &c." After the termination of the first civil war, an order had been issued by the parliament for disbanding the different bodies of militia in the principality; but some of the commanders, among whom was Major-General Stradling, of St. Donatt's, in this county, who had now deserted from the republican army, contrived, under various pretences, to retain a considerable number of troops under arms, which, as circumstances permitted, they increased, by the addition of recruits favourable to the royal cause. These forces assuming a rather formidable appearance, Colonel Horton was sent into this part of Wales with a small army, which Cromwell himself was following with reinforcements, to intimidate the leaders of this movement, and to enforce the order for disbanding the original levies. Colonel Horton, having stationed his forces at St. Fagan's, near Llandaf, was there attacked, on the 8th of May, 1648, by the Welshmen, amounting to nearly eight thousand, whom, after an obstinate conflict of about two hours, he totally routed with great slaughter, though his troops were scarcely more than a third of the enemy's number: this victory was deemed by the parliament of such importance, that a day of public thanksgiving was appointed, and so great was the destruction of the royalists, that, during the next harvest, labourers were so scarce in this county, that the produce of the soil was, in a great measure, gathered in by the women.

The greater part of Glamorganshire is in the diocese of Llandaf, the rest in that of St. David's, and the whole is in the province of Canterbury: the portion in the first-mentioned diocese is comprised in the deaneries of Llandaf and Groneath, and in the archdeaconry of Llandaf; and that in the latter, in the deanery of Gower, and archdeaconry of Carmarthen: the total number of parishes is one hundred and twenty-one, of which fifty-two are rectories, forty-seven vicarages (four of which are endowed with the great tithes), one a donative, and the rest perpetual curacies: the archdeacon of Llandaf has no visitatorial powers, the chancellor making an annual visitation through the diocese; the visitation for this county is held in Whitsun-week, at Cowbridge and Llandaf. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the ten hundreds of Caerphilly, Cowbridge, Dinas-Powis, Kibbor, Llangyvelach, Miskin, Neath, Newcastle, Ogmere, and Swansea. It contains the small and unimportant city of Llandaf; the borough, market, and sea-port towns of Cardiff, Neath, and Swansea; the borough and market towns of Cowbridge, Llantrissant, and Merthyr-Tydvil; the small boroughs and sea-ports of Aberavon and Loughor; the boroughs of Aberdare and Kenfig, and the market towns of Bridgend and Caerphilly. One knight was formerly returned to parliament for the shire, and one representative for Cardiff and the rest of the boroughs collectively, with the exception of Merthyr-Tydvil and Aberdare, which are newly-created boroughs. By the late act for amending the representation of the people the different boroughs within the county have been divided into electoral districts, each sending one member to parliament; namely, Cardiff, Cowbridge, and Llantrissant, the member for which is elected at Cardiff; Swansea, Loughor, Neath, Aberavon, and Kenfig, the member for which is elected at Swansea; and the newly-created district of Merthyr-Tydvil and Aberdare, the member for which is elected at Merthyr-Tydvil. Under the same act the county now sends two representatives to parliament: the county member was formerly elected at Bridgend, but that distinction has been transferred to Cardiff, the principal town: the polling-places in elections for the county are, Cardiff, Bridgend, Merthyr-Tydvil, Neath, and Swansea. Glamorganshire is included in the South Wales circuit: the assizes and Epiphany quarter sessions are held at Cardiff, the Easter quarter sessions at Cowbridge, the Midsummer sessions at Neath, and the Michaelmas sessions at Swansea: the county gaol is at Cardiff, and the county house of correction at Swansea: to the new gaol at Cardiff will also be attached a house of correction for the eastern part of the county: there are seventy-seven acting magistrates. The parochial rates raised in the county, for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £42,301, and the expenditure to £43,124, of which £36,154 was applied to the relief of the poor.

The entire surface of the county is diversified by hills, or rising grounds, excepting only the neighbourhood of Cardiff, which is composed of a fertile level tract of considerable extent. All the northern portions of it are occupied by barren mountains, some of which are isolated, but most of them extend in chains from north to south, separated by deep, broken, and romantic valleys, through which the principal rivers pursue their turbulent course to the Bristol channel. The loftiest summits are Mynydd-Llangeinwyr; Pen-craig-llyn-vawr, in the parish of Glyn-Corwg; that of the mountain which rises above Ystraddyvodog, directly north of Bridgend; and that of Mynydd y Gwair, about twelve miles north of Swansea. These hilly regions are naturally separated from the rest of the county by a chain of elevations which runs from east to west through its centre, from Ruperrah, on the confines of Monmouthshire, by Lantwit-Garth, Llantrissant, Mynydd-Gaer, Mynydd-Brombill, the Gnoll, &c. From the foot of these mountains to the sea extends the rich and fertile vale, or rather plain, of Glamorgan, popularly denominated "The Garden of South Wales," which, although its elevation is small, compared with the mountains, and its surface generally of an undulating character, is yet marked by numerous sudden declivities, succeeded by equally sudden and remarkable ascents. On the west it is separated by Swansea bay from the similar tract called Gower, forming the south-western extremity of the county. Bro Miskin, or the Vale of Ely, bordering on the river Elai, or Ely, from the vicinity of Hensol eastward to Penarth harbour, is more particularly distinguished, in the great Vale of Glamorgan, for its luxuriant fertility. The limestone cliffs which overhang the entire coast, excepting only the inner recesses of Swansea bay, rise in most places to the height of one hundred feet. In the Bristol channel, off the coast of Glamorganshire, and to the south-west of Penarth harbour, are situated the islets of Barry and Sully. The lakes are small and few in number: the principal one is Kenvig Pool (situated near the ancient borough of Kenvig, between Margam Park and the sea-coast), which is of small extent, and lies near the shore, in the midst of sands: besides this, there are several among the mountains, the most remarkable of which is Llyn-Vawr, situated immediately below the high peak of Pen-craig. Few tracts in Britain present so great a variety of scenery as Glamorganshire: although its mountains do not attain an elevation equal to those of the more northern counties, their extreme abruptness, increasing their apparent height, forms a bold and romantic back-ground to the scene of gentle richness presented by the Vale; while, on the other hand, the fine sweeps of the coast, more particularly round the bay of Swansea and the peninsula of Gower, afford many pleasing and varied marine prospects. The level portions of the county contain little wood; but this picturesque ornament abounds on the banks of the Tâf, the two Rhonddas, and the Cynon; and the "woody hilles" of Glamorgan, mentioned by Spenser, are still to be found in the wilds of Aberdare and Ystraddyvodog, and in the magnificently clothed, as well as more plentifully wooded, heights of Margam, Baglan, Briton-Ferry, and the Vale of Neath. The more level tracts, near the sea, are also diversified by several narrow, woody, and sequestered dells, the sides of which decline very abruptly from the ordinary level.

The climate of the Vale of Glamorgan and of the peninsula of Gower (those tracts lying open to the Bristol channel on the south, and being sheltered on the north by the mountains) is remarkably mild and salubrious, and the inhabitants are distinguished for their longevity: it is nevertheless extremely changeable, the temperature being known to vary twenty degrees in the space of twenty-four hours. It is also very moist, owing to these districts being exposed to vapours wafted by westerly or south-westerly winds from the great Atlantic, and attracted by its high hills, these winds prevailing at least one-half of the year. This humidity is a source of great perplexity to the farmer, during the hay and corn harvests, and also causes considerable damage to various agricultural crops, by the abundant natural grasses which in consequence spring up, and which, on the deep gravelly soils, it is found almost impossible to eradicate from the arable lands; for even when the ground is well fallowed and apparently cleared, small portions of roots of various kinds of grasses, chiefly of the couch species, are still left undestroyed, and, penetrating into the deep gravelly subsoils beyond the reach of the plough, soon also recover possession of the surface. On the other hand, these frequent rains are highly favourable to the production of all green crops, and, when properly managed, the crops of turnips are little inferior to those of the best-cultivated English counties. Although the climate of the Vale is so mild that the myrtle, arbutus, and other tender exotics, which in most parts of Britain require to be kept under cover in the winter, do not here suffer from exposure to the air during the whole of that season; and snow seldom lies long on the ground, generally disappearing from the vicinity of the coast in forty-eight hours after it has fallen; yet the atmosphere of the mountains is cold and tempestuous, the winters being severe and frequently of long duration: fogs hanging upon their summits are deemed by the inhabitants of the Vale a certain presage of rain. The hay harvest commences in the Vale about the middle of June: artificial grasses are frequently cut in the first week of this month, but the natural meadows are not generally mown until the latter part of it, or the beginning of July. The wheat harvest commences about the first week in August, and in some situations in the Vale this grain ripens almost as early as in any part of the kingdom; but it is a general practice to allow it to stand longer before it is cut than in the English counties. In Gower, owing to the prevalence of cool sea breezes, it is later than in the Vale of Glamorgan: in the hilly district it seldom commences before September, and often continues to a very late period in the autumn. The soils of this county are of various qualities: the surface of a large portion of the mountainous districts, especially in the hollows, consists of black peat, varied in dryer situations by a brown gravelly earth; but, from the prevalence of clayey substrata, cold and springy soils are by far the most abundant: these, in their natural state, consist generally of a mixture of sand with a black peaty earth, from four to eight inches thick, resting upon a yellowish, blueish, or light brown clay, from one to four, or even more feet in depth: owing to this substratum containing siliceous particles, these soils are capable of great amelioration by judicious systems of agriculture. In the mountain valleys is found a brown fertile loam, suited to all the purposes of agriculture, and yielding abundant crops of corn and grass. In the Vale of Glamorgan, and in Gower, the soil is excellently adapted for both pasture and tillage: in the former state it naturally produces grasses of the sweetest kind, and in great abundance; but its quality varying in every parish, and almost on every farm, it is best calculated for a mixed system of husbandry, combining both tillage and pasture. In some places it is light, and even sandy; but towards the coast it becomes stronger and richer. Along the sea-shore from Penarth to Lantwit and Newton, and inland to the vicinity of the main road from Cardiff to Swansea, it is for the most part clayey, though consisting in some places of a brownish fertile loam of good staple and moderate tenacity, in others of a marly loam, while in another it is composed of rather shallow and springy clays, which are seldom to be got in good tilth, being either too wet or too dry. The soils best adapted in all seasons for the alternate culture of turnips, barley, clover, wheat, &c., lie in the several parishes of Aberavon, St. Bride's, Caerau, Cardiff, St. Fagan's, Llandaf, Llanannor, Margam, Michaelston, Peterston, Rhath or Roath, Radyr, and Whitchurch, and in the Vale of Neath; in all which places there is a proportion of good gravelly soils, having an occasional admixture of strong loam, or good marl, and in some cases of a sandy soil, on which turnips and barley are cultivated with success, but the wheat is not of so fine a quality as that produced on the clayey lands. The substratum of the whole of these fertile tracts is limestone.

Though a large portion of the county is arable, yet its produce of grain, owing to the number of persons employed in its iron-manufactures and various commercial pursuits, is insufficient for the supply of its own population. The common corn and pulse crops are wheat, barley, oats, beans, and peas. The introduction of Scotch farm bailiffs by some gentlemen in the Vale, and by the iron-masters among the hills, and also of some English farmers, has greatly assimilated the systems of husbandry pursued on the principal farms to the most approved English and Scotch methods. On these, the principal part of the gravelly land is farmed in a four or five years' course of turnips, barley, clover, and either grass or wheat; but the ordinary diversity of soil on the same farm prohibits the use of any one peculiar system: moreover, such is the disposition of these soils to produce grasses, that a summer fallow is found to be absolutely necessary after two courses to clear them of weeds, and give them a dressing of lime; and on all the tenacious soils, summer fallows limed form part of the ordinary system of tillage, being succeeded first by barley, next by clover, then probably by wheat, and lastly by a summer fallow again: oats, beans, and turnips are occasionally grown on the latter, but after no regular system. The wheat grown in the Vale is chiefly of the white Lammas species; but on the gravelly soils, in Gower, and among the hills, the red Lammas is also sown; and other varieties, such as the Winslow, the Talavera, the cone or bearded wheat, and the Cape spring wheat, are occasionally cultivated, though not on near so large a scale as the two first-mentioned varieties: thirty bushels per acre is considered an ample produce, though thirty-five and forty have been reaped in some instances; but the average, even on the best farms, is seldom twenty-five bushels per acre. Notwithstanding that the humidity of the climate is unfavourable to the perfection of the wheat ear, the soils of the Vale produce wheat of the best quality: the crops are chiefly cut by strangers from the English side of the Severn, by Irish reapers, and by Cardigan men, engaged only for this purpose; the natives of the country, although good workmen in other respects, being from habit slovenly reapers, and consequently seldom employed for this purpose by the principal farmers: the Cardigan men cut it down, or bogg it, with a large heavy hook, which they use like the Hainault scythe, except that they have no crook in the left hand. Barley after turnips sometimes produces from forty to fifty bushels per acre, though the average is much below that amount; and when it succeeds wheat, which is commonly the case, the average does not exceed thirty bushels per acre: this grain is mown like hay, and seldom bound into sheaves. Oats are chiefly cultivated in the poorer soils, on the clays, in Gower, and in the hilly districts; while on the more valuable lands, scarcely sufficient for the consumption of the respective farms is grown: on the best soils the white potatoe oat is the most productive; but on all others, the black, or Polish oat is grown: after being mown, this species of grain is bound into sheaves, like wheat: the produce varies from twenty-five to fifty-five bushels per acre. Beans, although the climate is unfavourable to their production, are partially grown on the strong soils of the Vale; but the cultivation of peas, owing to the adverse influence of superabundant moisture, has been almost entirely abandoned. Potatoes have of late years been grown to a very considerable extent, a ready market being found for them in the coal and iron works in the hilly district: the produce varies under field culture, from five to eight tons per acre. Turnips are generally cultivated, except on the most tenacious clays; and being sown on the Northumberland system, when the land is properly prepared, the crop seldom fails. Mangel-wurzel is a common agricultural crop, and is grown under the same management as turnips, except that the land is better prepared, and the seed sown earlier: some crops of this root, grown near Cardiff, have weighed fifty tons per acre of bulb: it is chiefly given to milch cows, in lieu of turnips, to which it is preferable for this purpose, as it does not impart to their milk any disagreeable flavour. Vetches, the culture of which is much favoured both by soil and climate, are occasionally grown as a substitute for clover. The principal artificial grasses are, white and red clover, trefoil, rye-grass, and sainfoin, with some lucern. The land bordering on the coast, in the neighbourhoods of Fonmon, Newton-Notage, &c., some of which is composed of a shallow soil on an immediate substratum of limestone, produces excellent crops of sainfoin, the cultivation of which has greatly enhanced its value, as that plant flourishes best in dry soils of this nature: even some of the driest gravels produce tolerable crops of it, but it soon becomes choked with natural grasses.

The grass lands are of about equal extent to those under tillage: the south-eastern extremity of the county, from the Romney river on the east to the border of the Vale of Miskin, including the fertile banks of the Tâf and the Elai, is more particularly distinguished for the richness of its pastures; as also is the tract from Lantwit-Major, by Boverton, Gileston, and Fonmon castle, to the mouth of the Elai near Pennarth harbour. Here the natural pastures produce grasses of the sweetest kind, and are well adapted to the rearing of stock. Although good in quality, their produce, however, is seldom large in quantity, owing to the soil not being of sufficient depth to retain moisture in dry summers, and the limestone substrata being of so porous a nature as soon to absorb the latest rains, in consequence of which the ground cracks and opens in wide fissures. But around Cardiff, along the banks of the Elai and Daw rivers, and in some other valleys, where the soil is deeper, the quantity is much more abundant, though often coarse, for want of proper drainage, and liable to damage from mud and gravel deposited in times of flood by the neighbouring streams. In a considerable portion of the rest of the Vale of Glamorgan, and of Gower, the sward is every where fine and close, but not so rich, owing to the extremely dry and porous nature of the limestone substrata. All the pastures, both rich and poor, are much overrun with the pretty but useless plant called crow's foot. So many of the streams are employed in giving motion to the machinery of the iron and other works, that irrigation is little practised: it is most common in Gower and the Vale, though not universally adopted even in situations where easily practicable. The dairies are not so large as they formerly were; but their produce in cheese and butter is of good quality, and finds a ready market among the manufacturing population: much of the cheese is made with an admixture of sheep's milk, which gives it a shortness and tartness of taste not always agreeable to strangers, but it is of a rich quality, and much esteemed by the natives: the best cows' milk cheese is mild, and equal to what is made in any part of England: in the Vale is occasionally made a peculiarly rich cheese, which, after being kept a sufficient length of time, assumes a blue colour, and in this state is highly esteemed. Butter-milk cheese, provincially called caws sŵr, is sometimes made, to be eaten fresh with bread and butter, most of the natives esteeming it a great delicacy. The principal manure employed in this county, and not commonly used in every other part of Britain, is lime, which, owing to the abundance of limestone and of coal for burning it, is here applied in greater quantities probably than in any other part of the kingdom, two hundred bushels per acre being the general proportion, and this application being repeated, in many instances every four years, without much attention to the different properties of the various species here obtained. The old custom of burning lime in sod kilns on the fields to be manured with it has given way to the more approved practice of burning it in kilns of solid masonry. Judging from the large and ancient marl-pits still remaining in various parts of the county, especially in the gravelly districts, it is presumed that this substance must, at some remote period, have been very generally used as a manure, probably before lime was applied, or its good qualities known. Braes, or ashes and coal dust, the refuse of the coking hearths, where coal is charred for the use of the blast furnaces, and ashes of all kinds, are also used in situations where they can be conveniently procured. Paring and burning is not generally practised in the Vale, but is constantly resorted to in the hilly districts and in Gower, as a preparation for wheat. Water-ponds of stone and mortar, on a basis of puddled earth, gravel, and sand, are found necessary for supplying the cattle with water, in the dry limestone tracts of Gower and the Vale, where the brooks are few, and frequently disappear in the above-mentioned swallows, or fissures, in the substrata. The old long wooden ploughs, formerly in common use, are now only occasionally seen on small farms among the hills, having been superseded by ploughs made of iron, on the Scotch plan, which are now in more common use than any other sort, being well made by the smiths of the county. Drags, scufflers, and horse-hoes of the most approved construction are used on the principal farms, and various kinds of drills are also common. Thrashing machines were in more general use some years ago than at present, the superabundance of labourers and the low rate of wages having rendered it advisable rather to employ the poor than to maintain them in idleness; but some powerful machines of this kind, to be worked by wind, have lately been erected. The teams for the plough consist generally of two horses, or six oxen; and for the road, of waggons with three horses each, and carts with two. The shovels and rakes used are of very peculiar construction: each of the former consists of an oval iron plate, sharp at the point and steeled, and having a long curved handle: the rakes present an awkward appearance to an Englishman, on account of their handles not being joined to the heads at right angles, but obliquely. The ancient British customs of husbandry, so long preserved in this county, are now nearly obsolete: the principal remains of them are in the practice of milking ewes for the purpose of making cheese of their milk, which is done by women, who receive one-seventh of the milk for their trouble, and that of shearing lambs in the first summer.

The native breed of cattle is naturally large, fine, and delicate; but they were greatly neglected during the late war, when, owing to the high price of corn, tillage made rapid progress over the best pastures; and the attention of the stock farmer being for the most part confined to the improvement of his breed of sheep, the cattle were driven to the poor wet soils, where they soon degenerated: another cause of their being thus neglected was the great demand for hay in the iron and coal works, which still continues to draw from the Vale all of the best quality. Formerly they were in great request among the English graziers, but they have long ago neglected them, in favour of the Hereford and short-horned breeds, as they are now very slow feeders, and do not arrive to proper maturity under the age of about six years. In the fertile parishes of St. Athan, Gileston, and Lantwit, these cattle were formerly remarkable for their large size, some of them weighing, when fat, no less than four hundred lb. per quarter; and, in all parts of the county, the cows are still highly esteemed for the dairy, and the oxen for working, and, when fat, their beef is of superior quality. They have lately been crossed with the Hereford and short-horned breeds, by which means they have been greatly improved in form and aptitude to fatten, but deteriorated for the purposes of the dairy; and with various kinds of Scotch cattle, especially with the Ayrshire breed, which renders them more hardy, and more profitable for the dairy, both objects of great importance. In the hilly districts, and in Gower, the native cattle are more hardy and compact than elsewhere within the limits of the county: the Highland and Kyles breeds, and various crosses with the native stock, also thrive in these more exposed regions. The Vale was formerly distinguished for a native breed of large sheep, having long legs, flat sides, and wool of a good combing quality, with good and fine-grained flesh; but these are now nearly extinct, though a few still remain in the vicinity of Lantwit-Major. The native sheep of the hilly districts are small, hardy, lively, and active, with short wool, having an admixture of hairs, termed by the natives syth-vlew, and which greatly lessens its value to the cloth manufacturers. In the Vale the prevailing kinds of sheep now are the Cotswold and Leicester, of which excellent flocks are found in all the lower parts of the county, great attention being paid to their improvement. Newton Down, the Golden Mile, St. Mary Hill, and other dry and open commons, were formerly stocked with a beautiful and excellent small breed of sheep, having wool of a fine clothing quality; but of late years this breed has been greatly neglected, owing to the price of the wool only equalling that of the long coarse wool of the larger breed, which has almost entirely superseded it, as the fleeces of the latter are nearly double the weight of those of the former. In all parts of the county it is customary to milk the ewes throughout the summer, from about the middle of May to the middle of September, their milk being made into cheese, for which purpose it is most commonly mixed with nearly an equal quantity of skimmed cows' milk. Shearing twice a year is sometimes practised, first about the end of May, and the last early in October. The native breed of hogs is white, of large size, having flat sides and long legs: the animals are slow feeders, and when fat weigh from twenty-five to thirty score lb., the bacon being of excellent quality: a good sort is obtained by an intermixture of these and the Berkshire and Chinese breeds. The horses are of various kinds: the old breed of the county is extinct in the Vale, and those by which it has been superseded are chiefly distinct breeds of the cart and saddle kind: the former are generally black, and, though not heavy, are strong and active; the latter are crosses from blood horses brought into the county, and generally small, but active. Many horses bred in this county are sold, when about three years old, to be taken to the English markets. In the hilly districts there is a good breed of ponies, very hardy, and capable of sustaining the greatest fatigue.

In the valleys of this county, the climate being mild and genial, vegetables, fruit, and flowers, are produced as early and in as great perfection as in any part of England; and the gardens are neat and well cultivated: the cottage gardens have a pleasing mixture of the various ordinary productions of the garden and orchard, and scarcely one of them is without a proportionably large bed of leeks. The market gardens in the neighbourhood of Llandaf and Cardiff are extensive and productive, and supply the manufacturing districts with vegetables. Formerly, the orchards were much more extensive than at present, and numerous remains of them, in various places, testify that the soil is well adapted for the growth of the apple, and that this branch of rural economy has been greatly neglected of late years, compared with its former flourishing state: almost every large farm had formerly a cyder mill, but at present there is scarcely one in the county. A Horticultural Society has lately been established at Cardiff under favourable auspices, which may perhaps restore the culture of the apple.

Several parts of Glamorganshire are well wooded, the growth of all kinds of timber being here as flourishing as in any part of Britain; but the extent of many of these woodlands has been greatly diminished, to supply the demand for their produce at the iron-works. The natural woods of the high northern part of the county, which are more particularly extensive in Glyn Ogwr, and the parishes of Ystradyyvodog, Llanwonno, Llangonoyd, and others situated at a distance from the iron-works, consist chiefly of oak, ash, and alder, interspersed in smaller proportions with birch, mountain ash, wild cherry, &c., in the uplands, and with wych elm, aspen, sycamore, maple, linden, crab, &c., in more sheltered situations. The dry sandy soils of the same part also produce beech wood, which, where preserved on the lowland gravelly soils, in Kibwr, Miskin Vale, Llandaf, &c., grows to a very great size. Some of the largest timber trees are produced on the northern border of the Vale of Glamorgan, and of Gower, the limestone soils of which tracts themselves, though little favourable to the spontaneous growth of wood, have various plantations of fine timber trees, which adorn the estates of some of the more extensive proprietors; and the elm, which here sometimes attains an extraordinary size and is very common, is frequently made into various implements of husbandry, or supplies the use of oak in building, and for the bottoms of ships. Some of the most extensive plantations are those of Clasmont and Margam: there are many others of smaller extent, and a great proportion of all of them consists of firs of various kinds. The waste lands amount to about one hundred thousand acres, and may be divided into two classes; first,—the wastes, commons, or downs, of the southern limestone tracts of the Vale of Glamorgan and of Gower, which, together with some warrens and sand banks, on the sea-coast, comprise about fourteen thousand acres: many of these wastes, and more especially those of St. Mary Hill, in the Vale of Glamorgan, and Cevn y Bryn hill in Gower, are clothed with the sweetest herbage, and are chiefly depastured by sheep: their surface is generally level, and their size from twenty to several hundred acres: secondly,—the remaining eighty-six thousand acres on the hills and mountains of the northern parts of the county, of which some large parishes contain not less than eight or ten thousand acres each: these are for the most part appropriated to the pasturage of sheep and cattle, the tenants of the neighbouring farms mostly possessing an unlimited right of common upon them. The common fuel throughout the county is coal, with which it is abundantly supplied from its own mines. In 1770, the Glamorgan Agricultural Society, one of the most respectable institutions of the kind, was established: at present it has a stock of £1000 in the funds, and offers premiums to the amount of about £200 per annum: it holds its general meetings at Cowbridge.

and of great importance, consisting chiefly of coal, iron, lead, and stones of various kinds; and its geology is of the most interesting character. It comprises by far the greater portion of the rich mineral basin of South Wales, which includes all the northern part of it, from a line drawn from the vicinity of Risca, on the river Romney, by Castell Côch, Llantrissant, and Newton Down, to the sea-shore below Margam; whence, crossing Swansea bay to the Mumbles, it continues across Gower to Carmarthen bay, near the mouth of the Burry river. This great field belongs to the independent coal formation, and is entirely contained in strata of limestone, which, cropping out to the south of the coal, occupies the rest of the county from the line before mentioned, southward, and contains valuable ores of lead. The deepest part of this basin extends from its centre, in the vicinity of Neath, in this county, to Llanelly in Carmarthenshire, where the lowest strata of coal are nearly seven hundred fathoms below the outcrop of some of the superior strata in the mountains occupying the northern parts of the county. The bed of coal lying nearest the surface, in the vicinity of Neath, is, at its greatest depth, sixty fathoms below it, and rises to it in every direction, extending in breadth, from north to south, about a mile, and several miles in length, from east to west. In a similar manner do the inferior beds rise to the surface all round the outcrop of the superior stratum, and between it and the limestone which borders it, on every side: thus, from a line drawn from east to west, through the centre of the field, all the beds of coal on the north crop out on the northern side, at distances proportioned to their depth beneath the surface; and all those on the south, in like manner, appear southward. Twelve of the beds of coal are from three to nine feet thick, and eleven others from eighteen inches to three feet, making together ninety-five feet of coal capable of being worked, besides numerous other beds of from six to eighteen inches in thickness. The coal obtained from the southern side of the mineral basin, and also from the northern measures east of the Neath river, is principally of a bituminous or binding quality, and for the most part adapted for conversion into coke for the use of the blast furnaces; but the north-western part of the county is wholly occupied by the "stone coal," which is entirely devoid of bitumen, and burns without smoking, flaming, or caking: in Welsh this is commonly called glo caled, "hard coal:" the large is much used in drying malt and hops, and the small in burning lime. The quantity of sulphur contained in these coals is in none of the species very great: less, however, appears in the stone than in the binding sort, and the less the latter contains, the better it is adapted for use in the iron-manufacture. In many instances the strata are dislocated by "dykes," or "faults," which take great ranges through the interior of the basin, chiefly in a direction from north to south, and often elevate or depress the whole of the strata, from forty to a hundred feet, for hundreds of acres together: these dislocations are not generally discernible by any appearance on the surface. From the Neath river westward to Carmarthen bay, the strata of the southern series are more regular than those opposite to them on the north; but eastward of that line the case is reversed. The lower beds of the coal deposit enclose parallel strata of iron-ore, of which there are, in some places, as many as sixteen, accompanied with irregular balls or lumps of iron-ore, called "balls of mine." The strata of the iron-stone commonly vary from one to five inches in thickness; and the balls are of various sizes, from two to sixteen and twenty lb., or upwards, even to three hundred-weight: both kinds are poorer in metal than the iron-ore of the North of England, but their contiguity to such an extent of coal, and their abundance, make ample amends for this poverty. This ore is of the kind denominated by Kirwan "common upland argillaceous iron-stone," and is chiefly found contiguous to strata of aluminous schist, called "cleft, clunch," &c., and to coal, freestone, or fire-clay. The mountains, being intersected by deep valleys, offer great facilities for working the coal and iron together, by means of levels. The iron-ore occurs in the largest quantity, and of the best quality, on the northern side of the county, from the neighbourhood of Merthyr-Tydvil westward towards the upper part of the Vale of Tawe, where it yields about thirty per cent. of metal. The strata of the limestone of the Vale of Glamorgan and of Gower for the most part undulate with the surface of the country, and are of several varieties. The white limestone, which occupies the whole of Gower and much of the Vale adjoining the coal tract, is so denominated, not from the colour of the stone in its natural state, which is for the most part a dark grey; but because it burns to a perfectly white lime, of the very best quality as a manure. On some of the rising grounds of this limestone tract are deposits of fine white sandstone, as on St. Mary hill, near Cowbridge; Cevn y Bryn, in Gower; Cevn y Vai, near Bridgend; and on the northern part of Newton Down; and it has besides several beds of tufa freestone, which resembles the Purbeck stone, and of calcareous freestone, especially of the latter, in the parish of St. Fagan's, where it resembles the Portland stone. The white limestone is extremely cavernous, and some of its cavities contain considerable quantities of lead-ore, some calamine and manganese, and strings of copper.

Lead-ore has been obtained in the islets of Barry and Sully, and at Llantrythid, Coychurch, Merthyr-Maur, Newton, Coed Lai, Maen Llwyd, about three miles east of Caerphilly; All Slade mine, in the parish of Bishopston, in Gower; Tewgoed mine, in the parish of Llangan, near Cowbridge; and Park mine, about a mile to the south of Llantrissant; but at none of these places is this metal now worked. Calamine is found in the greatest quantity at Maenllwyd; manganese in Gower, and at Newton, Twynau Gwynion, and other places. Lias limestone is in this county commonly called "Aberthaw limestone," from the name of a village on the coast in the neighbourhood of which it more particularly abounds, and from which great quantities of it are shipped coastwise. The blue, or flag, lias limestone, which is used for flooring, tombstones, &c., occupies the eastern end of the Vale of Glamorgan, and is washed by the sea from Sully Island to the mouth of the river Ely, a distance of about four miles: another tract appears a little further westward, extending from the sea-shore, between Barry and Porthkerry, to the Cowbridge road. From Porthkerry the grey, or rag, lias occupies the sea-coast westward to beyond Dunraven castle, a distance of about fourteen miles, and extends inland about six miles: several detached deposits of this kind of stone are also found in conjunction with the white limestone, in different places. The lime of the lias stone is of a buff colour, and not only makes the very best mortar for the purposes of ordinary building, but also forms a valuable cement for works under water: for agricultural purposes, however, it is of inferior quality. A kind of bastard lias, in substance between the true lias and the white limestone, is found in a tract about four miles long and one broad, between Cowbridge and St. Mary Church, and again in the parish of Tythegston, to the west of Ogmere. To the north of the white limestone, and on the verge of the coal tract, is an imperfectly stratified bed of a calcareous pudding-stone, which takes its course from Ruddry, on the Romney, about seven miles north of Cardiff, to Caerphilly Down, and through St. Fagan's, Llanhary, Coyty, &c., to Cevn Cribwr: its lime, of a dusky brown colour, is bad for mortar, but excellent for manure: this, in some places, rests upon the southern edge of the coal strata. Of these various kinds of stone, the principal used in building are, the calcareous freestone of the white limestone tract; siliceous freestone, obtained from quarries in the grey lias, more particularly from those bordering on the coal district; the freestone of the coal measures; the white and lias limestones; and firestone for ovens, which is found in a limestone tract several miles square, at Sully, Cadoxton, Barry, Maes y Velin, Pencarreg, &c. The limestone tracts of the southern side of the county afford excellent specimens of marble, some of which are beautifully variegated with yellow and light liver colours, others with four colours, resembling the brocetto of the lapidaries, while others again are of a liver-colour, slightly variegated. In Gower is obtained a marble, variegated with white, yellow, and liver-colours, besides some of a dark colour beautifully streaked with white, which is sawed and polished in the vicinity of Swansea. Near Merthyr-Tydvil, and at Bwa Maen, near Pont Neath Vaughan, is found a marble of a darker colour, in conjunction with mountain limestone. Gypseous alabaster, the "compact gypsum" of Kirwan, is discovered in large quantities, and of the best quality, at Penarth, Leckwith, Lavernock, and other places, chiefly in a hard clay, or marl, under the blue lias limestone; and is exported to Bristol, and other places in the West of England, to be worked into vases and other ornamental articles, and, when burned, into plaster of Paris, to be formed into cornice mouldings, &c. In the parish of Llansannor is found a thin stratum of a flinty stone, used by the country people to strike fire from steel; as also are others of the same kind at Newcastle, near Bridgend: and at Merthyr-Maur millstone burs, freestone, and micaceous schist, here called pennant, occur on the line of separation between the southern coal strata and the limestone of the Vale of Glamorgan. Grindstones and scythe hones are made at Llangonoyd, Coyty, Pyle, Caer Bal, Llan-Day, St. Hilary, &c.; and millstones at Merthyr, Twynau Gwynion, Rhôsilly, Pen y Vai, Caerphilly, Cevn y Bryn, Newton Down, and a few other places. The "fire clay," which, in beds of various thicknesses, pervades the greater part of the coal tract, is manufactured into fire-bricks for the use of the iron-works, for lime-kilns, &c.: in their composition the clay is mixed with quartz and other stones, pieces of old bricks, &c., ground down between iron cylinders. The limestone strata contain numerous impressions of various marine exuviae, petrified shell-fish, vertebræ, &c. &c. The beds of ironstone and clunch, lying contiguous to the coal strata, mostly exhibit vegetable impressions.

The manufactures and commerce, owing to the abundance of mineral treasures in the county, and its maritime situation, far exceed in extent and importance those of any other county in the principality. The chief branch of manufacture is that of iron, which is principally carried on at Merthyr-Tydvil, where there are numerous blast furnaces for smelting the ore; and also at Pentyrch, in the Vale of Tâf, at Landore, near Swansea, at Neath Abbey, at Dyfrynlynvi, a few miles north of Bridgend, at Cwm Bychan, and at Pontrhdyven, on the river Avon. The last are only just completed, and consist of two blast furnaces, capable of yielding one hundred and fifty tons of metal per week: the blast is communicated by a water-wheel, forty-six feet in diameter, and of ninety horse power, to which the water is brought from the opposite side of the river Avon, by a magnificent stone aqueduct (at first designed for a railway for conveying coal to the work), which is four hundred and fifty-six feet in length, eighty in height, and comprises four elliptical arches, each seventy feet in the span. At each of the above-named establishments, excepting only those at Dyfrynlynvi and Pontrhdyven, are foundries, forges, and rolling-mills, for manufacturing the rough metal into bar and rod iron, and for moulding it into all kinds of articles in cast iron. There are also extensive works at Newbridge, in the Vale of Tâf, for the manufacture of chain cables, and the iron work of suspension bridges, chain piers, &c.; and others just erected at the same place, for the manufacture of "patent wrought-iron railway slates." At Neath Abbey are made all kinds of steam-engines; and the establishment at this place has furnished most of the South American mining companies with their powerful engines. Some of the principal articles of this manufacture, besides those above-mentioned, are, tram-rails, tram-waggons, mould-boards for ploughs, bolts, sheets for the tanners, roofs for buildings, bridges, canal boats, hand-barrows, gates, hurdles, &c. Of the tin-works, the principal are at Melin Gruffydd, near Llandaf; at Aberavon; at Ynys pen llwch, about eight miles from Swansea; and in Cwm Bychan: the first-mentioned are said to be on the largest scale of any in the kingdom. The next most important manufacture is that of copper, the ore of which is brought to this county, for the convenience of coal, from Cornwall, Ireland, and North Wales; and is smelted at extensive works at Tai bâch, Neath, Morriston, and Swansea: those near the latter place are very numerous on both sides of the river Tawe. Formerly there were tin-works at Ynys y Gerwn, a few miles above Neath, and at Penclawdd; but at these places the only business now done is in extracting the metal remaining in the slag or refuse. At Swansea is an extensive manufacture of fine earthenware, much of the produce of which is shipped to various parts of England: a similar manufacture was established, soon after the commencement of the present century, at Nantgarw, in the parish of Eglwysilian, among the mountains to the north of Cardiff. There is also an extensive and very ancient manufacture of brown ware at Ewenny, near Bridgend: the clay used in these latter works is found on the spot, and much of that used in the Swansea pottery at

Cevn Cribwr, near Pyle. At Bridgend was formerly a woollen manufacture, chiefly of scarlet shawls, in imitation of the provincial garment called the "Gower whittle;" and although it has been abandoned for some years, others of the same kind are still carried on in different parts of the county, particularly at Caerphilly, where also both narrow and broad cloths are made. A considerable quantity of flannel, which forms the chief clothing of the peasantry, is made in many parts of Glamorganshire; and coarse cloth is manufactured in small quantities, by individuals who carry it for sale to the fairs and markets. Numerous hides and skins are dressed for sale at Brecknock, and at the Bristol and other English markets: those of the Glamorgan Vale cattle are the thinnest hides known, and are excellently adapted for coach and cart harness. The principal fisheries are those of salmon and sewin, which latter fish is found only in those rivers of the county flowing from the north or east to the south or west; and among these the Ogmere is the most celebrated for the abundance and fine flavour of its fish of both these species. The limestone coast of Gower abounds with oysters, and Port-Eynon employs about twenty boats in the fishery during the season, which begins on the 4th of August, the eve of the festival of St. James (O. S.), which is kept by the fishermen as a holiday: on their return from dredging, the oysters are deposited within low water mark, and, when a sufficient quantity has been caught, are shipped for Bristol, Bath, and the English counties bordering on the Severn. Other fish, of the most valuable kinds, abound on the coast of Gower, the lobsters on which are uncommonly large and fine. Among the produce of the coast must also be enumerated samphire, called in Welsh corn carw'r môr, or "sea buck-horn," which grows on rocks and cliffs not overflowed by the tide, is gathered when out of blossom, boiled, and preserved, and is much esteemed as a pickle; and laver, or sea liver-wort, which vegetates on rocks and stones in the creeks overflowed by the tides, and, when gathered and boiled, is put into jars, with the addition only of a little salt, and occasionally sent as a rarity to distant places: thus prepared, it is called in Glamorgan bara lawr, and by the English, "black-butter." The chief exports of this county are, vast quantities of coal and culm, from Cardiff, Swansea, Neath, and the Burry river, to the western and south-western coasts of England, the western coasts of Wales, and to Ireland; iron and copper, from the same ports; tin plates, from Cardiff, Aberavon, and Neath; fire-bricks, chiefly from Neath, to the coasts of Devon and Cornwall; earthenware and marble, from Swansea; much lime and limestone of the lias kind, from Aberthaw, on the sea-coast to the south of Cowbridge; and great quantities of limestone, from the shores of Gower, to Devonshire, Carmarthenshire, &c. Part of the above-mentioned produce of the coast, viz., samphire, laver, oysters, turbot, &c., and some of the river fish, are sent to Bristol and the interior of England. The chief extraordinary imports are copper-ore and tin; potters' clay, flint, and chert, for the pottery at Swansea; iron-ore from Lancashire, to be blended with that of the county; and bricks. Glamorganshire is said not to produce sufficient grain to supply the consumption of its own inhabitants, whose number has so greatly increased in the manufacturing districts by emigration from the neighbouring counties, more especially those of Carmarthen and Cardigan; yet a considerable portion of the corn grown in the lower part of the Vale, for want of a direct line of communication with the populous but barren hilly district, is exported to Bristol, from which city it is often returned, in flour or malt, to Cardiff, to be forwarded to Merthyr by the Glamorganshire canal.

The principal rivers are the Tâf, the Tawe or Tawy, the Nêdd or Neath, the Llychwyr or Loughor, and the Rhymni or Romney: the banks of these, and of the numerous smaller streams of the mountains, are in most places distinguished for the picturesque grandeur or rich beauty of their scenery. The romantic Tâf is formed by the junction, on the northern border of the county, near Coedycummer, of two streams, called respectively the Tâf Vawr and the Tâf Vechan, the Greater and Lesser Tâf, which descend from the highest mountains of South Wales, the Beacons of Brecknockshire; and thence, taking a south-south-easterly direction, the river flows, two miles lower, through the town of Merthyr-Tydvil, and at Quaker's-yard, which is about twelve miles below Merthyr, is joined from the east by the mountain stream called the Bargoed Tâf; still lower, it is joined from the west by the Cynon, which descends from the parish of Penderin, in Brecknockshire; and a few miles further the Tâf is augmented, from the same side, by the united waters of the two Rhondas: hence, flowing nearly southward, it passes by Llandaf and Cardiff, and falls into the Bristol channel, through the inlet of Penarth, after a course of about thirty-three miles. This river is navigable for vessels of small burden to Cardiff, which is as far as the tide flows. Its stream, in dry weather, is very scanty; but, in case of sudden rains and thaws, the waters of this, as of the other mountain rivers, roll over their rocky bed in an impetuous and destructive torrent. The Tawy enters from Brecknockshire, a little below Ystradgynlais, and, taking first a south-westerly and then a southerly course, is joined from the west by the small but romantic streams of the Upper and the Lower Clydach, and empties itself into the bay of Swansea, at the town of that name, after a course of about twenty-five miles: this river is navigable for ships of considerable burden to a distance of two miles from its mouth, and for small sloops one mile further to Morriston, where the flow of the tide is checked by a weir. The Neath also descends from the mountains of Brecknockshire, and flows south-westward through one of the most picturesque and interesting valleys of South Wales: the principal of its tributary streams, some of which form beautiful cascades, is the Dulas, which joins it about three miles above the town of Neath; and from this junction, flowing nearly southward by that town, the Neath pursues its course to Swansea bay, into which it falls about four miles eastward of Swansea, after a course of nearly twenty-two miles: this river is navigable for vessels of about two hundred tons' burden as high as Neath bridge; but the chief resort of shipping upon it is Briton-Ferry, a little lower down. The Loughor, which has its source in the parish of Llandilo-Vawr, in Carmarthenshire, bounds this county for a considerable distance on the west, and falls into the creek of Loughor, near the ancient borough of that name: this inlet, spreading into a broad æstuary, soon, however, loses its name of Loughor, on being joined by a petty stream from Gower, called the Burry, from which it is designated the Burry river; and, sweeping round to the west, joins the bay of Carmarthen opposite to the projecting north-western extremity of Gower: this fine creek is navigable for small vessels up to the town of Loughor: the small stream of the Burry is noted for its trout. The Romney rises near the north-eastern extremity of the county, and, giving motion to the machinery of different coal and iron works, forms throughout its course the boundary between Glamorganshire and the English county of Monmouth: it flows in an irregular southerly direction, and falls into the Bristol channel through a small æstuary, a little north-eastward of Penarth harbour. The other principal streams are, the Elai, or Ely, which descends from the barren hills of the coal tract to the north of Llantrissant, afterwards flows south-eastward through the rich vale of Ely, or Dyfryn Miscoin, and, after a course of about twenty-one miles, contributes, with the Tâf, to form the safe and spacious harbour of Penarth; the Daw, or Dawon, celebrated for its trout, which flows, in a short course of nine miles, through Cowbridge to the sea at Aberthaw, and forms the small harbour of that place; the Ewenny, which has a similar course, from the coal tract north of Llanilid, through the flat vale of Coychurch, to the mouth of the Ogmore, near the ruins of Aber-Ogwr, or Ogmore Castle; the Ogmore, a large stream of remarkably soft water, which, rising among the mountains, flows southward through the town of Bridgend, and, after a course of about fifteen miles, being joined by the Ewenny, falls into the Bristol channel through a broad æstuary; and the Avan, or Avon, which descends from near the source of the Ogmore, and, after a course of about fifteen miles, falls into the channel at Aberavon: it is navigable for a short distance for vessels of small burden, trading to and from the Tai bâch, and other neighbouring metal works. Almost the only stream in Gower, besides the Burry, is the Penarth Pill, which falls into Oxwich bay.

The conveyance of the mineral productions of Glamorganshire to its different sea-ports is greatly facilitated by the canals and tram-roads by which various portions of it are traversed. Of the former, the oldest and the most important is the Glamorganshire canal, sometimes called the Cardiff canal, which was originally commenced, under the authority of an act of parliament, in 1791, and was opened in 1794, its formation having cost upwards of £100,000: it was subsequently extended under the provisions of a second act of parliament, and was completed in 1798. It extends a distance of twenty-six miles, through a mountainous and romantic country, and has a fall of no less than five hundred and seventy-six feet, by fifty locks, eighteen of which occur about the middle of its course, within the space of a mile. Here also it crosses the river Tâf by a handsome stone aqueduct, and is received into a spacious basin, surrounded by commodious wharfs, where the canal company's business is transacted, and their principal agent resides. On reaching Cardiff, it passes under the turnpike road to Newport through a tunnel of considerable length, emerging from which, at the distance of half a mile from its egress, it falls into a basin which communicates with the sea at Penarth Roads, by means of a tide lock, and admits vessels of two hundred and forty tons' burden, which ascend as high as the town of Cardiff, above which the canal is navigable only for barges of twenty-five tons' burden. At the basin, near the aqueduct above-mentioned, it is joined by a branch canal from Aberdare, completed in 1811, and seven miles long, with only two locks, which runs parallel with the river Cynon, and is joined at the Aberdare works, at its head, by a tram-road, six miles long, from the Hîrwaun works, on Hîrwaun common, within the confines of Brecknockshire: at this basin also terminates a tram-road from Dowlais and Merthyr, running parallel with the higher parts of the Glamorganshire canal, and constructed to obviate the delays which would otherwise be experienced in dry summers, owing to the want of a sufficient supply of water to maintain the navigation in these elevated regions. The Neath canal extends from the navigable channel of the river Neath at Briton-Ferry, north-eastward, up the valley of that river, to Aber Gwrelych, near Pont Nedd Vechan, on the confines of Brecknockshire, a distance of about thirteen miles, in which it has sixteen locks. It is connected by a rail-road with the Aberdare branch canal, and was originally constructed under an act of parliament obtained in 1791, and extended under another act passed in 1798: connected with it also are various railways of smaller extent than that above mentioned. The Swansea canal extends from the harbour of that town, up the valley of the Tawy, in a direction nearly north-by-east, to Pen Tawe, whence the communication is continued to Hên Neuadd, within the limits of Brecknockshire, by a short railway: the total length of this canal is about seventeen miles, in which it has a fall of three hundred and seventy-three feet, by means of thirty-six locks: it was completed and opened in 1798, and is navigable for barges of twenty-five tons' burden: the produce of the neighbouring mines is conveyed to its banks by means of numerous tram-roads, two of which are each about two miles in length: one of these branches from near Ynys Tawy to coal mines, and the other to coal mines and lime-works near Bryn Morgan. A portion, about a mile and a half in length, of that part of the canal nearest to Swansea is of older construction than the rest, having been cut by the Duke of Beaufort, who still receives the tolls of it. The small cut called the Penclawdd canal, in the northern part of Gower, constructed about the year 1812, was formerly the means of conveying excellent bituminous coal to vessels lying in the Burry river, but is now disused. The two following canals are private property, viz., the "First Neath Canal," "Briton Canal," or "Cremlyn Canal," now called the "Neath and Swansea Junction Canal," which was constructed about the year 1789, and forms an inland medium of communication between Briton-Ferry and Swansea, branching from the Neath canal at Aberdulas, crossing the river Neath by a handsome aqueduct of eleven arches, and extending a distance of nine miles without a single lock, except that by which it communicates with the eastern side of Swansea harbour, at a place called Port Tennant, from the name of the spirited individual by whom the whole was constructed, it being now the property of George Tennant, Esq.; and the "First Swansea Canal," or "Llansamlet Canal," which extends from the village of Foxhole above Swansea, on the eastern side of the river Tawy, to the collieries of Gwernllwynwydd, near Llansamlet

Besides the tram-roads, already noticed as connected with the canals, and the various branches diverging from them, the property of private individuals, there is one, five miles in length, which was formed at the commencement of the present century, connecting the limestone and marble quarries at the Mumbles with the port of Swansea. But that of the greatest public importance is the Dyfrynlynvi railway, which commences at Blaenllynvi, two miles above the Dyfrynlynvi iron-works, and terminates at the little harbour of Porthcawl, having a branch of five miles and a half from near Cevn Cribwr, about six miles from its termination, to the flourishing little market town of Bridgend: its total length, exclusively of the branch to Bridgend, is seventeen miles: it was constructed under the sanction of an act of parliament, and is the property of the Dyfrynlynvi Railway Company. Glamorganshire is also intersected by a great number of good common roads, which afford easy and convenient communication between the different towns and villages, but are of little comparative importance in a commercial point of view. The agriculturists of the lower part of the Vale are subject to considerable inconvenience from the want of good inland communication, in conveying to market the produce of this fertile tract; in consequence of which, the best markets of the county are chiefly supplied with Irish and other foreign grain, as farmers residing near an Irish outport can actually send their corn to the manufacturing district of which Merthyr is the centre more easily and at less expense than those about Aberthaw, St. Athan, Bonvilston, St. Donatt's, Gileston, Lantwit, Monkash, Penmark, &c. Although great improvements have been made in the roads, at very considerable expense, yet not one of the improved lines, with the exception of the New Mill road, are calculated to benefit the resident agriculturist, as they all extend in a direction from east to west, so that they afford no direct communication between the barren manufacturing district of the northern and the fertile agricultural tracts of the southern side of the county. The bridges presented no remarkable feature until about the middle of the last century, when the celebrated bridge over the Tâf, consisting of one arch of one hundred and forty feet in the span, called New Bridge, or Pont y Prydd, was at length completed, after two failures, by the self-taught architect, William Edwards, who, in conjunction with his son, afterwards built several others over the principal rivers of the county, all of which are distinguished for their beauty and excellence. The bridges are more numerous in this than in most other counties, chiefly on account of its greater commercial importance, and the abundance and excellence of materials for their construction. The road from London to Cardiff, which continues through Carmarthen to Haverfordwest, &c., enters from Monmouthshire at Romney bridge, and, running the entire length of the county from east to west, passes through Cardiff, Cowbridge, Aberavon, Neath, and Swansea, and quits it for Carmarthenshire at Pont ar Ddulas, on the river Loughor.

The remains of antiquity are very numerous and of great diversity of character. On a mountain towards the north-western extremity of the county is a circle of rude flat stones, in the centre of which is a kistvaen, or rude stone chest, about five feet long: this monument is called Carn llêchart. About two miles eastward from it, on a mountain called Mynydd y Gwryd, is another of the same class, consisting of three concentric circles of flat stones, the outermost of which is about twenty yards in diameter: in the centre of this also is a kistvaen, vulgarly called "the altar." On Drummau mountain, in the vicinity of Neath, are other Druidical remains, consisting of the relics of a large kistvaen, and a large stone fixed upright in the ground, which, being placed on the highest ridge of the hill, forms a conspicuous object from many parts of the surrounding country. Near Dyfryn House, about a mile south of the village of St. Nicholas, between Cardiff and Cowbridge, is one of the largest cromlechs in the kingdom, forming a rectangular oblong apartment, about seventeen feet in length and thirteen in width, the sides and ends of which consist of large flat stones placed upright in the ground, while the roof is formed by one large stone, twenty-four feet long, and varying in breadth from ten to seventeen feet: near the same place is a similar erection of much smaller dimensions, called Llêch y vilast, a name common to these monuments in various parts of Wales, but of unknown origin. Near St. Donatt's is one, called by the people of the neighbourhood "the Old Church;" on Rhôsilly Down, near the village of Tythegston, is one, called "Arthur's Stone;" and on Cevn Bryn, a mountain in Gower, one, the supporting stones of which are six in number, but of small dimensions, while the inclining stone, though not equal in superficial dimensions to that of the large cromlech near Dyfryn, is much thicker and heavier, and, notwithstanding that large portions have at different times been broken off, is still, probably, of about twenty tons' weight. On a hill above New House, to the north of Bridgend, is one of the largest and most ancient British encampments in South Wales. The chief Roman road which crossed this county, namely the Via Julia, or Julia Strata, is supposed to have entered it on the east, near the present bridge over the Romney, to the east of Cardiff, and to have passed through the vicinity of that town, and nearly in the line of the present western road to Ewenny, whence it ascended almost in a direct line to the Newton Downs, where some vestiges of it are still to be seen, and from which it proceeded, by Kenwig and Neath, across the western boundary of the county, near the station Leucarum, at Loughor. From this road branched several vicinal ways: the first of these, now called the Sarn hîr, from Cardiff, passed northward by Caerphilly, to which place its course has not yet been traced, but beyond which it may be seen running towards Pont yr Ystrad, on the river Romney, which it crosses into Monmouthshire in its further progress towards the great station of Caer Bannau, in Brecknockshire: the next, called the Sarn Helen, branched from the Via Julia at Neath, and, taking a north-easterly direction, may be traced from the border of the marshes above that town until it enters Brecknockshire, in its course to the great station in that county before mentioned: large portions of the latter remain entire. Besides these, an ancient road of unknown date, but in a state of excellent preservation, commencing at a large and strong encampment on the most elevated summit of the mountain of Mynydd y Gwair, called Pen Cae Clawdd, about twelve miles to the north of Swansea, passes first southward, and afterwards inclines a little westward until it joins the road from Swansea to Llandilo-Vawr in Carmarthenshire, which proceeds along it in a straight line for about two miles, beyond which, in the county of Carmarthen, it may again be traced singly. In the vicinity of this road, and on an eminence overlooking the western boundary of the county, called Pen Trêv Castell, is situated a very strong fort of earth and stones, of an oval shape, and the longest diameter of which is about one hundred yards. The principal Roman encampments are, a very strong one at the village of Caerau, about three miles west of Cardiff, which occupies the entire summit of a gentle eminence, and comprises about twelve acres; a smaller one, about three miles westward of this, near the village of St. Nicholas, called Caer Gaer; another small one, about two miles from Cowbridge, close to the common called the Golden Mile, near which is a tumulus, and besides which there are vestiges of another on the other side of the Golden Mile; another on the sea-coast, at a place called the Castle Ditches, about two miles east from Bonvilston; at the same distance from this again, another in a similar situation; and two small encampments, situated on a common about two miles eastward from Loughor. There are several tumuli, or barrows, in different parts of the county, of which those situated near the line of the Julia Strata, near Bonvilston, are more particularly worthy of mention. Roman coins have been found in different places, more especially at Pengwern, in the parish of Ilston, in Gower; at Cowbridge; in the vicinity of Bonvilston; near St. Athan; a few miles eastward from that village; and in the vicinity of Loughor; and various other minor relics of that people have been discovered at other places. On the surface of the mineral district are frequently found heaps of scoria, termed by the English "Roman cinders."

A Benedictine priory, a house of Grey friars, and another monastery at Cardiff, a monastery at Llancarvan, one at Lantwit-Major, and one at Llangennith, were destroyed long before the Reformation. At that period there were, at Margam, a Cistercian abbey; at Neath, a Cistercian abbey; and at Ewenny, a Benedictine cell. There are yet remains of the monasteries of Ewenny, Margam, and Neath, and of other monastic buildings at Lantwit-Major and near Llantrissant. Some of the more remarkable specimens of ancient ecclesiastical architecture are seen in the ruined cathedral of Llandaf, and in the churches of Ewenny; Llanblethian, near Cowbridge; Lantwit-Major, which, with its churchyard, contains numerous ancient monuments and tombstones; and Margam. The church of Aberdare is remarkable for the rustic simplicity of its architecture, and may be regarded as a characteristic specimen of the edifices of this class in the mountainous parts of the county. But this part of the principality is more particularly distinguished for its remains of the numerous fortresses, in some places very extensive, which its border situation rendered necessary for the protection of the Norman usurpers of the soil from the frequent incursions and revolts of the native population, during the early periods of the establishment of their dominion. Those of which the ruins are yet in existence are, Caerphilly castle; Castell Côch, or the Red castle, to the north of Llandaf; Cardiff castle; Coyty castle, about a mile to the north-east of Bridgend; Dinas-

Powis, or Dennis Powis castle, about two miles south of Michaelston-le-Pit; Kenfig castle; Llanblethian castle, near Cowbridge; Llandough castle, on the western bank of the small river Daw; Llantrissant castle; Loughor castle; Marcross castle, near St. Donatt's; Morlais castle, near Merthyr; Neath castle; Newcastle, at Bridgend; Ogmores castle, at the junction of the small rivers Ogmores and Ewenny; Oystermouth castle, in Swansea bay; Oxwich castle, in Oxwich bay; Penllyne castle, near Cowbridge; Penmark castle, near the village of Penmark; Penarth castle, near that of Oystermouth; Penrice castle, in Gower; St. Donatt's castle, on the sea-coast; Swansea castle; Talavan, or Tal y van castle, a few miles north of Cowbridge; Weobley castle, in Gower; and Wrinchstone castle, near the village of Wenvoe. There are also small remains of ancient fortresses at Peterston super Ely, and St. George's, both near the banks of the river Ely, and near the village of St. Athan. The ruins of the castles of Caerphilly and Coyty, more particularly the former, are among the most extensive and magnificent in the island. The ancient mansion-houses are very numerous, but most of them have been either deserted or converted into farm-houses: among those still inhabited are, Aberpergwm, the seat of William Williams, Esq.; Cevnmabwy, that of C. K. K. Tynte, Esq.; Dyfryn, that of the Hon. Booth Grey; Dyfryn Clydach, that of Mrs. Williams; Vonmon castle, that of Robert Jones, Esq.; the Gnoll, that of Henry Grant, Esq.; Hênsol, that of Richard Crawshay, Esq.; and Lland-Dav, or Llandough, Castle, that of Lieutenant-Colonel Morgan: there are also remains of the ancient castellated mansion of the bishops at Llandaf, and of a castellated mansion at St. Fagan's, near that place. Among the antiquities of this county may likewise be enumerated a considerable number of very old and spacious barns, many of which are of peculiar construction. The principal modern seats of the nobility and gentry are, Briton Ferry, that of the Earl of Jersey; Coedriglan, that of the Rev. John M. Traherne; Cowityrala, that of T. B. Rous, Esq.; Coytrehene, that of Morgan Popkin Traherne, Esq.; Cyvarthva Castle, that of Richard Crawshay, Esq.; Dunraven Castle, that of the Earl of Dunraven and Mountearl; Ewenny Abbey, that of Richard Turberville Turberville, Esq.; Green Meadow, that of Wyndham Lewis, Esq.; Llan-haren, that of Richard Hoare Jenkins, Esq.; the magnificent mansion of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq., now in progress of erection in Margam Park; Penllergare, the seat of L. W. Dilwyn, Esq.; Penrice, that of C. R. Mansel Talbot, Esq.; Rheola, the elegant seat of John Edwards Vaughan, Esq.; Singleton, the residence of J. H. Vivian, Esq.; Sketty Park, that of Sir John Morris, Bart.; Stout Hall, that of John Lucas, Esq.; and Wenvoe Castle, that of R. F. Jenner, Esq. The farm-houses and offices throughout the county are in general good and commodious, and substantially built of stone, and roofed sometimes with thatch, and sometimes with the stone tiles of the country; but the out-buildings are smaller and fewer than in most other districts. The cottages are also built in the same substantial style, and are remarkable for their commodiousness and comfort: they are almost universally thatched with wheat straw, with uncommon neatness, and many exhibit features of great antiquity. In situations where they can be conveniently procured, fern, rushes, sea-reeds, and broom are occasionally used for thatching them; but their most striking peculiarity is their being universally white-washed, externally and internally, as are also the walls of gardens, &c.: this custom of white-washing has distinguished the people of Glamorgan from all antiquity, being often adverted to by the ancient Welsh bards, and the light and pleasing appearance of these habitations is still further increased by their generally having the appendage of a garden, and by their walls being also frequently shaded by fruit-trees, sweet-briar, privet, or jessamine: when situated on the side of a hill, they frequently have a remarkably picturesque appearance. Some of the meanest cottages are found among the mountains. Stiles of stone and mortar are very common in the Vale and in Gower. The common bread of many of the inhabitants consists of the white wheat of the Vale, ground and kneaded, without the bran being separated from the flour. The household fare of the agricultural labourers is generally very good; and, in the lower part of the Vale, the men employed to cut the corn have the privilege of renting out the gleanings, or leasing, on the wheat stubbles, for which they get more per acre than they are paid for reaping. Ancient Welsh names, though common throughout the principality, appear to be more prevalent in this than in any other county. Among those of early British note still used promiscuously as christian names, or as surnames, are those of Owain, Madoc, Caradoc, Hywel, Rees or Rhys, Llewelyn, Arthur, Cadwgan, Gruffydd, Morgan, Llywarch, Ivor, Tudor, Taliessin, Merlin, Meredydd, Traherne, Cadwaladr, &c. The ancient Welsh custom for the son to take for his surname the christian name of his father is much more commonly retained in the mountains of Glamorganshire, and of the adjoining counties of Brecknock and Monmouth, than in any other part of Wales. The only mineral spring of any celebrity, or at all resorted to, is that called Fynnon Tâf, situated on the river Tâf, a few miles above Cardiff, on the road from that town to Merthyr-Tydvil, the water of which is tepid, and is successfully applied in relieving rheumatic complaints: there are, however, chalybeate or sulphureous springs at Swansea, Llandyvodog, Llantrissant, and other places in the coal district. In the calcareous rocks along the coast the waves have worn many large and magnificent caverns, ornamented with stalactites and crystallized spars of great beauty, in which rise several intermitting springs. In the Vale of Neath are two beautiful waterfalls, one at the village of Aberdulas, near Cadoxton, and the other some miles higher, at Melin Court.

GLÂSBURY, a parish, partly in the hundred of TALGARH, county of BRECKNOCK, and partly in that of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, comprising the hamlets of Pipton and Velindre with Trêgoed, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 1452 inhabitants, of which number, 848 are in the main portion of the parish, included within the limits of Radnorshire, and 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Hay, on the road to Brecknock. The mesne manor of Glâsbury formerly belonged to the Clifford family, by exchange with the monks of Gloucester in 1144, afterwards to the Giffards, and accompanied the possession of Bronllys castle, until it became vested in the crown, when it was granted to Sir David Williams. In the 5th of Henry VIII., Richard

Cornwall and Ralph Hakluyt, Esqrs., were appointed seneschals of the manor during their lives. It is now in the possession of Thomas Wood, of Littleton, in the county of Middlesex, Esq., in right of his wife, Mary, the daughter and, by the decease of her brother, heiress of the late Sir Edward Williams, Bart. The parish is intersected by the river Wye, the banks of which here exhibit some of the most picturesque and luxuriant scenery in South Wales, or in the kingdom: its stream glides smoothly along through rich meadows, or occasionally ripples over its pebbly bed, and the circumjacent hills, rising to a considerable height, are singularly diversified in form and aspect, and pleasingly varied with thick groves and cultivated fields; while the entire scene is enlivened and embellished with numerous elegant villas and genteel houses, among which rises conspicuously Maeslwch, or Maeslough, Castle, the princely residence of Walter Wilkins, Esq., the erection of which was commenced in 1829, by his late father, from a design by Mr. Lugar, of Great Marlborough-street, London. It is a beautiful specimen of the Norman and later English styles of castellated architecture, exhibiting, to the south, a rustic embattled front, upwards of two hundred and fifty feet in length: the principal tower, which is circular, is at the north-eastern angle: at the west end are the family apartments, flanked by four towers of unequal dimensions, alternately round and octagonal: in the centre rises a lantern, under which is the principal entrance. The carriage entrance is on the northern side, under a magnificent Norman porch, opening by a vestibule into the great hall: the portion appropriated to the servants, situated to the east of and somewhat lower than the family apartments, is terminated by two square towers, from which extends a long wall, perforated with embrasures, at the extremity of which is an elegant little building, resembling a chapel. From the terrace in front a beautiful lawn declines to the water's edge, commanding much of the richly varied scenery which here adorns the banks of the river; and at the back rises an eminence, wooded to its very summit. Some of the finest prospects in the vale are obtained from Pen y Lan, the seat of the late Thomas Walbeoffe, Esq., post-captain in the royal navy, looking downward from which are seen the wooden bridge at Glâsbury, surrounded by the most beautiful natural objects: much of the wood which adorns the scene consists of apple, pear, and cherry trees, which, when in blossom, form features of great beauty and richness; the view upwards, consisting of a long reach of the Wye, the village of Llŷswen, and the abrupt ascent to Craiglai, with the lofty Brecknockshire Beacons in the back ground, is of a different character, but equally interesting. Tre'r Coed, corruptly Tregoe, the seat of Viscount Hereford, is situated within the parish, but has no claim to particular description. The soil on the banks of the Wye, at this place, is perhaps the richest in the county, and is appropriated to feeding vast numbers of cattle and sheep for the markets of Brecknock and Hay; but to the south there are no pastures, all the land being devoted to tillage: this part of it is terminated by barren mountains. The system of husbandry practised in the low lands is exceedingly good, no where excelled in this part of the principality. The bridge across the Wye has been rebuilt at different periods: the first, which was of wood, fell in 1738, and was succeeded by a similar structure, which stood about forty years; a beautiful stone bridge was then built, in 1777, which was swept away by a flood in February 1795, in consequence of some defect in the foundations, and the present wooden bridge was erected in 1800: it is supported at each end by a stone pier, with thirteen intervening wooden tressels. That part of the parish which is situated on the southern bank of the Wye is principally in Brecknockshire, though a considerable extent of ground on this side of the river forms part of the county of Radnor. The village is situated on the northern bank of the Wye, being separated by the river and by the turnpike road from the church, which is about a quarter of a mile distant. The Radnorshire portion of the parish, forming the chief body of it, is usually distinguished from its Brecknockshire hamlets of Velindre with Tregoed, and Pipton, as "Glásbury Radnorshire," the rest being designated "Glásbury Brecknockshire." About sixty persons are here employed in an extensive establishment for sorting wool: the windows of all the apartments in which this apparently simple operation is carried on open to the north, to avoid too strong a light; and the different qualities are appropriated, according to the staple, to the uses of the clothier, hosier, hatter, &c. The railroad from Hay to Brecknock passes through the parish. The petty sessions for the hundred of Talgarth are held here.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Gloucester, as owner of the impropriate rectory: the advowson was granted to the monks of Gloucester by Bernard Newmarch, the Norman conqueror of Brecknock, and since the dissolution has been possessed by the bishops. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, and situated upon a steep bank on the southern side of the road leading to Hay, consists only of a nave and chancel, with a heavy western tower, containing six bells: the contract for its erection was entered into in 1662, and the edifice was probably completed in 1665, as the first interment there took place on the 30th of July, in that year: both it and the ancient structure which it replaced were built in that part of Radnorshire which lies on the southern bank of the river: the site of the latter, near where the Llyvni, or Llynvi, falls into the Wye, is marked by a few old thorn trees: it is supposed to have been originally situated on the northern side of the river, and to have been separated from the village by a change in the course of the Wye. There was formerly a chapel at Velindre, which fell into decay about the middle of the last century. There are three places of worship for dissenters, namely, one for Baptists at Penyrheol, near the Black Mountain, one for Independents at Velindre, and one for Wesleyan Methodists close by Woodlands. In the churchyard is a neat Sunday school-room, built in 1824, by subscription; and a short distance beyond the limits of the cemetery stands a respectable building, surmounted with a small cupola and vane, and comprising a schoolmaster's residence, together with a spacious school-room, which latter was erected in 1816, at the sole expense of the late Miss Bridget Hughes, of Glásbury

House, at a cost of £210: the schoolmaster's house was erected subsequently by voluntary contributions, amounting to £179, of which Sir Charles Morgan, Bart., contributed £80, on a site granted, together with about a quarter of an acre of garden ground, by Colonel Wood, the present parliamentary representative for the county. The school is supported by annual subscriptions: the master's salary is £40, and the number of his pupils is from sixty to eighty: this establishment is connected with the parent society in London, which granted £40 in aid of its funds. There are divers small benefactions for charitable purposes. Walter Meredith, citizen of London, by will dated March 26th, 1605, bequeathed a rent-charge of £4 upon a house in Fleet-street, of which, the land-tax being deducted, the sum of £3. 4. is paid annually, alternately to six aged and eight young persons, of both sexes: the object of its being bestowed on the latter is to fit them out for service. Sir David Williams, Knt., in 1612, bequeathed the tithes of the parish of Gwenddwr, directing the profits to be annually applied in the following manner; namely, four pounds towards repairing Glásbury bridge, ten shillings for an annual sermon, thirty shillings to be bestowed in bread among the poor of Glásbury, twenty shillings towards repairing the road from Velindre to Tyle-glás; ten shillings for a sermon on the anniversary of the testator's funeral, to be preached in St. John's church at Brecknock, and forty shillings in bread to the poor; ten shillings for a sermon on Whit-Sunday at Ystradvellte, thirty shillings in bread to the poor of Aberllyvni and Velindre, and five pounds to the distressed poor near Gwernyveth, either in food or clothing; all which sums have been augmented, in proportion to the increased value of the tithes, that appropriated to the repair of Glásbury bridge now amounting to £16. 8., and that to the poor of this parish to £6. 3. 6. John Havard, of Tregoed, Gent., in 1728, gave £10 for the poor of Bronllys and Glásbury; John Lewis, described on his tombstone as an "honest lawyer," bequeathed £30 to the poor of this parish; Mrs. Sybil Williams, of Trêvithel, in 1761, gave twenty shillings a year to be distributed among the poor of Pipton; and Mrs. Seagood gave £100 for the benefit of the poor of the entire parish, now vested in the public funds, and producing £3. 11. 11. per annum. On an eminence to the south-west of the church are some intrenchments, which formerly surrounded a British camp, called the Gaer. Of the ancient mansion of the Solers family there are no remains, but a farmhouse and a few cottages near its site are still called Pente Solers, or Solerville. Sir Humphrey Solers, the founder of the family at this place, was one of the Norman knights who accompanied Bernard Newmarch in his successful expedition: having settled here, he acquired large possessions, which his descendants continued to enjoy until the middle of the seventeenth century. The next distinguished residents in point of antiquity were the Powells, descended from Rhys Gôch, of Ystrad-iw, one of whom came from Glamorganshire in the fourteenth or fifteenth century, and was married to Joan, daughter and heiress of Tyle-glás. A singular instance of the ferocity of one of the female descendants of the Vaughan family is preserved in an old M.S. pedigree:—"Ellen Gethin (or the terrible) of Hergest, a devilish woman, was cousin-german to John hîr ab Philip Vychan, who was killed by the said Ellen at St. David's church, for that he before killed her brother, David Vaughan, at Llynwent in Llanbister, Radnorshire." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £649. 5., of which sum, £357. 17. is raised on the Brecknockshire, and £291. 8. on the Radnorshire, portion of the parish.

GLÂSCOMB, or GLÂSCWM (GLÂS-GWM), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (E.) from Builth, on the road to Kington, comprising the joint township of Drewern and Vainor, and containing 514 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the west by the river Edw, or Edwy, famous for its trout, comprises an area of about five thousand acres, of which three thousand are enclosed, and the remainder waste, being applied only to the pasturage of sheep, of which great numbers are fed upon it. The surface is for the most part hilly, and the soil rather barren: some parts are adorned with wood, and present an agreeable contrast to the barren mountains that surround them. In the village stands Glâscomb Court, the picturesque residence of Samuel Bevan, Esq., who, having succeeded by marriage to the considerable estates of the late — Lucas, Esq., in this district, has greatly exerted himself in the embellishment of the neighbourhood: the village and mansion are situated at the extremity of a little dingle, in a verdant spot planted with evergreens, from which circumstance they have derived their present appellation, signifying literally "the green dingle:" the whole, as it bursts suddenly upon the view, after climbing an arduous ascent, has almost the effect of enchantment, contrasted with the dreary and naked steepes of the surrounding mountains. The living is a vicarage, with Colva and Rulên consolidated, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £13. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's, as owner of the impropriate rectory. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a large plain edifice, having little pretension to architectural character, and consisting of a nave and chancel, without either tower or spire, but possessing two bells: the entire length of the edifice is one hundred feet, of which the chancel forms precisely one-third: the windows of the chancel are in the later style of English architecture. Under the communion table is a stone coffin, found in repairing the church: the inhabitants of Colva and Rulên, prior to the erection of their respective chapels, had their appropriate seats on each side of the altar. Giraldus Cambrensis relates an absurd story concerning the miraculous powers of a portable bell, then preserved in this church. There is a place of worship for Baptists, under the patronage of Samuel Bevan, Esq. John Evans, in 1640, bequeathed £40, and David Davies, in 1777, left £60, for the benefit of the poor not receiving parochial relief: these sums are now deposited in the hands of Samuel Bevan, Esq., who, besides their annual interest of £5, pays to the parish a rent-charge of £1, out of the estate of Cwm-mawr, situated within its limits: some other benefactions have also been made, but are now lost. The parish contains several interesting remains of antiquity, but no historical notice of them has been preserved. Among these are four large erect stones, situated at a place called the Little Hill, and stated by tradition to have been erected in commemoration of some great battle fought near this spot.

On the banks of the Edwy, just within the western confines of the parish, are the vestiges of a small fortification, which once probably constituted a castle of some of the British or Norman lords of the surrounding territory: they comprise an area of about half an acre, defended by a rampart nearly perfect, to the north-west of which is a moated tumulus, on which probably stood the keep; and adjoining to this, within the enclosed area, is a moderately elevated piece of ground, which may have formed the site of the inner road: just without the enclosure is a large erect stone, which, together with another now removed, is supposed to have been raised in commemoration of some conflict. Near the source of the river Edwy, in the higher part of the parish, are two remarkable mineral springs, called Blaen-Edwy Wells, situated on the property of the Right Hon. Thomas Frankton Lewis; and adjacent is a respectable house, capable of accommodating about twenty visitors, with a small cold bath attached: the waters of these springs have both the same properties, being strongly impregnated with sulphur, and highly efficacious in the cure of cutaneous diseases. They have been much frequented, but the scarcity of lodgings, and the dreary and uninviting character of the surrounding scenery, operate powerfully to retard their rising importance. They continue, however, to sustain the highest reputation, and are eagerly resorted to by those patients whose habits and circumstances render retirement and economy desirable. In 1806, a shepherd boy observing something glittering in a newly formed molehill, on an eminence to the north of the village, carried it to his master, who, recognising its value, made a search on the spot, and discovered a number of gold and silver coins of a few preceding reigns, sufficient to purchase a small farm, which he still lives to enjoy. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £507. 7.

GLYN, a chapelry in the parish and hundred of DEVYNOC, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Brecknock, containing 351 inhabitants. It is situated on the western declivity of elevated ground, to the south of Pen Pont Park, near the source of the Camlas brook, and on the left bank of the river Tarrell. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Devynock. The chapel is dedicated to St. Illtyd, and sometimes gives the name of Llan Illtyd to this division of the parish. On an adjoining eminence, near a pool, are two large stones, placed six feet asunder, at each end of a small tumulus, which is called Bedd Gwyl Illtyd, or "The Grave of St. Illtyd's Eve," from the ancient custom of watching there on the eve of the festival of that saint, who was supposed to have been buried here. A separate assessment for the support of the poor is made for this chapelry, the average annual expenditure amounting to £72. 5.

GLYN, a hamlet in the parish of LLANELLY, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4½ miles (N. N. W.) from Llanelly, containing 765 inhabitants. It is situated at the western declivity of the Mynydd Sulien mountain; and the old rail-road from the coal-pits at the Mynydd Mawr mountain to Llanelly passes in the vicinity. Coal abounds also in this district.

GLYN, a hamlet in the parish of LLANNON, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (S. E. by S.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. A branch of the Gwendraeth-Vawr river passes through the hamlet, the inhabitants of which are chiefly engaged in agriculture.

The population is included in the return for the parish. The river Cothy flows through this hamlet in a pleasing and well-wooded vale. It is conjointly assessed with Edwinsford for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure being £162. 11.

GLYN, a hamlet in the parish of LLANGENDEIRN, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. A branch of the Gwendraeth-Vâch flows through this township, which forms the western portion of the parish. The mansion of Glyn Abbey is supposed to have been formerly a monastery; but, in consequence of various alterations, no traces of such a building are now discernible.

GLYN-AMAN (GLYN-AMWYN), a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $8\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S. E.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 227 inhabitants. It is situated among the Black mountains; and the river Aman flows through it, forming in one part of its course the boundary line between Carmarthenshire and Glamorganshire. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £40. 2.

GLYNCAERYG (GLYN-CAERIG), a township in the parish of LLANWRIN, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. N. E.) from Machynlleth. The population is returned with the township of Llanwrin. This place forms the south-western portion of the parish, and is situated on the right bank of the Dovey, near the confluence of two streams, each called Dulas, which meet here from opposite directions, and join that river. A winding and beautifully romantic valley, through which one of these streams flows, and separates this township from Merionethshire, commences here. This river has a great variety of character, presenting at intervals foaming cascades and tranquil pools, and is enclosed between lofty and partially wooded precipices, at the foot of which passes the road from Machynlleth to Dôlgelley, along the left bank of the river. The road from the former town to Dinasmowddwy also proceeds through the vale of the Dovey, which here exhibits some cheerful corn-fields and meadows, and verdant hills.

GLYN-COLLWYN, a chapelry in the parish of LLANVIGAN, hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (S. S. E.) from Brecknock, containing 274 inhabitants. This place, of which the name signifies "the glen of hazel wood," is pleasantly situated on the upper part of the small river Carvanell, which falls into the Usk at Tal y Bont. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Llanvigan. A cairn in this chapelry was opened within the last thirty years by a person named Twm Bach, who came to this place from North Wales, in the hope of finding treasure, to which he is said to have been prompted by the perusal of some ancient Welsh verses. In the prosecution of his search a large kist was found, in which were various antiquities, but none of them have been preserved; as the finder, disappointed in his expectations of a different kind of treasure, sold them to an itinerant Jew.

GLYNCONNON (GLYN-CYNON), a hamlet in the parish of LLANWONNO, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 415 inhabitants. The Pont Cynon aqueduct, which conveys the Cardiff canal over the river Tâf, is situated at the eastern extremity of this hamlet, near where the Aberdare canal joins the former at Navigation House; and here also both the canal and the Tâf are crossed by the road from Cardiff to Aberdare, which proceeds through the vale of the Cynon, overhung in many places with majestic oaks, and other lofty trees, and which, after crossing the river by an alpine bridge, enters the parish of Aberdare. There are numerous pleasing and ornamental residences in different places, especially in that portion of the hamlet which overlooks the valleys of the Tâf and the Cynon, the former bounding it on the east, and the latter on the north-east.

GLYN-CORWG, a parish in the hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, consisting of the chapelry of Blaen-Gwrach, and the hamlet of Glyn-Corwg, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 547 inhabitants, of which number, 133 are in the hamlet of Glyn-Corwg, 8 miles (N. by E.) from Neath. This parish, which is very extensive, including a wild and mountainous region of about twelve thousand acres, derives its name from the small river Corwg, which, after flowing through a portion of it, falls into the Avon. It comprises some of the highest mountains in Glamorganshire, and the picturesque aspect of its surface is greatly increased by woods and numerous projecting crags. In Blaen-Gwrach, through which flows the Neath river, is a lake called Llŷn-bâch, nearly a mile in circumference; and the entire parish contains an abundance of fine springs, and is watered by numerous brooks: in Blaen-Gwrach is also Ynys-lâs Cottage, a seat of the Earl of Dumraven. The soil is various, that of the mountains being peaty, and in some places of an argillaceous texture. The portion of arable land is comparatively small; and the species of grain cultivated upon it are chiefly barley and oats, little wheat being grown except near the river Neath: the more extensive mountainous districts are appropriated to the pasturage of sheep and young cattle during summer. In the mountains are found strata of bituminous coal, and in the lower portions of the parish, near the Vale of Neath, some of stone coal and culm, from two to fifteen feet in thickness: these species of fuel are now worked, and exported in large quantities by means of the Neath canal. Iron-ore is also found, and is now worked in the Blaen-Gwrach portion of the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Blaen-Gwrach annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. E. Thomas, by whom it has been lately purchased from the Earl of Jersey. The church, situated in the hamlet of Glyn-Corwg, is dedicated to St. John the Baptist; and in the churchyard are some remarkably fine yew trees, one of which measures thirty feet four inches in girth. Upon the summit of Craig y Llŷn, in this parish, is Carn Moesen, a tumulus of loose stones, marking out a spot which is reputed the most elevated point in the county of Glamorgan; and not far distant from this is Llŷn Mawr, a large pool nearly a mile in circumference. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £207. 1., of which sum, £46. 4. is raised for the hamlet of Glyn-Corwg.

GLYN-RUMNEY (GLYN-RHYMNI), a hamlet in the parish of LLANVABON, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Caerphilly, containing 276 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the river Romney, over which is the bridge of Pontystrad, leading into Monmouthshire. The road from Caerphilly to Merthyr-Tydvil passes through a vale, parallel with the river, the steep sides of which are well wooded, and are adorned in different places with a few respectable and agreeable residences.

GLYN-TÂF, a hamlet in the parish of EGLWYSILAN, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, comprising the greater part of the extensive and populous village of Newbridge, and containing 635 inhabitants. It is situated on the left bank of the river Taf, where it is joined by the Rhondda, and affords very fine views up the vale of the latter. The road from Cardiff to Merthyr-Tydvil proceeds here between the river Taf and the Cardiff canal, and within a few yards of both. The bridge called Pont y Prydd, celebrated for the singularity of its architecture, crosses the steep banks of the river Taf at this place, near the village of Newbridge.

GLYNTAWE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES.—See CAPEL-CALLWEN.

GLYN-TRAIAN, one of the principal divisions of the parish of LLANGOLLEN, Nant heudwy division of the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (W.) from Llangollen, containing 868 inhabitants. It forms the upper part of this picturesque parish, where the mountains are high and bold, while the river Dee winds at their feet in such an irregular course, as to make the landscape assume a fresh appearance of pleasing and diversified beauty at every turn, which is more fully described in the account of the parish. Several agreeable residences are scattered over the district, which shares in divers charitable bequests for the benefit of the poor of the whole parish. It is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure being £415. 10.

GLYNTRÊVNANT (GLYN TRÊV NANT), a township in the parish of TRÊVEGLWYS, upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Llanidloes. The population is returned with the parish. It takes its name from the junction of three streams, which form the river Trêvnant: the church is situated here.

GLYNVÂCH (GLYNN-VÂCH), a hamlet in the parish of LLANIGON, hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S. by E.) from Hay, containing 67 inhabitants. This place, the name of which signifies "the little glen," forms the south-eastern part of the parish, and comprises a small valley among the Black Mountains of Talgarth, near the spot where the three counties of Brecknock, Hereford, and Monmouth, unite. From the circumstance of its peculiar situation most probably originated that long disputed question respecting the local situation of the chapel in this hamlet, called Capel y fin, or the "chapel of the boundary," which was argued at length in the Ecclesiastical Court, in the year 1708, and was ultimately decided in favour of its being within this parish, to which all the witnesses concurred in stating it to have been originally a chapel of ease, and of which the vicar was accordingly enjoined to perform the duties either in person or by his curate. In the narrow rocky vale which forms the chief portion of the hamlet some corn is grown, but the lands are chiefly devoted to the pasturage of young cattle and sheep. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied and in many parts highly picturesque. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The chapel has been rebuilt within the last ten years, at the expense of the parishioners, and is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. The hamlet is separately assessed for the support of its own poor, the average annual expenditure for which purpose amounts to £38. 14.

GODWIDD (GORWYDD), a township in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, upper division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E. by E.) from Lampeter, containing 610 inhabitants. This is the most populous township of the parish, containing the town of Llandewy-Brevi, with its church, and occupying the vale through which the stream, on which that town is situated flows into the Teivi, as well as the lofty mountain protecting it on the north and east. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £115. 3.

GOLLON, or GEULAN, a joint township with Cevnpawl, forming that part of the parish of ABBEY CWM HIR which is in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. E.) from Rhaiadr, containing, exclusively of Cevnpawl, 364 inhabitants. A small plot of land was bequeathed by the Rev. Robert Barlow, in 1610, for the benefit of the poor of this place.

GOLVTYN, a township in the parish of NORTHOP, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Flint, containing 289 inhabitants. In Domesday-book this township was called Ulfmilstone. It is situated on the æstuary of the Dee, near the mouth of the new channel for that river, which was cut through the sands from Chester, and extends over a large portion of these sands, which are dry at low water, and capable of being brought into cultivation at a moderate expense. A large quay and pier were constructed here, some years since, by the Irish Coal Company, from which vessels sail regularly for Liverpool, London, Dublin, and the ports of North and South Wales. Considerable employment in the fishery being afforded to the inhabitants, the population has latterly increased. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Golytyn was formerly assessed with Weppre for the maintenance of the poor.

GORYCOED (TOR Y COED), a joint hamlet with Kilarw, in the parish of LLANGENDEIRN, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. The name signifies the extremity of the wood, from which it may be inferred that the neighbourhood formerly abounded with timber.

GOURTON, a township in that part of the parish of WREXHAM which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. N. E.) from Wrexham, containing 41 inhabitants. This township is situated on the road between Holt and Wrexham, and consists of the respectable mansion of Gourton Hall and a few farms. It is separately assessed for the support of its poor, pursuant to an arrangement made in March 1830.

GOYTRE (COED-TRËV), a hamlet in the parish of LLANNON, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (S. E.) from Carmarthen, containing 315 inhabitants. It forms the south-western portion of the parish, and contains about three thousand acres.

GRAIG (CRAIG), a joint township with Swydd, in the parish of LLANDEGLAY, hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $9\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Rhaiadr. The population is returned with Swydd. In this township is Cevn Craig, a very elevated mountain, rising two thousand one hundred and sixty-three feet above the level of the sea, within a recess of which, at its southern base, are the Llandeglay wells, so celebrated for their medicinal properties. The road from New Radnor to Rhaiadr passes near the base of the mountain, which formed part of the ancient forest of Radnor, and within less than half a mile of the wells.

GRANSTON, a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Fishguard, containing 195 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the north-western part of the county, and within a short distance of the coast of St. George's channel: it is intersected by the turnpike road leading from Fishguard to St. David's, and is watered by a small stream, which, after flowing through it, falls into the sea near Aberbach. The surrounding scenery is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, though from the higher grounds some good views are obtained over the channel and the adjacent country. Tregwynt, the ancient mansion of the family of Harries, a branch of that seated at Priskilly, is within this parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to that of Mathrey, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 8.  $11\frac{1}{2}$ , and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Catherine, is a plain edifice, not claiming notice for any peculiarity of architecture: it contains several good mural tablets, erected to the memory of some members of the Priskilly family, of whom several were interred here. There is a large place of worship for Baptists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £67. 10.

GREENFIELD, a township in the parish, and partly within the limits of the newly-created borough, of HOLYWELL, in the Holywell division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{4}$  mile (N. E.) from Holywell. The population is included in the return for the parish. Here is an ancient mansion of the Mostyns, now occupied by the Parys Copper mine Company, who possess extensive works on the small stream which falls into the æstuary of the Dee, on which there are other extensive establishments, consisting chiefly of mills for the manufacture of cotton twist, an account of which is given in the article on the parish. In this township is also included the celebrated mine called the Holywell Level; and within its limits are situated the ruins of the ancient abbey of Basingwerk, near which runs the ancient line of demarcation called Wat's Dyke.

GRESFORD, a parish partly in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, and partly in that of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. E.) from Wrexham, comprising the lordship of Merford and Hoseley, which supports its poor by a separate assessment, and containing 3849 inhabitants. This parish is supposed to have derived its name, anciently Croes-fordd, or "the road to the cross," from its situation near an ancient cross, within half a mile to the south of the present church, of which the shaft is still remaining. It is very extensive, comprising upwards of twelve thousand acres; and the village is delightfully situated on the western side of the road from Wrexham to Chester, near the head of a beautiful valley, which opens into the Vale Royal of Cheshire, a tract of country remarkable for the richness of its soil, the beauty of its scenery, and the pleasingly diversified views which it presents. The little vale of Gresford is one of the most lovely in the principality, abounding with pleasing and interesting objects, enlivened by the meanderings of the river Alyn through its meadows, and finely varied with richly wooded eminences, on one of which stands conspicuously its beautiful church, remarkable for the elegance of its architecture and its picturesque appearance; the plantations and pleasure grounds attached to the elegant villas and rural mansions which are scattered throughout this small but romantic dell combine, with the natural beauties of its scenery, to render it in every respect one of the most interesting and attractive spots in this part of the country. Fairs for cattle are held on the second Monday in April, the last Monday in August, Easter Monday, June 24th, August 21st, and October 22nd. Deeply sheltered in the vale is Gresford Lodge, the seat of Mrs. W. Egerton, a stately and elegant mansion, designed by Sir Jeffrey Wyatville, and one of the most tasteful and highly finished edifices erected by this distinguished architect. In this parish are also, Erddig, the seat of S. Yorke, Esq., situated in a detached portion of it, the grounds of which are disposed with great taste, and are beautifully adorned with wood; Gwersylt Park, that of John Williams, Esq.; Trêvalyn Hall, the ancient mansion of the Trevors; Trêvalyn House; and several other mansions. It is bounded on the east by the Dee, and is intersected by the Alyn, a tributary of that river: on the banks of these streams and of the Pulford brook are extensive but not very rich tracts of meadow, which are frequently flooded: the soil is tolerably good. Coal is found within the parish, and mines are worked to a considerable extent in Gwersylt township, where are also some mills for drawing wire, which afford employment to a small number of persons.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £21. 2. 3½., endowed with five-sixteenths of the great tithes, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a spacious and elegant structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower, of fine proportions, and richly ornamented on the summit with the figures of the twelve apostles, alternated with crocketed pinnacles, and in the south-west angle with an elaborately enriched ogee canopy, surmounting a niche of beautiful design, in which is a statue of Henry VII. The interior consists of a nave, chancel, and north and south aisles, the roofs of which are of oak, panelled, and profusely ornamented with fruit and flowers exquisitely carved: the ancient rood-loft screen, which is of very superior workmanship, is still remaining entire, and separates the nave from the chancel; in the latter are twelve ancient stalls of oak richly carved. In the north aisle is a beautiful niche, surmounted by an enriched canopy, and in the south aisle a piscina of elegant design: in several of the windows are some fine remains of ancient stained glass. Under an arch in the north aisle is an ancient stone coffin, on the lid of which is a shield charged with armorial bearings, round which is inscribed Hic jacet Gronow ap Iorworth ap Dafydd, &c., with the date 1321; and under a flat arch in the south aisle is an altar-tomb, with a recumbent effigy clothed in chain mail, supposed to be that of Madoc ab Llewelyn ab Gruffydd. There are several monuments to the family of Trevor of Trêvalyn, one of which, erected in 1638, during his lifetime, is to the memory of Sir Richard Trevor and his wife Catherine, who are represented in a kneeling posture: the inscription records that he served thirty years in the wars in Ireland, and was governor of Newry, the counties of Down and Armagh, and vice-admiral of North Wales, and that he lived to see his great grandchildren. In the chancel are, a monument by Westmacott to the memory of J. Parry, Esq., late M. P. for the county of Carnarvon; and a white marble tablet to the memory of William Egerton, Esq., with a bust of this gentleman, finely executed by Chantrey. There was formerly a chapel of ease at Allington, but no vestiges of it are now discernible, except the cemetery. At Gwersylt is a place of worship for Baptists; at Allington, one for Calvinistic Methodists; and at Merford, one for Wesleyan Methodists.

Dame Margaret Strode, widow of Sir George Strode, of the Inner Temple, London, by will in 1715, gave £500 in trust to the Bishop of St. Asaph and others, for the purchase of lands, the produce of which was to be appropriated to clothing and instructing three poor boys and three poor girls of this parish, and, if the funds would suffice, to apprenticing them to masters and mistresses of the church of England. Of this sum, £450 was vested in the purchase of land in this parish, producing a rental of £18 per annum. Dame Dorothy Jeffreys, of Acton, in the parish of Wrexham, in 1728, gave £50 in trust for the instruction of poor children of this parish; and in 1758, the sum of £114, which had accumulated from the former legacy, and £86 from the latter, making together £200, were placed out in mortgage on a farm purchased by the parish, which now realises five per cent. interest. With these sums three poor boys and three poor girls are clothed, taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, and, when of a proper age, are apprenticed with small premiums, when the funds will allow it. In the school-room, which was erected from the funds of Dame Margaret Strode, and is situated near the church, the children of the parish are, together with those on the foundation, gratuitously instructed by subscription. Mrs. Shakerley, of Lower Gwersylt, in 1757, bequeathed £200 for the purchase of lands, directing the rental to be applied in clothing and apprenticing, to husbandry and housewifery, six poor children of this parish. No application having been made for apprenticing, for several years, this sum has accumulated, and the proceeds now amount to £45 per annum. Mrs. Jane Shakerley, in 1777, bequeathed £100, to be applied in the same manner as the last-named bequest. Mrs. Anne Shakerley, in 1748, and the dowager Lady Williams, sister to these two benefactresses, each bequeathed £100, directing the interest to be laid out in clothing the aged poor of the parish, to which purpose is also applied the interest arising from the other benefactions, when no premiums are paid for apprenticing poor children, according to the intention of the respective benefactors. Near the church, and adjacent to the school-house, are two unendowed almshouses. Mr. John Davies, of London, in 1595, bequeathed a rent-charge of £13. 6. 8., on his estate at Allington, to the poor of this parish, among whom are also distributed the proceeds of other charitable bequests. Wat's Dyke passes through the parish, and may be distinctly traced along the eastern bank of the river Alyn, in a direction towards Caergwrlle. Sir Richard Trevor, whose monument is in the church, was born in this parish, and resided at the ancient mansion in the township of Allington, or, as it is sometimes called, Trêvalyn: in this old hall is his portrait, with some emblematic allusions to his former life as a warrior, and his subsequent application to devotion and retirement. At Merford is an ancient British camp, called "the Roft," on an eminence commanding prospects of amazing extent and variety, chiefly over the Vale of Cheshire; and in the township of Erddig is another strong intrenchment, called "the Roman Fort." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1157. 16.

GRESHOLM, an island, situated off the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, six leagues (N. W.) from Milford Haven. This is one of the largest and most central of a line of isles and rocks which extends in a westerly direction, at some distance from Skomar Isle on the coast of Pembrokeshire, and terminates at the "Smalls," on which is a lighthouse. Gresholm is lofty, steep, and nearly circular, and is generally the first land seen on approaching Milford from the west. Between this island and the "Smalls," but nearer the latter, is a ledge of rocks, about a mile long, which are visible at low water, and are named the

"Hats and Barrels;" and about a league from Gresholm, nearly in the same direction, are others, called "Skettle," or "Kettle bottom." All these rocks are extremely dangerous to navigation, as the sounding is upwards of thirty fathoms immediately to the north and south. At the distance of a league from Gresholm, north by west, lies a sunken rock, named the "Pope;" and three leagues to the north-east is the "Augre bank," or "Taradr," connected with the "Mascus," a piece of foul ground which is occasionally dry at low water. This range of rocks presents such opposition to the flood tide, that it is generally high water on the coast from two to four hours before it manifests itself amongst them; and the ebb tide is of course equally late.

GRONDRE, a hamlet in that part of the parish of KILLYMAENLLWYD which is in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Narberth, containing 23 inhabitants. It forms an inconsiderable and detached portion of the parish, all the rest being situated in the hundred of Derllŷs, county of Carmarthen. The population is exclusively agricultural.

GRWYNE-VAWR (GRWYNAU-VAWR), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{3}{4}$  miles (N. E.) from Crickhowel, containing 21 inhabitants. This hamlet takes its name from the Grwyney-Vawr stream, which rises in the fastnesses of the Black mountains, passes through the vale here, in the same wild district, and falls into the river Usk near the border of Monmouthshire. It forms the south-eastern extremity of the parish, and is bounded on the east by a detached portion of the county of Hereford. The population is exclusively agricultural. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £14. 17.

GRWYNE-VECHAN (GRWYNAU-VECHAN), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{4}$  miles (N. N. E.) from Crickhowel, containing 108 inhabitants. This place occupies a valley among the Black Mountains, through which flows the Grwyney-Vechan stream, which gives name to the hamlet, previously to joining the Grwyney-Vawr two miles distant. The population is exclusively agricultural. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure being £26. 2.

GUILDSFIELD (CEGIDVA), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{3}{4}$  miles (N.) from Welshpool, containing 2994 inhabitants. This parish, the Welsh name of which signifies a place abounding with hemlock, is bounded on the east by the river Severn: the turnpike road from Welshpool to Oswestry runs through it, one branch passing through the village, and the other, which is the most frequented, in a direction parallel with the river Severn, and between it and the Montgomeryshire canal. It contains about sixteen thousand acres of land, the greater part of which consists of old enclosures: about two thousand acres were enclosed by an act passed in 1787. There are several genteel residences near the village, among which the splendid mansion of Garth claims particular notice: it is a modern structure in the decorated style of English architecture, built by the late Rev. Richard Mytton, at an expense of nearly £100,000. There is a flannel-manufactory at Pool Quay, a hamlet in this parish. The river Severn is navigable up to this hamlet, and the Montgomeryshire canal passes through the eastern part of the parish: a branch from the latter extends from near Trederwen vôr to within half a mile of the village of Guilsfield, a distance of about three miles, and was constructed a few years ago, at an expense of £2000. The petty sessions for the hundred were held here until the year 1830, when they were removed to Welshpool: the townships of Gungrog-Vechan and Trelydan, and part of those of Garth, Hendrehên, Llan with Trawscoed, Llanerchrochwell, Tyrymyneich, and Varchwel, are within the liberties of that borough.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £11, endowed with a fourth part of the tithes (the remainder belonging to Christ Church College, Oxford), and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is in the decorated style of English architecture, and consists of a nave, with a clerestory, north and south aisles, and a lofty square embattled tower, surmounted by a shingled spire. The aisles are each separated from the nave by a row of four arches, supported by massive pillars: over the south aisle there is a gallery, and another at the west end of the church. The roof is divided into compartments, handsomely adorned with carved work: the font is of considerable antiquity, and in the windows is some ancient stained glass. Among the monuments there is a handsome one of veined marble to the memory of the Rev. James Egerton and his family. The churchyard is ornamented with twelve exceedingly fine yew trees, which, according to a document in the possession of John Jones, Esq., of Crosswood, were planted in the reign of William and Mary, and are all of the same age. The parish register commences in the year 1573, and is the oldest in this part of the country. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A National school for boys and girls, in which about one hundred are at present instructed, is supported partly by subscription, and partly by a rent-charge of £10 on a farm in the township of Llanerchrochwell, bequeathed by Stephen Thomas. Divers bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor, the produce of which is chiefly distributed in bread and clothing: among the principal are, the sum of £110 by John Davies, in 1731; a rent-charge of £5 by William Jones, in 1735; £200 by Charles Christopher, in 1757; and £90 by Elizabeth Lloyd, in 1778. On a high hill, called the Garva (Gaer Vawr), not far from the village, are vestiges of a Roman encampment; and beyond it a Roman road may be traced for nearly a mile, on the road to Pont-yscowryd. Several ornaments of gold, supposed to be relics of the Romans, have been found near this camp: one is in the shape of a wild boar, about two inches long and one high, which probably decorated a helmet, and is now in the possession of D. Mytton, Esq., M. D. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1215. 3.

GUMFRESTON, a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (W. by N.) from Tenby, containing 103 inhabitants. This place, from its pleasant situation near the coast, and the highly medicinal properties of some springs which are strongly impregnated with iron, has for some time been rising into consideration, and is likely to become, under judicious management, a place of fashionable resort during the summer season. Three of these springs, all slightly differing in the properties of their waters, but similar in their ferruginous impregnation, rise in different parts of the churchyard, and at their junction form a small rivulet, which flows through the parish. The water is said to have been found highly efficacious in relieving various disorders, and it is now in contemplation to enclose the springs, and to erect a small pump-room, with other appendages, for the accommodation of visitors, who, from its short distance from Tenby, and its pleasingly rural situation and appearance, are in the habit of resorting to this place for the benefit of the water. Coal of hard quality is found in the parish, but is worked only for the supply of the immediate neighbourhood. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 3½., and in the patronage of John Meyrick, Esq. The church is a handsome structure, romantically situated in a richly wooded dell, where it is concealed from distant view, excepting only its lofty square tower, which forms an object of picturesque and interesting appearance. The parsonage-house, which is pleasantly situated, has been much enlarged and improved by the present incumbent, who is about to establish a Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of the children of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £75. 12.

GUNGROG-VECHAN (GYNGROG-VECHAN), a township in the parish of GUILDSFIELD, within the limits of the borough of WELSHPOOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (N.E.) from Welshpool. The population is returned with the parish. It is within the liberties of the borough of Welshpool, and occupies an eminence on the left bank of the river Severn. The Ellesmere and Montgomeryshire canal passes through this township, which is nearly surrounded by the parish of Welshpool, and is therefore placed within the new limits of that borough, under the late Reform Act.

GWAENYSCOR, or GWANNYSGOR (GWAEN-ESGÂR), a parish in the Media division of the hundred of PRESTATYN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (N.W.) from Holywell, on the road to Holyhead, containing 247 inhabitants. This parish, which is embosomed in hills, and surrounded by lofty mountains, abounds with lead-ore; and very extensive mines were for many years worked with considerable advantage to the proprietors, but within the last few years have been discontinued. The village is pleasantly situated at the base of a ridge of hills, on the summit of which are numerous verdant tumuli, supposed to be the sepulchres of persons of distinction at some remote period. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 8. 1½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small edifice of modern erection, romantically situated amid lofty mountains, and is distinguished for possessing the oldest and most perfect register in the principality, and perhaps even in the kingdom: it commences in the year 1538, at which time orders for keeping parish registers were first issued: the entries are regular and entire, and the whole is in excellent preservation. In the village there is a place of worship for Independents. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £66. 16.

GWASTEDYN (GWASTADEDD-VAWR), a township in the parish of NANTMEL, hundred of Rhaiadr, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Rhaiadr, containing 423 inhabitants. It is situated at the western extremity of the parish, and a great part of it is occupied by a very lofty hill, on which one of the largest, if not the most perfect, carneddau in the county is found. It consists of a large pile of stones, supposed to contain between thirty and forty cart-loads, thrown into nearly a square form, with a hollow in the centre; but this ancient sepulchral monument has sustained so much injury from the destructive effect of ages, that few traces of order are now observable in its construction. Dyfryn wood terminates the declivity of this hill on the west; and the valley on the east is populous and well cultivated. The road from Builth to Rhaiadr passes along the left bank of the river Elain, which bounds the township, parish, and county on the south-west.

GWEMPA, a joint hamlet with Velindre, in the parish of LLANGENDEIRN, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. This hamlet occupies the southern portion of the parish, and is situated on the left bank of the Gwendraeth-Vechan river, which is here crossed by a bridge, on the road from Carmarthen: the valley through which the river flows contains some well-cultivated farms.

GWENDDWR (GWEN-DDWR), a parish in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. by E.) from Builth, comprising the North and South divisions, each of which maintains its own poor, and containing 460 inhabitants, of which number, 234 are in the North, and 226 in the South, division. This parish, the name of which signifies "the fair water," is bounded on the east and north-east by the river Wye, which separates it from the county of Radnor, but is not navigable in this part of its course, and is traversed on that side by the turnpike road from Hay to Builth, which runs parallel and close to the river. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £700 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Arthur Macnamara, Esq., as impropiator of the small tithes: the rectorial tithes, which anciently belonged to the priory of D'or, were purchased from the crown, during the reign of Elizabeth, by Sir David Williams, under whose will they are now vested in trustees for certain charitable purposes. The church, dedicated to St. Dubricius, has a substantial steeple, but possesses no other claim to architectural notice. Some writers are of opinion that the celebrated seminary of that holy man was situated on the western bank of the Wye, in this parish. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £375. 1., of which, £154. 14. is assessed on the North division, and £220. 7. on the South.

GWERN-HOWELL (GWERNI-HYWEL), an extra-parochial district, in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Pentre-Voelas, containing 73 inhabitants. This place is said by some to belong to the parish of Corwen, though detached, and thirteen miles distant from the church of that parish. It was assessed with the parish of Cerrig y Druidion for the property tax, and supported its poor separately until within a late period.

GWERN Y BWLCH, a township in the parish of CEMMES, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. by N.) from Machynlleth, containing 522 inhabitants. It is situated on the right bank of the river Avon Yale, which falls into the Dovey, and on the road from Newtown to Machynlleth. Through a break between the mountains a distant view of Cader Idris is obtained; and this bwlch, or gap, gives name to the township, which contains a great portion of common, affording sheepwalks to the contiguous farms.

GWERSYLT, a township in that part of the parish of GRESFORD which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. N. W.) from Wrexham, on the road to Mold, containing 834 inhabitants. This township, which is sometimes regarded as divided into Lower and Upper Gwersylt, is pleasantly situated on elevated ground, commanding in some parts a fine view of the Vale Royal of Cheshire. Here are coal mines in active operation, also two mills for the drawing of wire. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Wat's Dyke, an ancient boundary between England and Wales, is distinctly visible in this township, first pursuing a northerly course from the point of the Alyn, near Kumick's Mill, and then following the eastern bank of that river, until it leaves the parish in a direction towards Caergwrle. At the mansion of Upper Gwersylt resided Colonel John Robinson, who distinguished himself in the civil war of the seventeenth century: the grounds command a fine view of the Hope mountains and of Caergwrle castle, and the walks by the side of the river Alyn are romantically beautiful. Lower Gwersylt, soon after the Restoration, became the property of the ancient and respectable family of the Shakerleys, who have made several benefactions to the poor of the parish, and who abandoned this place on account of a calamitous fire which occurred in April 1738: this ancient seat is now the residence of John Williams, Esq.

GWIDER (GWYDRE), a joint hamlet with Quarter Mawr, in the parish of LLANTHOYSAINT, lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES. The population is returned with the parish, the church of which is situated in this hamlet. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, including Quarter Mawr, amounts to £94. 17.

GWILLER, a joint township with Trewern, in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL NANT MELAN, within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (S. W.) from New Radnor. The population is returned with Trewern. The parish church is situated in this township, which occupies a small vale in the southern portion of the mountainous district called Radnor Forest, near the source of the Sommergild brook. Here is also the celebrated cascade called "Water break its neck," which is formed by a stream that rises in the above-mentioned district, and, after a fall of seventy feet perpendicularly, joins that brook. The lower portion of the township is well-wooded; and there is a lake, termed Llŷn Llanillyn, about three-quarters of a mile in circumference.

GWILLY (GWILI), a joint hamlet with Iscoed, in the parish of LLANEDY, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. N. W.) from Swansea. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the left bank of the small river Gwili, which joins the river Loughor at no great distance.

GWNNWS-ISÂV, a township in the parish of LLANWNWS, upper division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 467 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by the river Ystwith, the scenery on the banks of which is romantic and picturesque, and is situated on the road between Aberystwith and Trêgarn: the village consists only of a few scattered dwellings.

GWRAVOG (GWÂR HAF OG), a hamlet chiefly in the parish of LLANLLEONVEL, but partly in that of LLANAVAN-VECHAN, hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Builth, containing, in the Llanlleonvel portion of it, 78 inhabitants, the population of the remainder being returned with the parish of Llanavan-Vechan. The name of this place signifies literally "the summer bank," which is partly descriptive of it, though the surface chiefly forms part of the northern declivity of a well-wooded eminence, a branch of the Eppynt hills, on the northern side of which flows the river Irvon. The poor are supported by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £22. 9.

GWREDOG, a chapelry in that part of the parish of LLANTRISAINT which is in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by E.) from Llanerchymedd. The population is returned with the parish. This small chapelry, which consists only of two farms, is situated in a very retired part of the county, and is not distinguished by any feature of interest or importance. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llantrisant, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is a very small and plain edifice, occupying a solitary situation, almost inaccessible in winter, and without any road leading to it. One poor man of this place is eligible to the almshouses founded at Beaumaris, in 1609, by Mr. David Hughes, who also founded and endowed the free grammar school of that place.

GWYDDELWERN, a parish in the hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, comprising the three principal divisions of Cwm, Uwch-Avon, and Uwch-Mynydd, each of which maintains its own poor, and containing 1577 inhabitants. The village of Gwyddelwern is in the Cwm division, and occupies a pleasant situation in a small valley, on the road from Corwen to Ruthin, 3 miles (N.) from Corwen. The whole of this parish, comprising about four thousand four hundred acres, is enclosed and under cultivation; but the quality of the soil is extremely various:

the elevated parts, forming the greater portion of the parish, command fine views of the Vale of Edeyrnion, watered by the river Dee, and of the surrounding country. The south-western part is intersected by the road from London to Holyhead, and the two high roads from Corwen to Bala: the road from Corwen to Ruthin also passes through it, and has lately been greatly improved by diverting certain parts of it, in order to avoid the hills over which it previously passed. Peat is procured within the parish, for the consumption of the inhabitants of the district. The manufacture of flannel is carried on at Cynwyd, a village six miles distant from that of Gwyddelwern, in the Uwch-Avon division, which is entirely detached from the two other divisions of the parish. At this village was also anciently held the court for the whole comot of Edeyrnion, which contained thirteen baronies, and had independent manorial rights; but, on a quarrel between the lords, as it is stated, the records were burnt, and the courts have been since discontinued. Fairs are held on April 15th, August 5th, and October 18th.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, not rated in the king's books, endowed with £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: the tithes of the parish are divided into five equal portions, of which four belong to the vicars choral of St. Asaph, and the fifth to the incumbent. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is an ancient building, with a rich eastern window, containing some remains of ancient stained glass: there is a curious old chandelier of wood hanging in the interior. There are several places of worship, in different parts of the parish, for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with Sunday schools attached to each. The parochial school, situated in the village of Gwyddelwern, is partly supported by subscription, having no permanent endowment. Hugh Roberts, in 1807, bequeathed £200, directing the interest to be applied to the instruction of the children of the Uwch-Avon division and the parish of Llangar, two-thirds to the former, and one-third to the latter: the school-room is situated in the village of Cynwyd, and was built by subscription. Divers small bequests have been made, the interest of which is applied annually for the benefit of the poor of the different divisions. On Bettws mountain, in the Uwch-Mynydd division, are vestiges of an ancient British encampment; and about three-quarters of a mile south of the village of Gwyddelwern, in a field by the road side, there is an artificial mound, surrounded by a fosse, called Tommen y Castell, together with some tumuli. Near Gwyddelwern there is a place called Bryn Saith Marchog, from its being the spot where Owain Glyndwr surprised Reginald de Grey and seven knights, whom he made prisoners: it commands a beautiful view of the small but picturesque vale of Glyn. Above the village of Cynwyd is a picturesque waterfall. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £562. 10.

GWYDIR, a township in that part of the parish of LLANRWST which is in the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, on the western bank of the river Conway,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a mile west from Llanrwst, containing 376 inhabitants. The name is a contraction of Gwaed-dir, "the bloody land," either from this having been the scene of some battles fought by Llywarch Hên, about the year 610, or from a sanguinary conflict which occurred, in 952, between the sons of Hywel Dda and the princes Ievav and Iago. The surface of this township is exceedingly hilly, and within its limits is comprised the greater part of the vast lofty mountain called Moel Siabod, one of the most prominent of the Snowdonian chain. The estate of Gwydir comprises thirty-one thousand acres, of which upwards of two thousand consist of plantations, formed since 1790, and five hundred are in lakes, twelve in number: it includes the whole of this township, and extends into the parishes of Trêvriw, Llanrhychwyn, Bettws y Coed, and Dôlwyddelan, and contains an abundance of lead-ore, zinc, and pyrites, all worked, besides four extensive slate-quarries, in active operation. It came into the possession of the family of Wynne by purchase from a descendant of Howel Coytmor, grandson of Davydd, brother of Llewelyn, the last prince of Wales, whose monument is in the Gwydir chapel adjoining Llanrwst church, and continued for several generations to belong to that family, until it passed, in the year 1678, into that of the Duke of Ancaster, by the marriage of Mary, daughter and heiress of Sir Richard Wynne, with Robert Marquis of Lindsay. Priscilla, Baroness Willoughby de Eresby, elder sister of Robert Duke of Ancaster, having espoused Sir Peter Burrell, Bart., the mansion and estate of Gwydir became the property of that gentleman, who in 1796 was created Baron Gwydir; and, at his death in 1820, it descended to his eldest son, Peter Robert Drummond Burrell, second Lord Gwydir, and present Lord Willoughby de Eresby. The ancient mansion was situated beneath the wood-clad rock, called Carreg y Gwalch, or "The Rock of the Falcon:" it was built by John Wynne ab Meredydd, in 1555, and consisted of a greater and a lesser court, but was taken down in 1816, since which time the present structure, on a much smaller scale, has been erected: a small portion of the former mansion still remains, and is now being fitted up in an antique and elegant style: the grounds are laid out with corresponding judgment and taste. In the plantations above the Lower Gwydir stood another edifice, called the Upper Gwydir, which was pulled down several years ago, and the walls of which were almost covered with inscriptions; it was erected in 1604, by Sir John Wynne, who distinguished himself by his partiality to antiquarian researches, and by compiling the memoirs of his family, as a kind of summer house, embracing a fine prospect of the rich and beautiful Vale of Conway, and of the picturesque scenery with which this mountainous district abounds. Near its site stands a small handsome chapel, built by Sir Richard Wynne, in 1673, and lately improved by the present noble possessor of the estate, whose domestic chaplain performs divine service in it, every Sunday, in the English language, which affords great accommodation to the numerous English families resident in the neighbourhood. Carreg y Gwalch was the retreat of Davydd ab Shenkin, a noted partisan of the house of Lancaster, who for some time concealed himself in a cave, called from that circumstance Ogo Davydd ab Shenkin. Mr. Pennant says that the "noblest oaks in all Wales grew on this rock, within memory of man," although they are "totally destitute of earth for a considerable way, so that the nutriment which the oaks received must have been derived from the deep penetration of the roots, through the fissures of the stones, into some nutritive matter." This township is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £164. 4.

GWYNDY (GWIN-DY, or GWYN-DY), a chapelry in the parish of LLANDRYGARN, hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES,  $12\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. by S.) from Bangor. The population is included in the return for the parish. It formerly formed a part of the parish of Holyhead, and is considered to be situated half-way between that port and Menai bridge, though somewhat nearer the former. There is a post-office attached to the inn, which is the principal house in the place.

GWYNVE (GWINVAI), a chapelry in the parish of LLANGADOCK, lower division of the hundred of PER-VETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Llangadock, containing 845 inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llangadock. This chapelry is situated in a valley in the western division of the Black Mountains, from which the Clydach and Sawdde Vechan streams descend, and, after uniting, join the Sawdde on the northern confines of the chapelry. It contains within its limits a seat of the same name, the property of L. Lewis, Esq. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £325. 11.

GWYNVIL, a township in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{3}{4}$  miles (N. E. by N.) from Lampeter, containing 315 inhabitants. A chapel, dedicated to St. Gwynvil, which formerly existed here, is now in ruins. There are a few respectable and ornamental residences overlooking the vale of the Teivy. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure being £28. 3.

GWYOTHERIN, a parish in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Llanrwst, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, and containing 463 inhabitants. Within this parish, which is situated in the mountainous district of the county, are the sources of the rivers Elwy, Aled, and Alwen, upon the first of which, about two miles below its source, the village is pleasantly seated. The surface of the surrounding country is beautifully diversified, and in many parts the scenery is highly picturesque: within the parish are three noble lakes, Llŷn Alwen, Llŷn Moelvre, and Llŷn Aled, the last of which is enclosed on almost every side by mountains covered with dark and barren heath. St. Winifred is said to have retired hither on the death of Beuno, and to have placed herself under the protection of St. Elerius, who at that time was living in devotional seclusion at this sequestered village, where, finding a convent of nuns under the superintendence of Theonia, she assumed the veil, and after some years' residence became abbess, on the death of her predecessor. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 1., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. James, or, as some with probability assert, to St. Gwytherin, who lived in the latter part of the sixth century, is a spacious and ancient structure, but in a very dilapidated condition: in it were deposited the mortal remains of Theonia and St. Winifred, which latter were removed, after a lapse of five hundred years from her death, to Shrewsbury: the wooden chest in which these were preserved is still kept; and in the churchyard are four upright stones, marking the site of her grave, one of which is inscribed and ornamented with a scroll and running foliage. There is also a very ancient gravestone, ornamented with a cross fleury and chalice, and bearing an inscription, which is now almost illegible. Of the chapel of St. Winifred, which stood on the south side of the church, there is not a single vestige, nor can any traces be discovered of the convent over which she is said to have presided. The Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists have each a place of worship. The interest arising from several charitable bequests is annually distributed among the poor of the parish, on St. Thomas's day. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the two divisions amounts to £161. 11.

GYFIN, a parish in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a mile (S. by W.) from Aberconway, on the road to Llanrwst, containing 641 inhabitants. This parish, which lies adjacent to, and is intimately connected with, the borough of Aberconway, is distinguished as the scene of a memorable battle, which took place in 880, between the forces of Anarawd, Prince of North Wales, and those of Eadred, Earl of Mercia, in which the latter were defeated with considerable slaughter. It was also here that Llewelyn ab Iorwerth founded the Cistercian abbey, originally called Caer Gyfin abbey, and afterwards Conway abbey, which Edward I. removed to Maenan, when he erected Conway castle, in 1284. The village is pleasantly situated on the small river Gyfin, from which the parish takes its name, and near the confluence of this stream with the river Conway: from its proximity to the port of Aberconway, it shares in all the commercial advantages of that town, of which, indeed, it may be considered as forming an integral part. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean of Bangor, as impropiator of the tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Benedict, is obscurely situated, and in a state of dilapidation. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The Rev. John Jones, Dean of Bangor, in 1719, bequeathed £100 for teaching twelve poor children of this parish to read Welsh, the interest of which sum is appropriated to that purpose; and there are some trifling charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £254.

H.

HALGSTON, called by the Welsh HALCHDIN, a township in the parish of HANMER, hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles

(N. by E.) from Ellesmere, containing 491 inhabitants. It is situated about half-way on the road between Wrexham and Whitchurch, and is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £355. 2.

HALKIN (HELYGEN), a parish in the Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S.E. by S.) from Holywell, on the road from Chester to Holyhead, containing 1538 inhabitants. The tract of country in which this parish is situated was, at the time of the Norman Conquest, called Alchene, from which its present name is derived: the parish contains about one thousand eight hundred acres, having generally a light and productive soil. The village, which has arisen within the present century, and greatly increased since the discovery of some rich mines in the vicinity, is pleasantly situated in a fertile country; and the elevated ground adjacent to it commands a fine prospect of the surrounding country, which, on the north, east, and south, expands into an almost boundless view. The æstuary of the Dee, with the city of Chester at its higher extremity, and the ruins of Flint castle on its southern shore, appears to the north-east, and beyond it the barren peninsula of Wirrall, and the river Mersey, with the Lancashire hills, and the mountains of Derbyshire, Yorkshire, and even Cumberland, in the distance; while the castles of Beeston and Hawarden, and the richly wooded tract between the latter place and Northop, occupy the fore-ground. At a small distance from the village rises the Halkin mountain, rich in mineral treasures, and extending into the parishes of Northop, Ysceiviog, and Holywell, which is one continued series of excavations made in search of lead-ore, of which no part of the principality has been more productive. The late Sir George Wynne is said to have cleared £300,000 by a mine which was discovered in the township of Lygan. The British Mining Company have very considerable works here, which are carried on with success, under the name of the Halkin Mine Company, and there are several others on a smaller scale throughout the whole range of the Halkin mountain. The great Grosvenor mine is said to have been discovered by a peasant cutting a ditch fence. In the lead mines of this neighbourhood, and imbedded in the white clay of the mountain, fossils of almost every variety are found in abundance. The clay above mentioned is in much repute, and is sent to Liverpool in great quantities. Chert, of a beautiful white colour, which is highly esteemed, is also found, and much of it is sent into Staffordshire, to be used in the earthenware manufacture. The whole of the mineral property of the Halkin mountain belongs to the Marquis of Westminster, who, in 1827, erected near the village a splendid castellated mansion, in the ancient English style of architecture, commanding some of the finest views for which the strikingly diversified scenery of this neighbourhood is celebrated; this seat, called Halkin Castle, is occasionally the residence of that nobleman's family. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £14. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small modern edifice, erected in 1745, and contains several good monuments. In the village is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists; at Pentre, one for Calvinistic Methodists; and at Trêv y Cae, one for Independents. A parochial school was founded here in 1829, principally at the expense of the Marquis of Westminster, who pays £60 per annum towards its support: seventy boys and sixty girls receive gratuitous instruction in it. Mr. Henry Lewis bequeathed £50, Mrs. Wynne £30, and Mr. H. Ellis £18, the interest of which sums is annually divided among the poor at Christmas: there are also several other bequests mentioned on the tablets in the church, but, with the exception of the above mentioned, they have all by some means been lost. The Rev. P. Roberts, author of the Harmony of the Epistles, Letters to Volney, History of the Cymry, and various other literary productions, was rector of this parish, in which he died, in May 1819: his remains were interred in the church, and a small mural monument has been erected to his memory on the north side of it. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £479. 9.

HANMER, a parish in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, comprising the townships of Bettisfield, Bronington, Halgston, Hanmer, Tybroughton, and Willington, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 2731 inhabitants, of which number, 546 are in the township of Hanmer, 5 miles (N. E.) from Ellesmere, on the road from Wrexham to Whitchurch. This parish, anciently called Handmere, and subsequently Hanmere, takes its name from a spacious mere, or lake, in form resembling a human hand, on one side of which the village is pleasantly situated. This fine sheet of water covers a space of seventy-three acres, and derives a great degree of picturesque beauty from the rich woodlands in its immediate vicinity, interspersed with highly cultivated eminences; from the venerable embattled parochial church, with the circumjacent village; from the principal seat of the Hanmer family, which ornaments its banks on the one side; and from the handsome mansion erected by Lord Kenyon, on the site of the old house of Gredington, which, with its extensive plantations and spacious pleasure grounds, adorns its opposite shores. The situation of the village, and the appearance of the country around it, are strikingly beautiful: the enclosures are small, and the fences full of fine oak timber, of nearly one hundred years' growth, which gives to the scenery, especially near Gredington, a stately magnificence of character. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir John Hanmer, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Chad, is a spacious and handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower: from the numerous shields bearing the arms of Hanmer, which are ornamentally distributed through every part of the edifice, it was probably erected by that family in the reign of Henry VII. The interior consists of a nave, aisles, and chancel, with the two chapels of the Fenns and the Hanmers: the roof of the church is of carved oak, and those of the north aisle and the Fenns' chapel are elegantly panelled in small compartments, and richly ornamented with wreaths of flowers, fruit, and foliage. The roof of the Hanmer chapel is of exquisitely carved oak, and the floor is laid with Saxon tiles : in this chapel are monuments to several of the family, among which are those of Sir Thomas Hanmer, Bart., who died in 1678, and his grandson, Sir Thomas Hanmer, Speaker of the House of Commons in the reign of Anne : this latter gentleman, who died in 1746, is also well known for his superb edition of Shakspeare's Plays, with annotations, in six volumes, published by the University of Oxford, to which he presented the manuscript. In the chancel of the church is a fine mural monument to the memory of Lloyd, Lord Kenyon, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, who died in 1802 : it has a figure of his lordship in his robes, in a sitting posture, under a canopy supported by well-sculptured figures, emblematic of Faith and Justice. In the north aisle is a monument to the memory of Mary, widow of the Lord Chief Justice, which presents a figure of Mary at the feet of the Saviour, beautifully sculptured : both these monuments are from the chisel of Mr. Bacon, Jun., and for beauty of design, delicacy in the draperies, and spirit in the execution, reflect great credit on the artist. In the churchyard, within an iron palisade, is the tomb of Luke and Catherine Lloyd, of the Bryn, who lived together in conjugal bonds for the long period of sixty-eight years.

Mrs. Katherine Eddowes, of Halgston, in 1674, gave to Luke Lloyd, Esq., and others, estates in Sesswick and Pickhill, in the county of Denbigh, in trust, for the support of a schoolmaster, to instruct the poor children of this parish : the estates at present produce a rental of £30, which is applied to that purpose, and for which all the children in the parish are gratuitously taught. In 1624, Sir J. Hanmer, Bart., bequeathed the tithes of Bettisfield for the better maintenance of a "learned preacher in the parish church of Hanmer." In 1730, Sir Thomas Hanmer gave £40 to the poor, making, with several previous donations, the sum of £576, which has been invested in the purchase of a farm, and conveyed to the vicar of the parish and others, in trust, to distribute the annual rental, which is now £50, in clothing to the poor of the parish. At a short distance to the east of the village is Hanmer Hall, the residence of Sir John Hanmer, Bart., a handsome modern mansion of brick, commanding from the grounds much finely varied scenery, and from a turret by which it is surmounted an extensive and almost boundless prospect of the surrounding country, extending into no fewer than nine different counties. About a mile and a half from Hanmer Hall is Bettisfield, the original seat of the Hammers, an ancient brick mansion, pleasantly situated, in which is a fine collection of family portraits by eminent artists : among these are, a head of the late Sir Thomas Hanmer, by Kneller ; a portrait of Isabella, Duchess of Grafton, and Countess of Arlington, married to Sir Thomas Hanmer, in 1698 ; a head of Sir Thomas Hanmer, the second baronet of this family, and another of his wife Susan, daughter of Sir William Hervey ; a portrait, by Cornelius Jansen, of which the subject is unknown ; a portrait, by Kneller, of Sir Thomas Hanmer, robed as Speaker of the House of Commons ; a highly finished head of Charles I., a three-quarters' portrait of the same monarch, and of his Queen, Henrietta Maria ; a portrait of Lady Hanmer, of Lady Warner à la Magdalone, and others. About a mile west-south-west from the church is Gredington, formerly a seat belonging to

Sir John Hanmer, from whom it was purchased, in the reign of Charles II., by the Rev. Richard Hilton, vicar of this parish, and passed by marriage with his daughter to Robert Eddowes, of Eagle Hall, Cheshire, whose daughter Jane conveyed it by marriage to Lloyd Kenyon, Esq., in 1729, whose second son Lloyd, Lord Kenyon, the Lord Chief Justice, built part of the present mansion, especially a dining-room and drawing-room, with oriel windows, also the stables, and laid out part of the gardens : the present mansion has been almost rebuilt on the old site by the present Lord Kenyon, after a design by Mr. Harrison, of Chester, in a style of great elegance, and is surrounded by a considerable demesne, including upwards of sixteen acres of woodland, of about one hundred years' growth, to which has been added nearly the same quantity within the present century : the pleasure grounds, including the gardens, which are tastefully laid out, occupy about eight acres, and about one hundred acres more are laid down in pastures, meadows, and other farming land. The house contains some fine paintings by eminent masters, among which are portraits, by Romney, of Lord Chief Justice Kenyon, and Lord Thurlow, Lord High Chancellor ; and two curious paintings, by a French artist, of the eldest son and daughter of James II., given by that monarch to Dr. Kenyon, who, as his physician, attended His Majesty to St. Germain's : in the bosom of the princess is a nosegay of flowers, painted by her own hand. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £1488. 7., of which, £237. 11. is the proportion raised for the township of Hanmer.

HARLECH, a small decayed town, formerly a borough, in the parish of LLANDANWG, hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH (of which it is the ancient shire town), NORTH WALES, 20 miles (N. W.) from Dôlgeley, by Barmouth, 32 (W. by S.) from Bala, by Festiniog and Maentwrog, and 229 (W. N. W.) from London. The population is returned with the parish. This place is conjectured by some writers to have been a fortified post of the Romans, constructed to defend the openings of the two æstuaries to the north of it, called respectively the Traeth Mawr and the Traeth Bâch, and to secure a communication with the opposite shore ; but this opinion rests only upon the discovery of some Roman coins and a golden torques in the vicinity. It is evident that it was formerly a fortified post of the ancient Britons, and was called Tŵr Bronwen, from Bronwen, the sister of Brân ab Llŷr, Prince of Siluria, or Gwent. It afterwards obtained the name of Caer Collwyn, from having been, towards the close of the ninth century, the residence of Collwyn ab Tango, one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales, and lord of Eivionydd, Ardudwy, and part of Lley, who inhabited a square tower which subsequently became a portion of the more modern castle, and of which there are yet some remains. According to some of the British historians, the castle was founded, so early as the year 530, by Maelgwyn Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales : the present structure was built by Edward I., upon the ruins of the former, and was either called Arlech, from its situation upon a rock, or by its present name of Harlech, which signifies "the fair rock : " it was completed prior to the year 1283, for at that time Hugh de Wlonkeslow was constable, with a small garrison under him, and had an allowance of £100 per annum, which, however, was afterwards much reduced. Owain Glyndwr, during the furious and destructive war which he waged against Henry IV., forcibly took possession of this fortress, in 1404; but it was retaken by the English troops within three years afterwards. In 1459, it became the asylum of Margaret of Anjou, queen of Henry VI., who, after the disastrous battle of Northampton, retired to Coventry, and thence to this fortress, from which, after a short stay, she departed for Scotland, again to take the field in the North of England. On the accession of Edward IV. to the throne, that monarch soon became master of the whole of the kingdom, except two or three strong fortresses in Northumberland, and Harlech castle. The latter was held by Davydd ab Ievan ab Einion, a man of great stature and dauntless valour, and one of the most staunch supporters of the Lancastrian cause. To effect its reduction, Edward, in 1468, despatched Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, with a strong body of men, who, after encountering the most formidable difficulties in their march through a rugged alpine territory, the line of which was afterwards called Le Herbert, or "Herbert's Way," invested the castle. The earl entrusted the prosecution of the siege to his brother, Sir Richard Herbert, a knight equal in prowess and bravery to the Welsh commander, whom he summoned to surrender, but received only a laconic and humorous refusal. Finding that the place was so strong, as only to be reduced by famine, after a siege of no ordinary duration, he entered into terms of honourable capitulation with Davydd, whose security and protection he guaranteed by intercession with his sovereign; but in this he was at first unsuccessful, until he boldly offered his own life, and threatened to reinstate the Welsh hero in his impregnable fortress, apprizing the king, at the same time, of the difficulty of obtaining possession of it. From a manuscript in the Cotton Library it appears that, in the reign of Elizabeth, the garrison of Harlech castle consisted of twenty-four men, commanded by a constable receiving an annual allowance of fifty pounds. In 1624, much damage was done to the cattle and other farming stock of the neighbourhood by an extraordinary mephitic vapour, which arose from the sea, and is conjectured by Camden's Annalist, Bishop Gibson, to have been caused by the putrefaction of a great swarm of locusts, which visited the neighbouring coasts about this time, and was suddenly destroyed by the coldness of the climate. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, this castle was alternately in the hands of both parties. Sir Hugh Pennant bravely defended it for the king, until deserted by his men, when it was surrendered to the parliament: subsequently it was again possessed by the royalists, from whom it was ultimately taken by Gen. Mytton, in March 1647, at which time the garrison consisted of twenty-eight men, under the command of Capt. William Owen: it was the last fortress in Wales which held out for the king, in like manner as it appears to have been among the last defended for the house of Lancaster.

The town, which is situated on the shore of the northern part of the great bay of Cardigan, having on one side some of the wildest and most desolate mountains in the principality, and on the other the wide expanse of sea which separates this part of Merionethshire from the great promontory of Llyn in Carnarvonshire, has declined into little more than a village of inferior size and insignificant appearance. It was made a free borough by Edward I., who granted it certain lands, privileges, and immunities, and placed it under the government of two bailiffs, a recorder, sergeant at mace, and other officers; but the chief of its burgensic privileges were abrogated by an act of enclosure in 1806, and there are now only five burgesses remaining, whose duty is confined to their meeting the parliamentary representative of the county, on the day of election, at the extremity of the town, and walking before him, with wands in their hands, to the town-hall, and thence to his place of abode; and this is the only remnant of municipal authority which the town retains. Owing to the unimportance of the Merionethshire towns, the privilege of sending a member to parliament, granted to those of the other Welsh counties by the 27th of Henry VIII., was withheld from Harlech and the other boroughs of this county; and in lieu thereof, the flourishing town of Haverfordwest, in Pembrokeshire, was invested with the franchise. The county assizes were formerly held here, but were removed to other places about two centuries ago; and the county court was removed from Harlech about the commencement of the present century: the building in which the assizes were held is still standing. The market, which was on Saturday, has fallen into disuse: fairs are held on March 4th, April 14th, the Thursday in Trinity week, June 10th, August 16th, September 22nd, and October 11th, chiefly for the sale of live stock. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, with Sunday schools attached. Here is a parochial school, endowed with £10 per annum by the Rev. John Ellis.

The castle stands on the edge of a lofty perpendicular rock, which overhangs an extensive marsh, once covered by the sea, but enclosed by the act passed in 1806. The buildings surround a spacious square area, at each angle of which is a circular tower, with a turret rising from one of its sides; and on each side of the entrance is also a tower: the apartments, now roofless, are of large dimensions, particularly the banqueting hall, which is seventy-five feet long and thirty in width, and was lighted by four lofty windows on the side facing the sea: the other parts most easily distinguishable are the state chamber, the white chamber, the chapel, dungeons, keep, and water gate; and on the lower part of the rock, adjoining the marsh, are vestiges of walls, with towers of defence. Part of the walls of the original edifice, of native Welsh construction, are yet apparent, the more modern works in some places resting upon them. This fortress was inaccessible on the side next the sea, and was protected on the other by a fosse of extraordinary depth and width, which, prior to the invention of gunpowder, rendered it impregnable. A constable is still appointed, the office being at present filled by Col. Vaughan, of Rûg. From the castle is obtained a delightful view of Cardigan bay and the Carnarvonshire hills, with the lofty Snowdon towering above the rest. The golden torques above mentioned, which was dug up in 1692, in a garden near the castle, is now in the possession of Edward Mostyn Lloyd Mostyn, Esq.: it is a round wreathed flexible bar, about four feet long, composed of three or four rods twisted together, the spiral furrows being separated by sharp intervening ridges, running its entire length: the ends are plain, truncated, and turned back like pot-hooks: it is about an inch in circumference, weighs eight ounces, and is supposed to have been a Roman British ornamental badge of dignity, hung round the neck and breast, with the quiver suspended from it behind. In the vicinity are some scattered vestiges of ancient Druidical monuments.

HARMON (ST.), a parish in the hundred of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Rhaiadr, containing 828 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from that of the saint to whom its church is dedicated, is pleasantly situated on the river Wye, by which it is separated from the adjacent parish of Cwm-toyddwr, and is about four miles in length, and, across the centre, nearly the same in breadth. The lands are but partially enclosed, and only a portion of them is under cultivation: slate is found in the neighbourhood, and some quarries are worked in the parish, which is intersected by the high road from Rhaiadr to Llanidloes, in the county of Montgomery. This place constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £3. 17. 3½, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 15. 2½, endowed with £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Garmon, and rebuilt in the year 1823, is a neat plain edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and aisles, without either tower or spire, having one small bell suspended beneath a shed. There are places of worship for Anabaptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists; and Sunday schools, in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations, are supported by subscription. The produce of some small charitable donations and bequests by unknown benefactors, amounting in the whole to fifty shillings, is annually distributed among the poor on New Year's day. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £326. 4.

HARPTON, a township in the parish of OLD RADNOR, within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 1¾ mile (S. E.) from New Radnor, containing 212 inhabitants. This township, of which the Welsh name is Trêv y Delyn, is situated on the road from New Radnor to Kington, and the principal respectable residence is Harpton Court. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £62. 17.

HARROLDSTON (ST. ISSELS), or EAST HARROLDSTON, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 1½ mile (S. E. by S.) from Haverfordwest, containing 304 inhabitants. This parish, which is pleasantly situated on the bank of the western Cleddau, appears to have derived its name from Harold, the founder of an ancient family of distinction, that for several generations occupied an old seat here, which, by marriage with Alice, daughter and sole heiress of Sir Richard Harold, passed to the family of Perrot, ancestors of Sir John Perrot, Lord Deputy of Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth, and first high sheriff of this county, who was a native of this place: the ancient mansion is now in a very dilapidated condition. Fern Hill, the seat of Sir Henry Matthias, Knt., is pleasantly situated on the bank of the river Cleddau, and surrounded by thriving plantations. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of James Higgon, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Ishmael. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The hermitage of St. Caradoc, it is said, was in this parish; and on the common within the limits of which the Haverfordwest races are held is a well, still called St. Caradoc's Well, round which, till within the last few years, a pleasure fair, or festival, was annually held, for the celebration of rustic sports. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £50. 14.

HARROLDSTON (WEST), a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 155 inhabitants. This place, distinguished by its adjunct from Harroldston East, or St. Issels, like it derives its name from an ancient Anglo-Norman proprietor, who, as well as his successors, was lord paramount over several manors in this part of the principality: the residence of these lords was at this place, which, from the foundations of ancient buildings still remaining, appears to have been formerly of much greater extent than at present. The parish is finely situated on the eastern shore of St. Bride's bay, in St. George's channel, and comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and the views from the higher grounds embrace extensive prospects over the channel and the adjacent country, which abounds with picturesque beauty. The parish rates are collected by the ploughland. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Madoc, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £47. 18.

HASGUARD, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4½ miles (N. W. by W.) from Milford, containing 106 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the western part of the county, and nearly in the centre of the peninsula which separates Milford haven from St. Bride's bay. The lands are all enclosed and cultivated, and the soil is generally productive; but the surrounding scenery, though pleasingly varied, is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature. The views from the higher grounds embrace some fine prospects over the adjacent country, having in the distance St. Bride's bay on the north, and Milford haven on the south. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £18. 6. 6., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £100. 12.

Arms.

HAVERFORDWEST, a sea-port, borough, and market town, and a county of itself, locally in the hundred of Rhôs, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $10\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Pembroke, and 250 (W. by N.) from London, through Gloucester and Monmouth, containing 4328 inhabitants. This town, called by the Welsh Hwlfordd, of which its present name is supposed to be a corruption, with the addition of another distinguishing syllable, was originally built by the Flemings, who, driven from their native country by an inundation of the sea, which laid waste a great part of Flanders, obtained from Henry I. an asylum in England, and were subsequently settled by that monarch in this part of Wales, in order to serve in some degree as a check upon the movements of the native inhabitants, who were constantly endeavouring to recover the territories of which they had been dispossessed by the English. The Flemings, who were equally expert in husbandry and in war, maintained possession of the district which had been assigned to them, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Welsh to regain their ancient possessions; and their descendants, who are easily distinguished from those of the aboriginal inhabitants by their language and manners, still constitute a distinct class among the inhabitants of the principality. The district in which these strangers thus settled, and of which Haverfordwest became the metropolis, obtained, from the similarity which subsisted, between the Flemings and the English, both in manners and in language, the appellation of "Little England beyond Wales." The town was fortified with a strong castle, erected on a commanding eminence above the Western Cleddau river, and surrounded by an embattled wall having four principal gates, three of which remained in nearly a perfect state till within a very recent period, but have been subsequently removed. The erection of the castle is by most writers attributed to Gilbert de Clare, first Earl of Pembroke, who appointed Richard Fitz-Tancred his castellan, upon whom he also conferred the lordship of Haverfordwest, in which he was succeeded by his son Robert, called also Robert de Hwlfordd, who founded on the bank of the river, at a short distance from the town, a priory of Black canons, in which he afterwards passed the remainder of his days. The lordship, upon this, devolved to the crown, and was granted by King John to Walter Marshall, or le Mareschal, from whose descendants it again reverted to the crown in the reign of Henry VII., and since that time has continued to form part of the royal demesnes. In 1220, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, taking advantage of the absence of the Earl of Pembroke, who had been appointed by Henry III. to the command of his forces in Ireland, laid waste the territories of that nobleman in Wales, and extended his ravages to this place, but was unable to make any impression on the castle. Richard II. honoured the town with his presence, and conferred upon it many valuable privileges: during his stay he confirmed a grant made by Robert Niger, of a burgage in Haverfordwest, to the Friars

VOL. I.

Preachers, which was the last public act of his reign. In that of Henry IV., the command of this fortress was entrusted to the Earl of Arundel, who valiantly defended it against the assaults of the French auxiliaries whom Charles VII. of France had sent over to the aid of Owain Glyndwr. These forces, immediately after landing at Milford, advanced to this place and laid siege to the castle, but they experienced so formidable a resistance from the garrison, and sustained so considerable a loss in their numbers, that, after setting fire to the town and suburbs, they were compelled to abandon their attempt to reduce it. During the civil war in the seventeenth century, the castle was garrisoned for the King by Sir John Stepney, but was never regularly besieged: the garrison, apprized of the rapid successes of the parliamentarians in the surrounding country, hastily withdrew, leaving behind them their ordnance and all their military stores and ammunition.

The town, which may be regarded as the modern capital of Pembrokeshire, is finely situated at one of the inland extremities of Milford Haven, upon the declivities, and at the base, of very steep hills, round which the Western Cleddau flows: it consists of numerous streets, some of which are regularly built, and contain the town residences of many of the neighbouring gentry; others are steep and narrow, and, from the inequalities of the ground, which prevail throughout the town, travelling is attended with much inconvenience. The streets are but indifferently paved, and the town is partially supplied with water from the "Fountain Head," on the road to Milford, which is brought by pipes into a public conduit; and also to private houses, on the payment of a small annual rate to the lessee of the corporation, by whom this plan for supplying the town was carried into effect about a century ago. Considerable alterations are at present contemplated under the provisions of an act of parliament, about to be obtained, for removing nuisances and widening the streets and bridges. The plan embraces the removal of certain obstructions in the line of a new street, to be formed in continuation of the High-street, to Cartlet bridge, on the other side of the river, a distance of a quarter of a mile; the erection of a new bridge across the Cleddau, and the improvement of the other approaches; lighting the town with gas, the supply of the upper part of it with water, and the construction of a common sewer. These alterations, which are to be carried into effect under the superintendence of Messrs. W. and J. Owen, architects of this place, will materially contribute to the improvement of the town, and render it in every respect worthy of the distinguished rank which it holds among the chief towns in the principality. The views from the higher grounds are extensive; and along the summit of the castle hill is a public walk, overlooking the river and the ruins of the ancient priory, and commanding an extensive prospect of the surrounding country. Theatrical performances occasionally take place by itinerant companies, but no particular building is appropriated to that use; and meetings are held at the assembly-rooms, which, though possessing no exterior attractions, are considered as the best ball-rooms in South Wales. The Pembrokeshire races take place annually in the Autumn, and are held on "Poor-field," commonly called Portfield, an unenclosed and spacious common adjoining the town. They were originally established about sixty years ago, but afterwards partially abandoned: in 1829 they were re-established, and are liberally supported, and in general well attended: the members for the county and the borough each give a plate of £50; and a £50 plate is also given by the tradesmen of the town, exclusively of sweepstakes, contingent on the amount of subscriptions. The Pembrokeshire Hunt, established in the year 1813, and which is supported by the principal gentry of the county, has its meetings at this town, where a pack of fox-hounds is kept. The hounds go out twice every week during the season; but in the second week in November, called the "Hunt Week," the members assemble in the town, and the hounds are out three days, namely, Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, on the evenings of which days a ball is held at the assembly-rooms.

The port is dependent on that of Milford, to which it is a creek, having a custom-house subordinate to the establishment there; but from its central situation it attracts considerable trade, chiefly coastwise: the exports are principally oats and butter, with a small quantity of leather and bark; the imports are chiefly groceries, manufactured goods, and other miscellaneous articles, for the supply of the shops. Coal is brought by water from Newport in Monmouthshire, and from Liverpool; but the poorer inhabitants principally use culm, which is brought from a distance of about three miles: the hard or stone coal, for malting, procured about five or six miles off, is here shipped to the southern coast of England, and even to London. A great quantity of native cattle is sent from the neighbouring district for sale to the English market. The river is navigable to the bridge for barges, to a lower part of the town for larger vessels, and to a place immediately below the town for ships of two hundred and fifty tons' burden. According to the official returns, one hundred and thirty vessels (including different arrivals of the same) entered inwards, and fifty-nine (reckoning as above) cleared outwards, at this port, in the year ending January 5th, 1831; and in the course of the same year five hundred and thirty-eight quarters of wheat, six hundred and thirty-eight quarters of barley, and seven thousand seven hundred and thirty-one quarters of oats, were shipped coastwise. The trade of the town consists chiefly in the supply of the inhabitants and the neighbourhood with various articles of home consumption, and its commercial intercourse is greatly facilitated by its situation on the mail-coach road from London to Ireland, by way of Milford. The markets are held on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, the last of which is for corn; and during the three winter months an additional market is held, every Thursday, for the sale of cattle. Fairs, at which tolls are taken, for the sale of horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs, are held annually on May 12th, June 12th, July 18th, September 23rd, and October 18th; and another, which is toll-free, has been recently established. A very commodious market-house has lately been erected; it is a spacious quadrilateral building, containing covered shambles for eighty butchers, with ample accommodations for the sale of poultry, butter, vegetables, and hardware: there are also convenient market-places for the sale of corn and fish.

Corporate Seal.

Reverse.

This town, which had received divers privileges from Richard II., was, by charter of Edward IV., constituted a county of itself, and invested with additional immunities, which were afterwards confirmed by the 27th of Henry VIII., which conferred corporate rights and the privilege of returning a member to parliament. A subsequent charter of incorporation was granted by James I., confirming the previous grant, and enacting, amongst other important things, that the sites of the priory and house of Friars Preachers, the hill called Prior's Hill, the prior's marshes, and the friars' gardens, situated within the limits of the town, should for the future be esteemed part of the said town and county of the town of Haverfordwest. Under this last charter the corporation consists of a mayor, sheriff, two bailiffs, and twenty-four common-councilmen, of whom fifteen are styled aldermen, assisted by a town-clerk, chamber-reeve, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. By an ancient grant of the crown, made while Pembrokeshire was a county palatine, this town enjoys the privilege of having a lord-lieutenant of the town and county of the town, which is possessed by no other town in Great Britain. The mayor, who is also admiral of the port, coroner, escheator, and clerk of the market, is annually elected from the common-councilmen at the first hundred-days' court held after the festival of St. Michael: the sheriff is chosen from the same body, or from among the burgesses at large; and the bailiffs are elected from among the latter only. The borough first received the elective franchise in the 27th of Henry VIII., when its superior importance caused it to be endowed with this privilege in lieu of its being conferred on the Merionethshire boroughs, and since that time it has continued to return one member to parliament. The right of election was formerly vested in freeholders of forty shillings a year, inhabitants paying scot and lot, and the burgesses: but the late act for amending the representation of the people has vested it in freeholders in fee or fee tail of forty shillings per annum, in the present freeholders for life or lives of forty shillings, in after freeholders for life or lives of ten pounds, in resident burgesses and those within seven miles, in male householders occupying premises of the annual value of ten pounds, and in scot and lot inhabitants for their lives, provided they be capable of registering as the act demands. The towns of Fishguard and Narberth, and the villages of Prendergast and Uzmaston, are now entitled to share in the representation. The present number of houses of the annual value of ten pounds within the limits of the borough, which have been enlarged by the late Boundary

Act, and are minutely described in the Appendix to this work, is three hundred and ninety-six; and the number of resident burgesses is one hundred and forty-two, and of those within seven miles, fifty-six: the sheriff of Haverfordwest is the returning officer. The freedom of the borough is obtained by birth, being inherited by all the sons of a freeman; by servitude of seven years to a resident freeman; and by election of the burgesses at large, on the presentation of the mayor and common-council. The mayor for the time being, and his immediate predecessor for one year only after the expiration of his mayoralty, are justices of the peace within the limits of the town and county of the town, within which the magistrates of the county of Pembroke have no concurrent jurisdiction: the other magistrates of the town are appointed in the same manner as in counties at large. The corporation hold courts of assize and quarter session, at which the mayor presides, for the trial of all offenders not accused of capital crimes; a court of record every month, for the recovery of debts to any amount exceeding forty shillings; a fourteen-days' court, for the recovery of debts under that amount; and a mayor's, or, as it is generally called, a hundred-days' court, for swearing in burgesses, and transacting other business relating to the corporation. The assizes for the county of Pembroke are also held at Haverfordwest, which by the late act has been made one of the polling-places in county elections. The guildhall, situated at the extremity of High-street, (and obstructing a fine view of the venerable church of St. Mary, of which the tower, when surmounted by its delicate spire, must have formed a fine object terminating the view,) is a plain structure, comprising only, in the upper story, the court in which the assizes and sessions are held: there is no room for the accommodation of the grand jury, who consequently sit at one of the principal inns: the lower part was formerly appropriated to the use of the market, previously to the erection of the new market-place. The borough gaol and house of correction, a modern building situated on St. Thomas' Green, in the upper part of the town, is now, by a recent act of parliament, devoted to a lunatic asylum, as well for Pembrokeshire as for Haverfordwest; and by the same act the common gaol and house of correction for Pembrokeshire, to the purposes of which the remains of the ancient castle have been assigned, are appropriated for the reception of prisoners both for Pembrokeshire and Haverfordwest: the buildings are well calculated for the classification of prisoners, and comprise eight wards; two work-rooms, one for males and one for females; eight day-rooms and eight airing-yards, in one of which is a tread-mill.

The town and county of the town comprise the whole of the parish of St. Mary, and part of the parishes of St. Thomas and St. Martin, together with a very small part of the parish of Prendergast, and a large extra-parochial area called "Poor-field:" the parishes of St. Thomas and St. Martin also comprise divisions respectively called the hamlets of St. Thomas and St. Martin, which are within the hundred of Rhôs; the hamlet of St. Thomas separately maintains its own poor, independently of that part of the parish which is within the borough. The living of St. Mary's is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St.

David's, endowed with £20 per annum chargeable on the tithes of the parish of Tremaen, in the county of Cardigan, under the will of Mr. Laugharne, dated in 1714, for reading daily prayers; with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Corporation, who are impropriators of the tithes, and pay the incumbent a stipend of £100 per annum. The church, situated at the upper end of High-street, is a spacious and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a low tower, which was anciently surmounted by a spire of elegant proportion. The interior consists of a nave, chancel, and north aisle: the nave is lofty, and ceiled with panelled oak, richly ornamented with carving; it is lighted on each side by a range of clerestory windows, of various character, and is separated from the chancel by a lofty pointed arch, supported by clustered columns, and from the north aisle by a series of similar arches of lower elevation, resting on clustered columns having capitals richly ornamented with sculpture. The east windows of the chancel are lofty, and highly enriched with tracery; and the windows of the north aisle, which are similarly embellished, are of good proportion and elegant design. There are several good monuments, and in the chancel are some of splendid character, to the memory of various members of the family inheriting the neighbouring seat of Picton Castle. The living of St. Thomas' is a rectory not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is situated on the summit of a hill, and in the centre of an extensive cemetery, overlooking the ruins of the priory: according to some records preserved at St. David's, it appears to have been built in the year 1225; but these most probably refer to the ancient church of the priory, which was also dedicated to St. Thomas, for there is nothing in the style of architecture which corroborates that testimony: it is a plain building, with a square tower crowned with a projecting battlement. The living of St. Martin's is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Hugh Webb Bowen, Esq. The church, supposed to be the most ancient in the town, is a venerable structure, displaying portions in the early style of English architecture, with a low tower surmounted by an elegant spire: it consists of a nave, chancel, and south aisle, but has suffered so extensively by the insertion of windows and other alterations, that little of its original character remains: the nave and chancel are long and lofty, and are separated by a fine old arch, which reaches to the roof; in the chancel, on the southern side, are some ancient stalls in recesses. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, Moravians, and Presbyterians.

The free grammar school was founded by Thomas Lloyd, of Kŷl Kifŷh, Esq., who, by will dated November 22nd, 1612, endowed it with dwelling-houses, lands, and fee-farm rents, in the parish of St. Martin, Pembrokeshire, and in the parishes of St. Mary, St. Thomas, and St. Martin, in the town and county of Haverfordwest, producing at present an income of £144. 15. 4.: to this, Mr. John Milward, late of this town, added a third part of certain houses and lands near Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, giving the other two portions respectively to the master of the Birmingham free grammar school, and the Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxford, for the foundation of a scholarship in that college for a boy from each of those schools alternately. The portion of the estate assigned to the school of this town, having been let by the corporation, who are trustees, upon a lease of ninety-nine years, produces only £18 per annum, and the other two portions being injudiciously let on leases for twenty-one years, subject to large fines on renewal, produce only £8. 6. 8. per annum each; consequently, the scholarship is not sufficient to induce any young man from either of those schools to enter at that college: the mastership of the Haverfordwest school is in the gift of the mayor and corporation, who also nominate the boys to be educated in it. Sir John Perrot, in 1579, by deed gave certain houses, lands, and fee-farm rents, in the parish of Camrhôs, in Pembrokeshire, and in the parishes of Haverfordwest, now producing £173. 16. 4. per annum, for the repair of the roads, walls, bridges, and quays, and for the general improvement of the town, and supplying it with water. James Howard bequeathed an annuity of £22, payable out of an estate in the parish of Merton, in the county of Surrey, for the augmentation of Haverfordwest hospital, which annuity, as no such hospital has existed for many years in the town, is divided by the corporation among the poor. William Vawer, by deed in 1607, gave houses, lands, and fee-farm rents, in the parish of St. Mary, Haverfordwest, and in the city of Bristol, now producing £161. 14. 4. per annum, towards the support of six decayed burgesses of this town; and Anne Laugharne bequeathed an annuity of £6, payable out of an estate at Boulston, near this place, for the relief of aged women of honest fame in the parishes of St. Mary and St. Thomas: to the poor of the latter parish the late Captain Parr, of this town, also bequeathed £5 per annum, to be distributed in bread. Mary Tasker, otherwise Howard, bequeathed certain farms and lands in the parish of Camrhôs, now producing £133. 14. 4. per annum, for the erection of an almshouse, and for the education of poor children of both sexes, in the parishes of Rudbaxton, Steynton, and Haverfordwest. The same benefactress also bequeathed, in 1634, an annuity of £20 for the maintenance of poor children; and William Middleton gave £100 for apprenticing four poor children of the town: the former of these benefactions does not appear to have been ever paid. In addition to these several charities, for the appropriation of which the corporation are trustees, are numerous others, of which the greater part, also in their patronage, have been lost by failure of securities in their investment, or by other accidents. Of these may be noticed, a bequest of £265 by Richard Howell and Owen Phillips, for the use of the poor; £200 bequeathed by Rebecca Flaerton, in 1744, for the relief of aged widows, on the nomination of Robert Prust; £100 by William Middleton, for apprenticing poor children; £80, given in 1739, by Mary Llewelyn, for such charitable purpose as should be recommended by Robert Prust; £100 by a person unknown, for the relief of insolvent debtors in the gaol of this town; £100 given by William Fortune, in 1764, to the poor of this town; a rent-charge of £10 by William Wheeler, for the poor; an annuity of £3. 10. given by Thomas Roch, in 1707; and various other donations which appear to have been for a considerable time unavailable to the purposes for which they were originally given.

The priory of Black canons, originally founded, as before observed, by Robert de Hwlfordd, and situated in a meadow on the western bank of the river Cleddau, continued to flourish till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was estimated at £135. 6. 1., and the site was granted to Roger and Thomas Barlow. The present remains, consisting chiefly of the skeleton of the church and some foundations of ancient buildings, afford indications of an establishment originally of considerable extent: the church was a spacious cruciform structure, apparently in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty central tower, supported on four noble arches, of which portions are still remaining: it appears to have been one hundred and sixty feet in length from east to west, and eighty feet in breadth along the transepts, and was no less elegant than spacious, the windows being composed of lancet-shaped lights. The house of the Friars Preachers originally occupied the site on which the Black Horse Inn, in Bridge-street, was subsequently built: its founder, and the exact time of its erection, are unknown, but it was in existence prior to the time of Richard II., in whose reign, as before noticed, the grant of a burgage for the enlargement of the house was confirmed. To this establishment Bishop Hoton left £10, and his successor, Bishop John Gilbert bequeathed £100, with vestments, desiring also to be interred within its walls. The castle, from the discovery at various times of foundations of buildings and portions of ruined walls, appears to have occupied the whole of a rocky ridge on the northern declivity of the eminence on which the town is situated; and from its commanding site, as well as from its extent and massive walls, it forms a conspicuous and imposing object, towering above all the surrounding buildings, and overlooking the town. The remains consist principally of the keep, a spacious quadrangular pile, with lofty and massive walls, and which, from the elegance of its pointed windows and other architectural embellishments, especially on the eastern side facing the river, appears to have comprised the chapel and the state apartments, and conveys an idea of its original grandeur and magnificence. This venerable portion of the remains has been converted into the county gaol, without in any degree detracting from its interest as a noble relic of ancient baronial splendour. In the suburb of Pendergast, on the opposite side of the river, are the remains of an ancient mansion, formerly inhabited by a family of that name; and about a mile and a half below the town is the ancient seat of the family of Haroldston, now in ruins. Skomar, an islet off the coast of Pembrokeshire, near the mouth of the Bristol channel, forms part of the parish of St. Martin: it consists principally of limestone rock, and comprises an extent of about seven hundred acres, of which a considerable portion is let to a resident tenant, and in a state of cultivation: it is plentifully supplied with water, and abounds with rabbits. This islet, which forms the northern limit of St. Bride's bay, is separated by a strait about a mile and a half in breadth, called Broad Sound, from the islet of Skokham, which is about three miles from the main land, and about five miles west by south from the mouth of Milford haven. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1082. 7. for the whole town, of which the proportion for the parish of St. Martin is £402. 3., for that of St. Mary £510. 9., and for St. Thomas' £169. 15.

HÂVODDRYINOG (HÂVOD-DREINIÖG), a hamlet in the parish of LLANWONNO, hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (S.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 679 inhabitants. Near the junction of the Tâf and the Rhondda, at the south-eastern extremity of the hamlet, stands the modern and thriving village of Newbridge, where a weekly market for provisions is held, and whence a considerable quantity of corn is conveyed by the canal, for the supply of Merthyr-Tydvil. Within a quarter of a mile of the village is the celebrated bridge of Pont y Prydd, thrown from the bold and wooded banks of the Tâf across that river, consisting of one arch of one hundred and forty feet in the span and thirty-five in height, with three cylindrical and graduated holes in each spandril, to lighten the weight of the haunches, and a low parapet on the top, so as to give the whole the extremely light appearance of an elevated bow projecting from bank to bank. This extraordinary effort of art was projected by, and executed under the superintendence of, William Edwards, son of a farmer in the neighbouring parish of Eglwysilan, who, after two unsuccessful attempts, accomplished his arduous undertaking in 1755. The view of the scenery up the vale of the Rhondda from the top of this bridge, and from another crossing that river at right angles with the former, is highly interesting and beautiful. There is a succession of three waterfalls within a short distance of each other, rivalling in grandeur and picturesque beauty: the first is called the "Salmon Leap," and the others follow between this and the junction of the Rhondda Vechan, where there is another bridge, called Pont y Cymmer, which, with the high, precipitous, and well-wooded rocks bounding these rivers, adds to the extreme beauty of the scene. A rail-road passes from the Cardiff canal up the right bank of the Rhondda Vawr to some coal-pits in the upper part of the vale.

HAWARDEN, a market town and parish, comprising several hamlets, of which that of Saltney only separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (E. by N.) from Mold,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  (S. E.) from Flint, and 196 (N. W.) from London, and containing 5414 inhabitants. This place, which is of very remote antiquity, was by the Welsh called "Pennard Halawg," or more properly "Pen y Llwh," the headland above the lake, probably from the Saltney and other marshes, which now form an extensive flat between it and Chester, having been formerly covered by the sea; and by the people inhabiting that district, of which the principal part is comprehended within this parish, the town is still called Pennard. In the Norman Survey it occurs under the Saxon appellation "Haordine," of which its present name is only a very slight modification. It is supposed to have been originally occupied by the ancient Britons, as a barrier against the incursions of the Cornavii, a portion of whose territories were adjacent to this part of the principality; and to have served also as a place of defence against the invasion of the Romans. This opinion seems to derive confirmation from the appearance of several heights within the town and its vicinity, which exhibit strong indications of having been fortified in the ancient British manner. The open nature of the surrounding country rendered it an easy prey to the Mercian Saxons, during whose occupation of this place it formed the principal manor of the extensive hundred of Atiscros; and at the time of the Norman Conquest it was in the possession of Edwin, a Saxon chieftain, who, for the protection of the territories which his predecessors had usurped in this portion of the principality, is said to have occasionally resided at this place, which served also as a frontier to his Mercian dominions. On the conquest of Britain by William I., Hawarden was included in the extensive territories granted by the Conqueror to Hugh Lupus, and formed part of the county palatine of Chester. The castle was soon afterwards erected, and appears to have been in the possession of Roger Fitzvalerine, son of one of the numerous followers of the Conqueror, from whom it passed to the family of the Montaults, or de Montalto, barons of Mold, who held it as seneschals of the palatinate, and made it their principal residence.

The peculiar situation of this place, on the only part of the marches through which access could be obtained by the English to the heart of North Wales, subsequently rendered it the scene of many of the most important events connected with the subjugation of the principality. In the year 1157, Henry II., having assembled a formidable army at Chester, advanced into Flintshire with a view to the conquest of Wales, and encamped his forces on Saltney marsh, in this parish. To repel this attack, Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, led his forces to Basingwerk near Holywell, where he took up his station within a few miles of the royal army. The boldness of Owain's movements inducing Henry to hope that he intended to risk a general engagement, in which he expected that the superior number and discipline of the English would ensure them success, the king despatched a chosen body of troops, under the command of his principal barons, to bring the Welsh to action, or to dislodge them from their post. This party, having to pass through the narrow defile of Coed Euloe, were suddenly attacked in that dangerous pass by Davydd and Cynan, sons of Owain, who with a strong body of forces had been placed in ambush to surprise them. The English, from the suddenness and impetuosity of the assault, and the difficulties of the ground on which they had to contend, were routed with great slaughter; and the few who escaped retired, in the utmost disorder, to the main body of the army. Henry, exasperated by this unexpected discomfiture, immediately arranged the whole of his forces, and pursued his march along the sea-coast into the heart of the enemy's country; and Owain, breaking up his camp, retired with his forces to St. Asaph. On the extinction of the ancient Earls of Chester, the castle of this place, together with several other fortresses, was resumed by the crown; and in 1264 Llewelyn Prince of Wales held a conference at Hawarden with Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, in order to negotiate a treaty of peace. In the following year, the Earl of Leicester compelled Henry III., whom he held in captivity, to yield up this castle to the Welsh prince, by whom it appears to have been destroyed; for, among other articles of a proposed treaty of marriage between Llewelyn and

Eleanor de Montfort, the Welsh prince undertook to restore to Robert de Montault all his lands in Hawarden, restraining him at the same time, by an additional clause, from erecting any castle, fortress, or strong hold for the ensuing thirty years. The castle appears, notwithstanding, to have been soon rebuilt, and, on the suppression of Leicester's rebellion, to have reverted to the crown; for, in the year 1280, notice of it occurs under the appellation "Castrum Regis."

In the fifth year of the reign of Edward I., that monarch, intending to penetrate the principality by that part of its frontier which borders upon the river Dee, advanced with a large army from Cheshire, and encamped his forces on Saltney marsh, while his pioneers were employed in opening roads through a deep forest which occupied much of the country between the confines of Cheshire and the mountains of Snowdon. In this post they remained till Edward had erected the castle of Flint, and strengthened that of Rhuddlan, for the preservation of those parts of the principality which he had already subdued; after which that monarch led his forces to Aberconway, where he compelled Llewelyn to conclude a treaty of peace on the most humiliating terms. The severity of these conditions excited a general feeling of disgust among the Welsh chieftains, who simultaneously united to throw off the yoke which Edward had imposed upon them, and took up arms to resist his authority. Davydd, the brother of Llewelyn, to whom he had but recently been reconciled, committed the first act of hostility, by surprising the castle of this place, which he attacked during a dark and stormy night on the evening of Palm-Sunday, 1282; having taken the fortress, he put the garrison to the sword, and wounded and took prisoner Roger de Clifford, justiciary of Chester, whom he carried off to Snowdon. This act of violence was the signal for a general insurrection of the Welsh, which terminated in the defeat and death of Llewelyn, and in the entire subjugation of Wales to the English crown. The castle remained in the possession of the family of Montault, till the first year of the reign of Edward III., when Robert, the last baron, dying without heirs, it was assigned to Isabel the queen mother, on whose subsequent disgrace it reverted to the crown. Edward III., in 1337, granted the stewardship of Chester, with the castle of Hawarden, to William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, in whose family it continued till the death of his grandnephew, John Earl of Salisbury, who was beheaded at Cirencester in the year 1400, after an unsuccessful insurrection in favour of his deposed sovereign, Richard II., when it again reverted to the crown. Henry IV. bestowed the castle on his second son, Thomas Duke of Clarence, after whose death at the battle of Baugy, in 1420, it passed to Henry V., by whom it was granted to his son, afterwards Henry VI., who in 1443 conferred it on Sir Thomas Stanley, comptroller of his household; but resuming the grant in 1450, that monarch bestowed it on his son Edward Prince of Wales. The castle afterwards passed to the Nevilles, Earls of Salisbury, and from them to Lord Stanley, whose son and heir, Thomas, afterwards Earl of Derby, married Margaret, Countess of Richmond, and mother of Henry VII. This monarch spent some time at the castle on a visit to his mother, for the purpose of amusing himself with the diversion of the chase; but his principal object was to reconcile the earl after the ungrateful execution of his brother, Sir William Stanley. After the death of Margaret, the castle descended to Thomas Earl of Derby, grandson of the late earl, and remained in that family till the execution of James, the seventh earl, who was beheaded at Bolton in 1651, after which it was placed in sequestration by the parliament. Soon after the commencement of the parliamentary war, the castle was betrayed by the governor into the possession of the parliament, who retained it in their hands till 1643, when it was attacked by a party of royalists under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Marrow, to whom after a fortnight's siege, the garrison, beginning to want provisions, surrendered, on condition of being allowed to march out with half arms, and to have a convoy to Wem, or Nantwich. The castle remained in the possession of the royalists till after the surrender of Chester to Sir William Brereton, in 1645, when it was besieged by Major-General Mytton; the garrison sustained the assault for several weeks, till the governor, having received orders from the king, surrendered it upon honourable terms: it was, towards the close of the same year, together with four other castles in this part of the principality, dismantled by a vote of the parliament. After the death of James, seventh earl of Derby, the castle was purchased from the agents of the sequestration by Serjeant Glynne, who, on the Restoration, compounded with the eighth earl of Derby, from whom he obtained a grant of this property, which has descended to his heirs, and is now in the possession of Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, Bart.

The town is situated within a mile and a half of the south bank of the river Dee, on the turnpike road from Chester to Holyhead, and consists principally of one street, nearly a mile in length; the houses are in general well built, and the town, though not paved, is amply supplied with water. Considerable improvements have been made in the neighbourhood, by the commissioners of the turnpike roads, who have recently expended £1000 in diminishing the ascent of the hill at the lower end of the town. The parish abounds with coal in various parts, the strata of which lie under freestone and shale of a saponaceous quality, with occasional beds of ironstone and gravel; the upper seam of coal, which is called the Hollin coal, is from six to seven feet in depth; the second, which is called the Brassy coal, is about three feet in thickness; the third, which is called the rough coal, is also about three feet thick; and the fourth and lowest seam, which is called the main coal, is ten feet in thickness: this last, which is of very superior quality, is in great request for the Dublin market. Collieries, which are worked on an extensive scale, have been established in various parts of the parish; and there are also several large brick and tile works, in the former of which fire-bricks of various sizes are made, besides numerous potteries for the manufacture of the coarser kinds of earthenware. An extensive iron-foundry is still carried on in the town, and attached to it is a mill for boring cannon, which was formerly cast here. A laboratory for the making of Glauber salts, sal ammoniac, and ivory black, has been established in the township of Saltney since the year 1781, and is conducted on an extensive scale. The river Dee, or Chester channel, passes within a mile and a half of the town; and there are two rail-roads for the conveyance of the produce of the various collieries and potteries to the river. Several schooners and flats are employed in the transport of coal, bricks, and other articles produced here; and two smacks are engaged in a fishery off the Isle of Man, which is conducted by inhabitants of the parish. In 1734, Messrs. Kinderley and Co. obtained an act of parliament for improving the navigation of the river Dee, under the provisions of which a canal from Chester to the estuary of that river, passing through Saltney marsh in this parish, was completed in 1737: the company, incorporated under the name of the "Company of proprietors of the undertaking for recovering and preserving the navigation of the river Dee," in prosecution of their work, appropriated to their own use eight hundred acres of the marsh on the north side of the canal, in consideration of which they are bound by the act to pay to the lord of the manor of Hawarden, and other trustees, £200 per annum, to be applied to any use that five of them may direct; they are also charged with the maintenance of two ferries across the new channel of the Dee. A considerable acquisition was also made to the parish in the enclosure of more than three thousand acres of land on the north side of the Dee, by the same company, between the years 1754 and 1790; this district, now called Sealand, forms a township in the parish. In 1778, an act of parliament was obtained for enclosing Saltney marsh, under the provisions of which about two thousand acres were erected into a township, called Saltney, which now maintains its own poor: several hundred acres of the marsh are still unenclosed and open to the sea. The market is on Saturday; and fairs, principally for cattle, are annually held on April 28th and October 22nd. The town is within the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty sessions monthly; and courts leet and baron are held in May and at Michaelmas by the lord of the manor, at which respectively constables are appointed, and debts under forty shillings are recoverable. A house of correction has been erected on the site of an ancient cross, of which there were formerly two in the town.

The living is a rectory, in the peculiar and exempt jurisdiction of the incumbent, rated in the king's books at £66. 6. 5½., and in the patronage of Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, Bart. The rector holds his ecclesiastical court on the Tuesday preceding Holy Thursday. The church, dedicated to St. Deiniol, is an ancient and spacious structure, with a square embattled tower, and was thoroughly repaired in 1764, towards defraying the expense of which the Hawarden trustees appropriated £700 from the annual payments of the river Dee company; the chancel was almost entirely rebuilt in 1817, at an expense of £1400, jointly defrayed by the Hon. and Rev. George Neville Grenville, the present rector, Charles Dundas, Esq., and the inhabitants. In the hamlet of Buckley a new church was erected in 1822, by grant of the parliamentary commissioners, who gave the sum of £4000 for that purpose: it is a neat edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire, and contains seven hundred and forty sittings, of which four hundred and eighteen are free: the living is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Rector. In the township of Broughton is also a chapel of ease to the mother church. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A grammar school was founded here, in 1606, by Mr. George Ladsham, who bequeathed £300 for its erection and endowment. The school-room was built in 1608, at the west corner of the churchyard, and was rebuilt and enlarged, and a house erected for the master, in 1814, by the feoffees, from small savings accumulated at compound interest, and by subscription among the inhabitants; and a piece of ground was given to it by Sir Stephen R. Glynne. The salary of the master, including the interest of a donation of £50, is now £20 per annum. Three National schools in different parts of the parish, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of both sexes, are supported principally by the rector and by Sir Stephen and Lady Glynne. Two schools on the National system were erected at Buckley in 1819, and a dwelling-house for the master, at an expense of £1200, defrayed by subscription. A Sunday school is supported in connexion with the established church. There were numerous charitable donations and bequests for the poor of the parish, but the greater part has been lost by bad securities: the remainder is distributed among the poor, according to the intention of the benefactors. The ruins of the ancient castle of Hawarden occupy an artificial eminence at the eastern extremity of the town, within the park of Sir Stephen R. Glynne; the wide and deep trenches by which it was defended now form picturesque ravines filled with trees of luxuriant growth, above which the ruins are seen with romantic effect: a considerable improvement has been made in the appearance of these remains, by the removal of the accumulated ruins of the walls, by which the foundation was concealed. It appears to have been originally of a pentagonal form, with a strong gateway entrance on the western side, and a barbican on another of its sides: the principal portion now remaining is the keep, a circular tower situated in one of the angles of the enclosed area, and nearly entire; the other remains are chiefly fragments of the walls and various buildings, some of which appear to have been subterraneous chambers, appropriated as dungeons for the confinement of prisoners. About a quarter of a mile from the turnpike road leading from Chester to Holyhead, within this parish, are the picturesque ruins of Euloe castle, supposed to have been an outpost dependent on the castle of Mold: from their situation in a retired and thickly wooded dingle, they cannot easily be found without the assistance of a guide: they occupy a site defended on one side by a deep ravine, and on the other by a wide fosse, and consist chiefly of the remains of a large oblong tower, rounded at one extremity, about fourteen yards in length and twelve in breadth: there are also some outworks, the principal of which encloses a quadrangular area, at one angle of which are the remains of a circular tower. These ruins are finely mantled with ivy, and have a very picturesque appearance. To the west of the church are the remains of an ancient British encampment, called Truman's Hill; and near Broad-lane House are vestiges of another, called Connah's Hill. Hawarden Castle, the seat of Sir Stephen Richard Glynne, Bart., is a stately and handsome castellated mansion, situated within an extensive park, comprising much diversified scenery, and comprehending the site and remains of the ancient castle: the grounds are tastefully laid out and ornamented with extensive and thriving plantations. Sir John Glynne, the ancestor of the present proprietor, was a man of distinguished talents, and during the parliamentary war was made steward of Westminster, which city he represented in the two parliaments of 1640, and recorder of London; he was afterwards appointed by Cromwell one of his council, and made chamberlain of Chester. On the Restoration he was favourably received by Charles II., who bestowed on him the honour of knighthood, and created his eldest son a baronet: he retired from public business, and in 1666 died in London, and was interred in St. Margaret's church, Westminster. Hawarden gives the title of viscount to the family of Maude. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £1535. 6.

HAY, a market town and parish, in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, containing 1959 inhabitants, of which number, 1709 are in the town of Hay, 15 miles (N. E. by E.) from Brecknock, and 154 (W. by N.) from London, on the road through Hereford to Brecknock, Carmarthen, and Milford. The Welsh name of this town is Tregelli, variously rendered Hazelton, "the town in the hazel grove," or simply "the town in the forest," and probably derived from its proximity to the extensive forest of Traveley, Traneley, or Traneleia, so frequently mentioned in ancient grants, though no longer in existence. Its present legal name is supposed to be a modernized Norman translation of the Welsh appellation, having been derived from the Norman word haier, to enclose, and anciently written Haia. Leland and Camden are of opinion that the town was once occupied by the Romans: the former writer states that Roman coins, which the country people called Jew's money, and also the foundations of ancient buildings, had been discovered here; but these relics have long since disappeared, not even the memory of them being now preserved on the spot; and modern writers commonly ascribe to it a Norman origin. On the conquest of Brecknock by Bernard Newmarch, that powerful leader, in his division of the newly-acquired territory granted the manor of Hay to Sir Philip Walwyn, who, in the opinion of some writers, erected here a castle for his own residence and the security of his domains, but does not appear to have long remained in possession; for, by a grant made by William Revel, to the Benedictine priory at Brecknock, of the church of St. Mary "at the Hay," it is said to be given with the consent of his lord Bernard Newmarch, who was present at the dedication, and to whom the entire domain seems now to have belonged. The manor of Hay henceforward descended with the other possessions of this nobleman; and all accounts concur in stating that the castle was at last re-erected by his great grandson on the female side, William de Breos, some even considering him its sole founder, while, according to the vulgar tradition of the place, the same was effected in one night by the prodigious strength of his wife, Maud de St. Valeri, more familiarly known among the Welsh peasantry by the name of "Moll Walbee." Many other marvellous tales are related of the exploits of this lady, whom authentic history proves to have been a woman of masculine courage and understanding. On the attainder of William de Breos, the manor of Hay, with the other possessions of that nobleman, was forfeited to the crown, but was shortly restored, with the rest, to his son Giles, Bishop of Hereford: this prelate was succeeded in these possessions by his younger brother Reginald, who had married a daughter of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, and, with his father-in-law, joined the confederacy of the English barons against King John, who, highly incensed at this conduct, advanced at the head of an army into this part of the marches, in 1215, laid waste the country, and plundered the castle of Hay. This fortress was afterwards entirely demolished by the Welsh, but, in 1231, was rebuilt by Henry III., who, having no other immediate object to accomplish, employed upon this work the army which he then commanded in person in the marches. In 1233, it was taken by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, together with all the other castles belonging to the English in the ancient territory of Brycheiniog, except that of the borough of Brecknock. In 1263, it was taken by Prince Edward, afterwards Edward I., who being himself taken prisoner, with his royal father, in the following year, the confederate forces of Llewelyn ab Gruffydd and the English barons, under Simon de Montford, regained possession of it, and set it on fire. The decay and ruin which characterized this place in the reign of Henry VIII., when visited by Leland, and even down to a much later period, are ascribed to the frequent irruptions made by Owain Glyndwr into the marches; and it appears, from an instrument dated at Devynock, in September 1403, that many of the inhabitants of this lordship were suspected of favouring the cause of the Welsh chieftain. After the death of the last Duke of Buckingham of the Stafford family, the castle of Hay was restored to his son, the Lord Stafford: it afterwards, by some irregular means, became the property of James Boyle, as part of the possessions of the priory at Hereford, to which it had never belonged, and, in the reign of James I., descended to Howel Gwyn of Trêcastle, by marriage with Mary, granddaughter of Boyle; and this gentleman, it is supposed, erected on the site of part of the castle a mansion still standing, which appears, from the style of its architecture, to have been built in the latter part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, or in that of James I. On the death of Mrs. Gwyn, in 1702, it was let in apartments to different families.

The town is pleasantly situated on the southern bank of the river Wye, which here separates the counties of Brecknock and Radnor, but immediately below enters that of Hereford, and is bounded on the east by the small river Dulas, which falls into the Wye at this place, after separating for some distance the counties of Brecknock and Hereford. It consists of one principal thoroughfare, extending nearly parallel with the Wye, and of several other streets diverging from it in different directions: one of these leads north-westward to the church, another south-eastward round the castle, a third due east to the market-place, and a fourth northward to the same point. The whole is now being paved by a rate, producing about £90 per annum; but it is not lighted or supplied with water by any artificial means, enjoying an abundant supply of the latter from the Dulas. Within the last twenty or thirty years its improvement has been steadily progressive: the streets in many places have been widened, and divers unsightly obstructions removed; old houses have been modernized, and new ones of a highly respectable character built, among the latter of which is an excellent inn and posting-house. The principal remaining evidence of the ancient rudeness of the buildings is the market-house, which it is intended shortly to pull down and re-erect. At the extremity of one of the streets is a bridge over the Wye, partly of stone and partly of wood, replacing a handsome stone bridge of seven arches, destroyed by a flood in 1795, and some remains of which form part of the present structure: toll is taken on this bridge under the authority of an act of parliament obtained in the 29th of George II., which grants that privilege for a term of ninety-eight years, from the first day of August, 1763, at the expiration of which the bridge is to be toll-free. The air is remarkably salubrious; the environs comprehend much of the beautiful and picturesque scenery which adorns the banks of the Wye; and from the higher grounds in the parish are some fine views over the adjacent country, which abounds with objects of interest and with features of pastoral beauty. A woollen manufactory is carried on in the town, which affords employment to between seventy and eighty persons, chiefly in making fine Welsh flannels, and flannel shirting for the colliers and miners in the more southern manufacturing districts. The situation of this place, in the centre of an extensive and fertile agricultural district, on the confines of three several counties, is highly favourable for trade, although little use has hitherto been made of its natural advantages. The Wye, however, is only navigable to its vicinity after excessive floods, and then only for flat-bottomed barges, which are occasionally used for the conveyance of timber hence to Chepstow, when the annual fall in the vicinity is greater than the consumption. This town and its neighbourhood enjoy the advantage of obtaining coal and lime on moderate terms from the confines of the counties of Brecknock, Glamorgan, and Monmouth, by means of the Hay railway, constructed early in the present century, extending from the head of the Brecknockshire canal, at Brecknock, to Eardisley and Kington in the county of Hereford, the waggons on which return laden with agricultural produce to the southern mining districts. The market, which is abundantly supplied with grain, and with provisions of every kind, is on Thursday; and fairs, which are well attended for the sale of cattle, pigs, hardware, &c., are held annually on May 17th, the second Monday in June, August 12th, and October 10th. In the reign of James I., a market, in addition to the present, was held weekly on Monday, but it has since that period been discontinued. The town was anciently a borough by prescription, and a bailiff is still appointed, but he does not exercise magisterial authority. It is wholly under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates; and the borough court of record for the recovery of debts has long been disused. The lord of the manor holds a court leet and court baron annually, at the former of which is elected the bailiff, whose duties are now confined to billeting soldiers and receiving the tolls of the market and fairs. These tolls being formerly uncertain, and exacted at the will of the lord in an arbitrary manner, gave rise, in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., to frequent disputes, which in several instances were not terminated without loss of life. After various complaints the attorney-general, at Michaelmas term in the 6th of James I., filed an information against Howel Gwyn, then lord of the manor, to show by what right he exercised such arbitrary authority. This cause having been settled by the payment of a sum of money, a new grant was made to the lord, in which his brother-in-law, James Tomkins, was included; but a second information was filed in Hilary term, in the 4th of Charles I., in which they are charged with imprisoning several persons, and extorting large sums, by way of toll, from those who frequented the market and fairs: these tolls are, however, now fixed and certain.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 0. 5., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Arthur Macnamara, Esq. The ancient parish church, dedicated to St. John, and situated in the centre of the town, was, in 1684, in sufficient repair to be used as a school-house, though it had long ceased to be appropriated to the performance of divine service. In 1700, part of this building fell down, since which time the whole has been removed, and the site is now occupied by a small prison, or lock-up house. The present church is dedicated to St. Mary, and is situated at the western extremity of the town, overlooking the Wye: it is a small edifice, in the early style of English architecture, with a square tower at the west end; and consists of a nave and chancel, containing only four hundred sittings, of which forty are free. The pointed arch over the principal entrance, and that separating the nave from the chancel, are enriched with numerous mouldings, and with the toothed ornament: the font is also adorned in the same style. This is the church given to the Benedictine priory at Brecknock by William Revel, as above stated; but the general appearance of the present edifice shows it to be of a later date than the reign of William Rufus, in which that grant was made. The sacramental chalice, which is of silver, bears the inscription "Our Lady Paris of the Haia," and is apparently of very great antiquity. In the churchyard, which is of very small extent, and commands a fine view over part of the Vale of Wye, is an effigy of stone, much defaced, which is generally supposed to represent some female, and, according to the common tradition of the county, was placed there in memory of their celebrated townswoman, Maud de St. Valeri, or Waleri, wife of William de Breos; but, according to Mr. Jones, it was more probably designed to commemorate one of the monks of Brecknock, to whose monastery the church and its dependencies were attached. Between the churchyard and the town is a deep moat communicating with the Wye, which river flows under the northern side of the cemetery. An ancient chapel, which Leland notices as being situated in the environs of the town, has long since wholly disappeared. There are handsome places of worship for Baptists, and for Wesleyan and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. In the year 1827, National schools were established for children of both sexes, and school-rooms erected at an expense of £527, of which, £213 was raised by voluntary subscription, and £150 was granted by the parent society in London, the deficiency being supplied by the Rev. Humphrey Allen, curate of the parish, to whose indefatigable exertions the poor are chiefly indebted for the benefit of this excellent institution. The girls' school is for the present discontinued, but about fifty boys are now instructed in the other: the salary of the master is £47 per annum, of which £12 is paid by the Governors of Christ's Hospital, London, under the will of the late William Pennoyre, Esq., who left it to be paid to a schoolmaster for instructing poor children of this parish, together with £2 per annum for the purchase of books: the master is appointed by the Governors of Christ's Hospital. There are also three Sunday schools, one connected with the established church, and the other two with the Welsh and Wesleyan Methodist congregations, in which a great number of children are instructed by gratuitous teachers. An almshouse for six aged persons was founded here by Mrs. Elizabeth Gwyn, daughter and coheirress of Thomas Gwyn, of Hay Castle, Esq., who died in 1702, bequeathing a house, lately built by her in the Water-gate of this town, for the residence of six of the most poor and helpless inhabitants of the town and parish, to be appointed by the lord of the manor, the churchwardens, and the overseers; and endowed it with a tenement called Pen y Wern, in the parish of Disserth, in the county of Radnor, and £100 to be invested in purchasing other land, which was accordingly very profitably laid out in the purchase of a small tenement called Brÿnrhÿd, adjoining that of Pen y Wern; and the rents of both, now amounting to £28 per annum, are appropriated to the maintenance of the almspeople, as also is the interest of £400, vested in three per cent. stock, the amount of a single sale of timber cut from the estate, and that of a further sum of £670, arising from a second sale of timber, which was recovered for the parish by Mr. James Spencer, solicitor of this town, in whose hands it still remains, this gentleman paying for it an annual interest of five per cent. The present trustees of Mrs. Gwyn's charity are, six of the principal inhabitants of the town, with the churchwardens and overseers for the time being: the inmates of the almshouses are usually chosen from among the most deserving female objects of charity. Several other bequests have been made to the poor of this parish, which, however, have been lost: viz., £2. 10. per annum, charged on the estate of Lord Hereford; ten shillings per annum, charged by William Watkins, of Pen yr wrlodd, on his estate; and thirteen shillings and fourpence, charged on a tenement in the borough of Brecknock, by James Watkins; with other small donations. Near the western entrance into the town a remarkably neat stone building, in the Elizabethan style of architecture, comprising six small cottages of four rooms each, is now in progress of erection, at the expense of Miss Martha Harley, of Bayswater, in the county of Middlesex, who, it is said, intends to endow them as almshouses. The town was anciently surrounded by a wall, and, when visited by Leland, three of its gates and a postern were still standing. Near the church is a mound, noticed by the same antiquary as having probably been thrown up for some "fortres of bataille," which was once, perhaps, the site of a prison for the lordship of Hay. There are likewise some remains of the castle, consisting chiefly of a fine old gateway, beautifully mantled with ivy, affording evidence of the ancient grandeur and importance of this fortress, together with some walls, which are supposed to be portions of the castle erected by Henry III., and are now incorporated with the more modern edifice, erected on part of the site in the reign of Elizabeth or James I. In the reign of Henry VIII., some ruins of a gentleman's house in this town were pointed out to Leland as the remains of the mansion which had been the residence of Sir Elias Walwyn, who, in the year 1282, conducted the English army across the river Wye near Builth, in pursuit of Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, the last Prince of Wales of native British blood, whose melancholy death immediately ensued. At a short distance from the town, within the limits of the parish, stands Oakfield, a substantial modern mansion, the seat of Henry Allen, Jun., Esq. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the town and parish is £653. 2.

HAYSCASTLE (HAYS-CASTLE), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by N.) from Haverfordwest, containing 367 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable extent, is for the greater part enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation. It constitutes, together with that of Brawdy, a prebend attached to the decanal stall in the cathedral church of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, consolidated with that of Brawdy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Bishop, as Dean. The church is dedicated to St. Mary; and at the small village of Ford, in this parish, there is a chapel of ease. There are places of worship for Independents and Methodists. Several tumuli were formerly discernible in this parish, but they have been nearly levelled. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £50. 10.

HENDREDENNY (HENDRE-DENNI), a hamlet in the parish of EGLWYSILAN, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. S. E.) from Newbridge, containing 373 inhabitants. It is situated on the south-eastern declivity of a lofty hill, called Mynydd Moylo, and on the right bank of a stream, which separates it from the hamlet of Energlyn: on the banks of this stream are some iron-works, with a few pleasing residences and well-wooded enclosures.

HENDREVORVYDD (HENDRE-FORFUDD), a joint parcel with Penallt, in the parish of LLANGATTOCK, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W.) from Crickhowel. The population is returned with the parish. This parcel comprises the northern portion of the parish, and the Brecknock canal passes through the lower part of it, nearly parallel with the river Usk.

HENDREVYGILLT (HENDRE-VIGYLL), a township in the parish of HALKIN, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S.) from Holywell. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated close to the road between Northop and Holywell, and the inhabitants are principally employed at the lead mines in this district. The prospect of the æstuary of the Dee, the county of Chester, and the Vale Royal, on the approach to this place from Flint, is most extensive and pleasing, in consequence of its very elevated situation.

HENEGLWYS (HÊN-EGLWYS), a parish in the hundred of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W.) from Llangenvi, on the Holyhead road, containing 335 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which signifies the old church, is of considerable extent, and is situated in a marshy district surrounded by rugged and rocky elevations. The scenery of the neighbourhood is wild and dreary: the lands are principally enclosed and under cultivation, but the soil is cold and unproductive. Its situation, about half-way between Bangor and Holyhead, on the new line of road, has rendered it a place of some traffic; and the Mona Inn, a spacious and commodious hotel and posting-house, has been erected here for the accommodation of travellers; but the situation is bleak and exposed, and the immediate neighbourhood uninviting, consisting chiefly of swampy flats and rocky promontories. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Trêvwalchmai annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £9. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Llwydian, is an ancient edifice, distinguished by no architectural feature claiming especial notice. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. Hugh Hughes bequeathed land for apprenticing a poor boy of this parish, and for other uses; and William Bold, in 1688, gave land for the poor: there are also some smaller charitable donations, the produce of which is distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £185. 16.

HËN-GOED, a hamlet in the parish of LLANELLY, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N.) from Llanelly, containing 1183 inhabitants. The name implies an ancient wood, by which this place was formerly covered: several of the inhabitants are employed in the coal trade and in manufactures. The rail-road from Llanelly to the Mynydd Mawr mountain passes through this hamlet.

HËN-GOED, a hamlet in the parish of GELLYGAER, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (S.E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 273 inhabitants. It forms the south-eastern portion of the parish, and was formerly covered with wood, as the name implies. The river Romney, which is here crossed by two bridges, separates it from Monmouthshire on the east; and the greater number of the inhabitants consist of respectable families, whose residences are scattered on the banks of this river, and the streams falling into it.

HËNLLAN (HËN-LLAN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 122 inhabitants. This parish is beautifully situated on the river Teivy, over which here is an ancient bridge of three arches, with projecting angular piers, from which the turnpike road from Newcastle-Emlyn to Carmarthen, on which it is situated, is continued through the village. The scenery on the banks of the Teivy, at this place, is strikingly picturesque and beautiful, the channel of the stream being contracted by huge masses of projecting rock, over which the river rushes with great impetuosity, and the banks on both sides are ornamented with extensive and luxuriant groves. In this parish are some interesting cascades, formed by a rivulet which falls into the Teivy, a little above the bridge: these are called Frydiau Hênllan, or the "Hênllan Falls," and are the most picturesque in this part of the Vale of Teivy. Hênllan is within the lordship of Dyfryn Teivy and Atpar, belonging to the Bishop of St. David's, and comprising the entire parishes of Bangor and Hênllan, with part of that of Llandyvrïog, and two farms in that of Llandysilio-Gogo: courts for the lordship are held at Trebedic, in this parish. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to that of Bangor, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church is a very small edifice, not characterized by any remarkable architectural feature, but interesting from its secluded and picturesque situation. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £29. 8.

HËNLLAN (HËN-LLAN), a parish in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W.) from Denbigh, containing 2703 inhabitants. This parish, which is fifteen miles in length, and in some parts more than seven in breadth, though averaging about four, extends from St. Asaph, on the north-east, to the source of the river Alwen, near Llanrwst, on the south-west, embracing a large tract of country, in some parts richly wooded, and abounding with gentlemen's seats, in the grounds belonging to several of which are some of the most majestic oaks in the principality. The scenery is finely diversified, and from some of the higher grounds are obtained extensive and delightful views of the surrounding country, which is in many places characterized by features of great interest and beauty. About six thousand acres of waste land within its limits, together with the adjacent two thousand acres forming the tract called Denbigh Green, were enclosed under the authority of an act of parliament obtained in 1802: these lands are chiefly on the Hiraethog hills, and some portions of them have a sound soil upon limestone, while others are heathy and peaty: in making the enclosure, fifteen miles of new roads were formed. Here are several isolated limestone rocks, containing lead-ore. The village is partly within the limits of the borough of Denbigh, in returning a member for which place, the inhabitants of the portion so included are entitled to vote: in the township of Bannister Uchâv is even included a considerable portion of two streets of the town of Denbigh. The living is a rectory, annexed to the deanery of St. Asaph, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £20. The church, dedicated to St. Sadwrn, was taken down, and rebuilt upon an enlarged scale, in 1806: the new edifice, which is a neat plain structure, occupies the site of the ancient church, and is situated on a fine level; but the tower, a massive square pile, presenting each of its angles towards one of the cardinal points, and which was always detached, stands on the summit of a rock adjoining the road, and at a considerable distance to the east of the church. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists in the village, and for the latter also in the townships of Eriviatt and Lleweny, and one for Independents in the township of Uwch-Caeran. A National school was erected, in 1829, by subscription, aided by a grant from the parent society: in this establishment, which is supported by subscription, fifty boys and sixty girls at present receive gratuitous instruction. Three tenements, purchased with sums left by various benefactors, now produce a rental of £36. 10. per annum, which sum, together with the interest arising from other charitable bequests, is distributed in bread and flannel to the poor. At the bottom of Vale-street, Denbigh, but within the township of Bannister Uchâv, formerly stood a Carmelite priory, founded, according to some accounts, by John Salusbury, of Lleweny, before the year 1289, in which he died, but according to others, by John de Sunimore, in 1399: it flourished, and formed the mausoleum of the Salusbury family, until the dissolution, when its revenue was granted to Richard Andrews and William L'Isle. The ruins of the priory church have been converted into a malt-house, but the window-frames, richly ornamented, still remain; and on the site of this ancient establishment, now called the Abbey, a genteel mansion has lately been erected. Lleweny, in this parish, was the residence of Prince Davydd, brother of Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, and the last of the native princes of Wales, who was cruelly put to death at Shrewsbury by Edward I. The old mansion of Foxhall, now in ruins, was the residence of the celebrated antiquary, Humphrey Llwyd, who died there, and was buried at Whitchurch, near Denbigh, where a mural monument has been erected to his memory, on which is his effigy, in a Spanish dress, kneeling at an altar. In Gwaenynog park, in this parish, is a monumental urn to the memory of Dr. Johnson, which is noticed in the article on Denbigh. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1781. 16.

HENLLAN (HËN-LLAN), a hamlet forming that part of the parish of LLANDEWI-VELVREY which is in the hundred of DUNGLEDDEY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. E.) from Narberth, containing 39 inhabitants. It appears to have taken its name, signifying "the old church," from a chapel of ease, which, according to tradition, originally existed here. A considerable portion of the land within its limits, called "the Bishop's land," is tithe-free; and it is not improbable that, being in a detached portion of the hundred of Dungleddy, entirely surrounded by that of Narberth, it was originally wholly held of the bishop, and that the occupiers of it did service at Lawhaden, the principal residence of the bishops of St. David's. The seat of John Lewis, Esq., bearing the same name as the hamlet, is pleasantly situated on an eminence within its limits. There are no remains of the ancient chapel; but there is a place of worship for Baptists. In this part of the parish are two ancient British encampments, one called Cyra, probably a corruption of Caerau, the other Pen y Gaer, but no particulars of their history have been recorded. Within the last few years, a pot of silver coins was dug up on a farm in this hamlet, but, being sold immediately on their discovery, no particular account of them has been preserved. The inhabitants are assessed for the repair of their own roads, but do not separately support their poor.

HENLLAN-AMGOED (HËN-LLAN-AMGOED), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLÛS, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from St. Clear's, on the old road from Llanboidy to Narberth, containing, with the chapelry of Eglwys Vair a Chyrig, which supports its own poor, 411 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Tâf, is more than three miles in length, and two in breadth, and is for the most part enclosed and cultivated. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Freeholders in the parish. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. In a field in this parish, near a place called Cevn Varchen, is a Roman monumental stone, on which is inscribed, in rude characters, Cati Menvendani filii Barcuni; and in the neighbourhood are several remains of Roman and British antiquity. The late Rev. Nathaniel Rowlands, son of the celebrated Daniel Rowlands, of Llangeitho, was buried at this place: he was chaplain to the Duke of Gordon, and to Lady Huntingdon, and one of the most popular preachers of his time. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £180. 17., of which sum, £91. 8. is assessed on that portion of the parish which is not included within the chapelry of Eglwys Vair a Chyrig.

HËNLLÛS, a township in the parish of LLAN-VIHANGEL GENEU'R GLYN, upper division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Aberystwith, containing 496 inhabitants. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £112. 14.

HENRY'S MOAT, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 10½ miles (N. E. by N.) from Haverfordwest, containing 282 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from an ancient tumulus in the form of a truncated cone, surrounded by a moat, and in all probability formerly surmounted by a military work, called by the Welsh Castell Hên-drêv, or "the castle of the old town," which name has been corrupted by the English settlers in this part of the principality into its present appellation. The lands in this parish are for the greater part enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation; and considerable portions of unenclosed land, consisting chiefly of heath and turbaries, afford pasturage for sheep, and supply the principal fuel of the inhabitants. The soil is various, being rich and fertile in the lower and cultivated grounds, but in other parts of the parish poor and unproductive. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing; and the views over the adjacent country are interesting, and in some instances extensive. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Colonel Scourfield. The church, dedicated to St. Bernard, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £112. 5.

HËNVYNYW (HËN-VYNYW), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (N. W. by W.) from Lampeter, containing 625 inhabitants. This parish, which is washed on one side by the waves of the fine bay of Cardigan, in St. George's channel, is separated from the parish of Llandewy Aberarth by the powerful stream of the Aëron, and contains about two thousand acres of land, the soil of which is various, being in some places argillaceous and wet, and in others of a good quality for the produce of corn. It is intersected by the turnpike road from Cardigan to Aberystwith, and the neighbourhood is characterized by that varied and strikingly bold scenery which prevails on this part of the Welsh coast. The surface is boldly undulated, and from the higher grounds are obtained some interesting views of the bay of Cardigan, and some extensive prospects over the adjacent country. This parish contains the small but flourishing sea-port town of Aberaeron, which, within the last few years, has attained a considerable degree of commercial importance, and of which a separate account is given. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. David's, who receive the tithes and pay the minister an annual stipend of £8. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a neat plain edifice, consisting only of a nave and chancel, situated in a remarkably large cemetery. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A school-room was built by the late Rev. Alban Thomas Jones Gwynne, of Tŷglyn, in which the children of the parish are instructed on the National system, partly by subscription, and partly at the expense of their parents. Close to the sea-shore, and not far from the boundary line between this parish and that of Llandewy Aberarth, are the remains of an ancient encampment. The name of Hênvynyw signifies literally "Old Menevia;" and there is a tradition that the cathedral of St. David's was originally designed to have been erected there: near the church is a spring, still called Fynnon Ddewi, or "St. David's Well;" and this parish is distinguished as the place where that saint was brought up from his infancy. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £104. 4.

HERBRANDSTON, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (W. N. W.) from Milford, containing 221 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from one of the Norman or Flemish settlers in Pembrokeshire, named Herbrand, who, soon after the Conquest, fixed his residence at this place. It is situated on the eastern side of a small bay in Milford Haven, and is only of small extent; but the land is very fertile, and in a high state of cultivation. A fair is held annually in the village on the 12th of August, chiefly for hiring farm servants. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a plain ancient structure, with a low massive tower. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £116. 19.

HEYOP, a parish in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. N. W.) from Knighton, containing 187 inhabitants. This parish is divided into two portions, of which the eastern forms part of the borough of Cnwclas, the remainder of which is in the parish of Beguildy, and the western part of the township of Cwm Heyop, of which the remainder is in the parish of Llangunllo. It is pleasantly situated near the river Teme, and contains upwards of eight hundred acres of enclosed, and between two and three hundred acres of unenclosed, land: the surface is boldly undulated, and the soil generally fertile, forming excellent pasture and meadow land in the vales, and good arable land on the sides of the hills: it is watered by a rivulet which takes its name from the parish. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and from the higher grounds some good views are obtained. The only seat within the parish is Dôl y Velin, formerly the residence of the late John Pritchard, Esq., and now the property of J. S. Bodenham, Esq., but unoccupied. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a low tower, containing three bells. The Rev. John Davies, D. D., in 1741, gave £50 for the benefit of the poor not receiving parochial relief; and the Rev. John Foley, and Anne his wife, by deed, gave a certain portion of land, the produce of which, together with the interest of the former sum, making a total of £3. 16. per annum, is distributed weekly in bread to the poor frequenting the church. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £49. 10.

HIGHLIGHT, an extra-parochial district in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. W.) from Cardiff. The population is returned with that of the adjacent parish of Merthyr-Dovan. It comprises an extent of about four hundred acres, forming two farms, the occupants of which have a pew in the church of Merthyr-Dovan, where they attend divine service.

HILARY (ST.), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{4}$  mile (S. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 168 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated, a little southward from the line of the great western road through the county, on an eminence in the Vale of Glamorgan, above one of the sudden depressions of the surface which are of such frequent occurrence in this district, and commands a fine view of the southern parts of the county, the Somersetshire hills, and the Bristol channel, with its numerous shipping: the deep and thickly wooded dingles by which it is surrounded, and the diversified scenery of the immediate neighbourhood, add greatly to the picturesque beauties of its situation. The substratum of the parish is limestone, in which lead-ore has been found, and worked to a limited extent; but the undertaking was not attended with sufficient advantage to lead to the establishment of any permanent works. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5. 14.  $4\frac{1}{2}$ ., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon and Chapter of Llandaf. The church is a neat substantial structure of two aisles, with a square embattled tower at the west end, and an east window of very elegant design: the interior is very appropriately arranged. A small school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by the family of Trahearne, who have a residence occupying an agreeable situation in the village. In a fine meadow, about a mile from the village, originally called Beau Prés, and now Bewper, stood one of the palaces of the royal house of Sitsyllt, the progenitors of the family of the Cecils, Marquises of Salisbury and Exeter. On the site of the original mansion, which was one of the most ancient in the principality, was erected another, of which there are some strikingly picturesque ruins, particularly deserving notice on account of some embellishments to the principal front of the building, which are considered to be among the earliest introductions of the Grecian style of architecture into this country, and were erected in 1600, at the expense of Richard Bassett, Esq. They consist of three stages of columns, of which the lowest is of the Doric, the middle of the Tuscan, and the upper of the Corinthian order; the capitals, intaglios, and other sculptures, are executed in a masterly style, and immediately over the entrance are the family arms, finely sculptured in alto relievo, with a commemorative inscription in Roman capitals. These embellishments were added from a design by a stonemason named Twrch, whose family had for many generations been proprietors of the freestone quarries in the neighbourhood, and who, having left home on account of some domestic quarrel, visited Italy and other places on the continent, where he greatly improved himself in masonry and sculpture, and, on his return to his native place, displayed so much talent in this piece of art, which continues to attract the admiration of all travellers, that it procured for him the notice of several of the gentry of the county. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £91.

HIMMINIOG (AMMINIOG), a township in the parish of LLANRHÛSTID, lower division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. S. W.) from Aberystwith, containing 785 inhabitants. This township is situated on the sea-shore, on the road from Aberystwith to Aberaeron, and contains the parish church: it forms the lower division of the parish. The river Gwyrai flows through it into Cardigan bay, in which, at flood-tide, here are six fathoms of water, within half a mile of the shore. The fortress called LlanrhÛstid, or Dinerth castle, is said to have stood in this division of the parish, but there are no remains of it.

HIRNANT, a parish in the upper division of the hundred of LLANVYLLIN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. N. W.) from Llanvyllin, containing 290 inhabitants. The village is situated in a small valley, enclosed by lofty hills, and watered by an inconsiderable stream, tributary to the Tanat. Peat is procured within the parish, for the consumption of the inhabitants. In the year 1830, an unsuccessful attempt to procure lead-ore was made on a high hill in the township of Cwmmwr, between the village and the adjoining parish of Llangynog, the lead mines in which are upon the northern side of the same hill, at no great distance. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £4. 3. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Illog, is a building of considerable antiquity. David Humphreys, by will dated in 1718, bequeathed £10 for the benefit of the poor. Not far from the church is a well, called Fynnon Illog, formerly much resorted to for the cure of diseases; but it is doubtful whether it ever possessed any medicinal properties. On the summit of an eminence, called Carnedd Illog, there is a tumulus, which is supposed to have been raised over the remains of the tutelar saint. Upon a hill on the south-eastern side of the parish, bordering upon that of Llanrhaiadr, there is a large intrenchment, about four hundred yards in length, called Clawdd Mawr, the mounds of which are distinctly visible; and about two miles from this, on an opposite hill on the northern side, adjoining the parish of Pennant, is another, less distinctly traceable. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £87. 11.

HIRNIN, a joint hamlet with Egwad, in that part of the parish of LLANEGWAD which is in the higher division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. N. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. It occupies the left bank of the Cothy, near its junction with the river Towy, where it is crossed by a bridge on the high road between Carmarthen and Llandovery. There is a slate quarry in this hamlet.

HODGESTON, a parish in the hundred of CASTLE-MARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Pembroke, on the road to Tenby, containing 72 inhabitants. This parish is by some writers supposed to have been the site of an ancient religious establishment, of the existence of which, however, there are not the slightest traces, nor has it even a traditional history. The supposition rests chiefly, if not entirely, upon the evidence of an ancient deed still extant, in which John Stackpool styles himself "Capellanus," and dates it from "Oggeston;" but there is every probability that the writer was chaplain of the Episcopal palace at Lamphey, about half a mile distant, and held the rectory of this parish at the same time. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 4., and in the patronage of Sir John Owen Bart., for two turns, and Pryse Pryse, Esq., for one. The church is a neat edifice, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower. Dr. Thomas Young, formerly Bishop of St. David's, and afterwards Archbishop of York, was a native of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £57. 14.

HOELWERMWOOD (HOEL - CHWERMWD), a hamlet in the parish of MERTHYR-TYDVIL, hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, adjoining the town of Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the parish. In this hamlet is situated the principal part of the extensive and populous market-town of Merthyr-Tydvil. It contains the Dowlais, Penydarren, and other iron-works, and the Plymouth furnaces, and abounds with coal and iron-ore. The Tâf Vawr river flows on its western side, on the left bank of which proceeds the road from Cardiff to Merthyr-Tydvil. At Twyn y waun, an eminence on the eastern side of the hamlet, fairs are held on the first Monday in July and the first Monday in August, and horse-races occasionally take place: near this eminence passes the road to the Tredegar iron-works in Brecknockshire. The lower part of the hamlet, on the banks of the Tâf, is tolerably well wooded.

HOLT, a parish in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, comprising the borough of Holt, and the parochial chapelry of Is y Coed, in which latter are the townships of Cacca Dutton, Dutton y Brân, Dutton Difeth, Ridley, and Sutton, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 1609 inhabitants, of which number, 1015 are in the borough of Holt, 29 miles (E. S. E.) from Denbigh, 21 (E. by S.) from Ruthin, and 191 (N. W.) from London. This parish, which is the only portion of the grant made to the see of Chester by Edward the Confessor, of all the lands on the western side of the river Dee, now remaining to that see, is supposed to have contained, under the Roman dominion in Britain, an outpost to the station Deva (Chester); and the fortress erected here, according to some antiquaries, was called, from that circumstance, Castra Legionis, or "the castle of the legion," preserved in its synonymous Welsh name of Castell Lleon, which, on its coming into the possession of John Earl Warren, in the reign of Edward I., was probably, by mistaking Lleon for the plural of Llew, changed into "the Castle of Lions," or "Lyons," which it continued to bear for ages. Its present name is probably derived from a family of the name of Holt, who are said to have held it prior to this period, probably under a lord paramount. Warren having, after the death of Madoc, (one of the sons of Gruffydd ab Madoc who had been entrusted to his guardianship by Edward I., and whom he caused to be drowned under Holt bridge), obtained from that monarch a grant of Dinas Brân and all Bromfield, in order to secure his possessions, began to erect the castle of Holt, for which this parish is chiefly distinguished, and which gave rise to the present borough; but dying soon after, he left the completion of it to his son William. This castle afterwards came by marriage into the possession of Edward Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel: after the attainder and execution of Richard Earl of Arundel, in the reign of Richard II., it reverted to the crown, and that monarch deposited there, during his expedition to Ireland, plate and jewels of the value of two hundred thousand marks, and one hundred thousand marks in money, all which treasure, together with the fortress, was delivered up to Bolingbroke, in 1399, prior to the deposition of that monarch. In the following reign the estates were restored to the Fitz-Alans; and Thomas Earl of Arundel, in 1410, granted the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, but, jealous of the Welsh, who were ever on the alert to throw off the English yoke, precluded all but Englishmen from participating in the privileges then bestowed. In the reign of Henry VII., the lordship and castle of Holt were granted to Sir William Stanley, who repaired and altered the latter at a great expense, but on whose subsequent attainder for high treason, Henry not only resumed the lordship, but confiscated to his own use the treasures found in the castle, which, exclusively of jewels, amounted to more than forty thousand marks in money and plate. Henry VIII. bestowed this lordship on his natural son, Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond, on whose decease soon after, at the age of seventeen, it again reverted to the crown. In the reign of Edward VI., Thomas Seymour, Lord Admiral, and brother of the Protector, had possession of the lordship and castle, the latter of which he made subservient to the promotion of his ambitious projects, collecting in it a large magazine of warlike stores and ammunition; but, being attainted of high treason, and found guilty, he was beheaded on Tower Hill, London, in 1549, when Holt once more reverted to the crown. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., this castle was an important fortress, and was alternately in the possession of each of the contending parties. In 1643, it was besieged and taken for the parliament, by

Sir William Brereton and Sir Thomas Myddelton; but was shortly after retaken by the royalists, and valiantly defended by Sir Richard Lloyd, of Esclusham, near Wrexham, in 1646, against the parliamentary forces under Major-General Mytton, to whom, after an obstinate resistance, it was finally surrendered upon honourable terms, and was immediately demolished by order of the parliament.

Though anciently a place of some note, this borough at present constitutes only an inconsiderable village, situated on the road from Wrexham to Nantwich, on an eminence rising gently from a spacious vale, and on the western bank of the Dee, in the navigable part of its course, and immediately above the point where this river is joined from the west by the powerful stream of the Alyn. The surrounding scenery, owing to the flatness of the country, is not of the most pleasing character; the Dee, in this part of its course, flowing smoothly through a tract of meadows unadorned by any picturesque beauty. This river is here crossed to the village of Farndon, in Cheshire, by a stone bridge of ten arches, of very curious and ancient construction, which appears, from an inscription formerly to be seen over a portion called the Lady's Arch, to have been built in the year 1345. The parish comprises two thousand seven hundred and twenty-six acres, which are flat and liable to be flooded by the river Dee: the soil consists partly of gravel and partly of clay. A market, which was formerly held at Holt, has long been discontinued: it nevertheless has two annual fairs for cattle, on June 12th and October 29th. By virtue of the above-mentioned charter of Thomas Earl of Arundel, granted with the royal sanction, and dated from his "Castle of Lyons," it is still governed by a mayor, two bailiffs, and a coroner, who are elected annually. By the 27th of Henry VIII., Leon, otherwise Holt, was made a contributory borough, to share with those of Denbigh and Ruthin in the return of a member to parliament: the right of election was formerly vested in the resident burgesses, in number at present one hundred and fourteen. Serious quarrels concerning the election of a burgess have at different times arisen, from great numbers of strangers being made burgesses of Holt, for the express purpose of voting at these elections. By the act for amending the representation of the people, recently passed, the town of Wrexham has been added to this district of contributory boroughs; and the privilege of exercising the elective franchise has been extended to all male persons of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided they be capable of registering as the act directs. The limits of the borough are co-extensive with the township of Holt, and comprise an area of about nine miles in circumference: the present number of houses of the annual value of not less than ten pounds is thirty-eight: the bailiffs of Denbigh are the returning officers. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church, dedicated to St. Chad, is a handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a good square embattled tower: the interior consists of a nave and aisles of equal height, without a clerestory. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A school for the instruction of children of this parish was founded in 1664, by Mr. Griffith Roberts, who endowed it with property now producing £52 per annum. Mr. John Brown bequeathed the interest of £200, and Mrs. Gartside the interest of £50, to be annually distributed in bread to the poor of the borough; and there are also some other bequests for charitable purposes. The castle was a strong pentagonal fortress, occupying the summit of a rock, environed on three sides by a broad moat, excavated in quarrying stone for its erection, and on the fourth by the river Dee: it was defended at four of the angles by massive circular bastions, from which issued slender embattled turrets, and at the fifth angle and also at the entrance by square towers, of which the former was the "donjon," or keep, while the approach to the latter was defended by a drawbridge and portcullis. Of this once strong and important fortress there are no remains, except slight vestiges of the moat. Coins of Antoninus and other Roman emperors have been found here; and slight traces of earthworks, supposed to be of Roman construction, are yet visible near the castle, and on the opposite side of the river. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the town and parish amounts to £660. 15., of which sum, £386. 15. is raised for the township of Holt.

HOLYHEAD, a sea-port, borough, market town, and parish, partly in the hundred of TŶLYBOLION, but chiefly in that of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 24 miles (W. by N.) from Beaumaris, and 260 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 4282 inhabitants. This place, which is of very remote antiquity, derives its Welsh name, Caer Gybi, implying "the fortified place, or city, of Cybi," from its situation in a small island at the western extremity of Anglesey, called Ynys Gybi, from its having been for many years the residence of a British saint of that name, who, according to Cressy's Church History, was the son of Solomon, Duke of Cornwall. Upon the authority of the same historian, St. Cybi, who was also surnamed Corineus, having travelled for the prosecution of his studies into Gaul, where he greatly distinguished himself by his able refutation of the Arian heresy, returned to his native country about the close of the fourth century, and passed the remainder of his days in devotional retirement at this sequestered place, which, from the sanctity of his life and the veneration in which he was held, obtained its present English appellation of "Holyhead," as forming a projecting headland of the island, which also from the same circumstance received the name of the "Holy Island." This place appears to have been known to the Romans, who, according to Tacitus, carried on a considerable trade with Ireland during the time of Agricola, though they may not have had any fixed or permanent settlement in that country. The extensive remains of Roman architecture which are found in this parish, more especially in the churchyard, and which in their construction exhibit every peculiarity of style observable in other ruins of the buildings of that people in Britain, afford an almost conclusive demonstration that they had a station or fortress here for the protection of their commerce with Ireland. About the middle of the fifth century, the Irish-Scots, under a leader named

Sirigi, or "the Rover," made a descent upon the coast of Mona, now Anglesey, and, having massacred many of the inhabitants, at a place in the vicinity of this town, which is still called Careg y Gwyddyl, or "the Irishman's rock," laid up their fleet at this place, and took up a fortified station in the vicinity. To oppose these invaders, Einion Urdd, at that time sovereign of West Britain, sent his eldest son, Caswallon Law-Hîr, or Caswallon the Long-handed, who, having succeeded in drawing them into a general engagement, amply retaliated for the slaughter of his countrymen, and drove them from the island with prodigious loss, having slain their leader with his own hand. After this battle, which was fought on the site of the present town, this place is supposed, by some antiquaries, to have been fortified, with a view to prevent the recurrence of similar attempts; but no particulars of this work are recorded, nor has any thing of historical importance connected with the town occurred since that period, with the exception of the loss of the Charlemont packet belonging to Parkgate, on December 18th, 1790, which was wrecked on Salt Island, at the mouth of Holyhead harbour, when one hundred and ten persons perished.

The town is situated on the north-eastern side of Holy Island, on the shore of the Irish sea, near its junction with St. George's channel, and is separated from the main land of Anglesey by a narrow strait, in some parts fordable at low water, over which the great Holyhead road is continued by an embankment about three-quarters of a mile in length, having in the centre an arch nineteen feet in the span. The small island on which it stands comprises the parishes of Holyhead in the north, and Rhôscolyn in the south, and consists chiefly of barren, rocks and dreary sands; but, from its being that part of Britain which is nearest to Ireland, it has always been a place of great resort for persons visiting the capital of that country. Owing to the very extensive intercourse which now subsists between the two kingdoms, the town has, within the last few years, rapidly increased in extent and improved in appearance, being now large and well-built, and affording ample accommodation of every kind for the numerous passengers who embark at the port. From its advantageous situation it has been selected as the principal station of the post-office packets for conveying the mails to Dublin; and, among other improvements, a new line of road has been constructed under the walls of the town, upon the shore of the traeth, or sandy æstuary, which forms the harbour, extending more than a mile along a lofty artificial embankment, from the entrance of the town to the commencement of the pier. At the extremity of the town a handsome swivel bridge over what is called the sound connects the pier with the main land; and beyond this bridge are, the engineer's house, the custom-house, the harbour-master's offices, and the dépôt for the post-office stores: further on is the grand triumphal arch, built by subscription of the gentry of the county of Anglesey, to commemorate the circumstance of the royal squadron having anchored in Holyhead bay on the night of the 6th of August, 1821, and the landing of His Majesty George IV. on the following day: the king proceeded to Plâs Newydd, the seat of the Marquis of Anglesey, where he slept that night, and on the following day returned and embarked on board the Royal George, then lying at anchor outside the harbour, intending to sail next morning for Dublin; but in the course of the night a gale of wind came on. At an early hour warps were procured, and the yacht hove within the pier: at the same time the signal was given for the squadron to get under weigh, and take an offing. The weather continuing boisterous until the morning of the 12th, one of the post-office steam-packets, afterwards called the Royal Sovereign, was hauled alongside the Royal George, to receive His Majesty on board, and immediately proceeded on her passage to Dublin; at the same time the whole of the royal squadron got under weigh, and sailed also for the same destination. At first, it was not the intention of His Majesty to land on his way to Ireland; though it was arranged that the squadron should rendezvous in the bay until its approach could be made known in Dublin. But, receiving such demonstrations of loyalty and attachment from the inhabitants, who had made considerable preparations on the pier, in anticipation of his landing, the king altered his intention, and on the seventh at noon announced his determination to land: the royal yacht, with His Majesty on board, was placed under the care of the harbour master, as pilot, from the time she anchored in the bay until her departure. This arch, which was opened in August 1824, is a chaste and elegant structure of Mona marble, brought from the Red Wharf quarry, and consists of a central carriage-way, separated on each side, by two handsome pillars of the Doric order, from a footway, enclosed exteriorly by a wall ornamented at the extremities with antæ of corresponding character, the whole twenty feet high, and supporting a boldly projecting cornice, surmounted by three diminishing tiers of masonry, forming a platform: over the carriage-way, on each side, is a large entablature, respectively bearing inscriptions in Welsh and Latin, commemorative of the event. In the vicinity of the town are several respectable mansions.

It does not appear at what time Holyhead was first selected as a station for the post-office packets to Dublin; but, in the reign of William III., packets are known to have sailed from this port, and in the month of January, 1696, the mail boat from Holyhead was wrecked in the bay of Dublin, when the bags were lost, and the passengers and crew perished. Since that time it has been a regular station, and great improvements have been made in the port and harbour, which were previously inadequate either to the security of the vessels, or to the regularity of their departure and arrival. The packets were frequently damaged by the heavy swell running into the harbour, and their time of sailing was uncertain, being frequently aground for eight hours out of the twelve. During fresh gales from the east, which are favourable for their departure, the packets could not warp out, and were frequently detained for two or three days in the harbour, with a wind which, had they been at sea, would have carried them to their destination. The difficulty of entering the harbour was equally great during the prevalence of gales from the westward, which were perfectly favourable to their arrival, and the landing of passengers was attended with great personal hazard. To remedy these inconveniences, an act was obtained in the 50th of George III., for improving the harbour, under the provisions of which a noble pier was constructed, and at its eastern extremity one of the finest lighthouses in the kingdom was erected. The pier extends from the small island called Ynys Halen, or "Salt Island," in an east-south-easterly direction into the sea, and from the triumphal arch before noticed is three hundred and sixty yards in length: it is connected with the main land by a handsome iron bridge of one arch, dividing in the centre, and each part turning on a swivel, to afford a passage on either side. On the south side this pier is faced with a perpendicular wall of hewn stone, and near the east end is a projection at right angles, twenty yards in length, affording shelter from the easterly winds. The wall is continued in a curve from the triumphal arch to the bridge, and from the bridge round the custom-house. On the eastern side the pier is open to the basin, and on the western its summit is protected by a lofty stone wall, along the top of which is a fine promenade of great breadth, affording one of the most interesting marine views imaginable. The side of the pier next the sea forms an inclined plane from the top of this parapet, composed of large rough stones placed edgewise, as close together as possible, and wedged with smaller ones. The lighthouse is built entirely of hewn stone, and without any other timber than what was necessary for the door-cases and window-frames: the foundation is an inverted arch, and the substratum of the pier being sand, the building has sunk considerably, but has, notwithstanding, preserved its perpendicular position. It consists of three stories, the ceilings of which are groined, and the floors are of smooth stone: its base is six feet above the level of high water mark, and is protected from the sea by a strong glacis. The tower, which is circular, is thirty-three feet in height to the gallery, and the lantern, which is ten feet higher, is lighted with twenty brilliant lights of oil gas, having reflectors plated with silver, and displaying a strong white light, which, being at an elevation of fifty feet above the level of the sea, affords a safe guide to vessels approaching the harbour. Gas-works have been constructed on Salt Island, for the supply of the lighthouse, and for lighting the pier and harbour up to the Royal Hotel; but, in case of any accident, oil lamps are constantly in readiness to be put up. The whole of these works were completed at an expense of about £130,000; and a graving dock was constructed at an additional expense of £12,000.

By an act obtained in the 4th of George IV., the harbours of Holyhead and Howth were united, and the whole lines of road from London to Holyhead, and from Howth to Dublin, were placed under the same regulations, by means of which a considerable portion of time is saved in performing the journey between the capitals of the two kingdoms. So late as 1784, the mail-coach from London was forty-eight hours in arriving at Holyhead, a distance which is now travelled in twenty-seven hours and a half. Since the construction of the pier, and the erection of the lighthouse, the harbour has afforded proper facility of entrance and security of shelter to the packets: in all states of the weather vessels pass in a few minutes from the open bay to the quay, on which are cranes and other necessary apparatus for landing horses and carriages, and the mail and passengers are landed with expedition, and with perfect safety. The post-office establishment at this place consists of six steam-packets, of two hundred and thirty tons' burden, which sail regularly twice every day, at stated hours, from this port, and from Howth, keeping up a constant intercourse between the two kingdoms. They are substantial, well-built vessels, affording every accommodation for passengers, and are propelled by steam-engines of one hundred horse power, generally performing in six hours the passage from Holyhead to Howth, a distance of sixty miles, which, previously to their introduction, was often not accomplished in less than twenty hours, and frequently, in unfavourable weather, attended with a delay of several days. The local advantages of Holyhead have made it also a favourite place of embarkation for Ireland, in preference to Liverpool, Parkgate, and other places, the passage from which is attended with considerable hazard from the rocks by which the Welsh coast is lined; and consequently, independently of its being a government station, it derives from that circumstance a considerable degree of traffic, although the recent establishment of packets between Liverpool and Dublin has much diminished the number of passengers by this route. The adjacent promontory called the Head, which is a bold and lofty projection, is easily recognized at sea; and the entrance to this port being free from rocks and shoals, and having a channel light-house on each side of the bay, and a third at the extremity of the pier, vessels can at all times come up in safety to their moorings in the harbour; and in clearing outwards, within half an hour after leaving the pier, they are in a position having fifteen leagues of offing in nearly all directions, owing to the central situation of the Head in St. George's channel. The harbour affords a secure asylum for vessels in strong gales: during the last ten years above one thousand sail of ships have taken refuge in it each year, averaging a burden of above seventy-eight thousand tons annually, exclusively of the government packets, which average an additional tonnage of one hundred and sixty-seven thousand nine hundred, making in the aggregate two hundred and forty-five thousand nine hundred tons entering the harbour annually, and sailing therefrom. Owing to several vessels having been lost in endeavouring to enter the harbour, a plan is at present under contemplation for its extension. In the year ending January 5th, 1831, exclusively of the government packets, two hundred and twenty-five vessels (including different arrivals of the same) entered inwards, and eighty-six (reckoning as above) cleared outwards at this port, which is a creek to that of Beaumaris. On the summit of the adjacent mountain, about two miles from the harbour, is a double signal station, one portion belonging to government packets, and the other to the merchants of Liverpool: the merchants' station communicates with the latter port by a chain of nine signal posts, conveying intelligence of inward or outward bound vessels from the agents at Holyhead to Carreglwyd, and thence to the port, an overland distance of sixty miles, in the space of ten minutes. These stations were established and first brought into operation in the year 1826, and have been found highly beneficial to the interests of commerce.

Connected with the harbour, and materially contributing to facilitate its access, is the South Stack lighthouse, erected upon the summit of an isolated rock on the coast, about five miles westward from Holyhead, and separated from the main land by a chasm ninety feet in width. This splendid structure was raised by the Corporation of the Trinity House, under the immediate superintendence of Captain Evans, in the year 1808. The elevation of the summit of the rock on which it is erected is one hundred and forty feet above the level of the sea at high water mark; the height of the tower from the base to the gallery is sixty feet; and the lantern is twelve feet high from the gallery; making the total elevation of the light two hundred and twelve feet above the level of high water mark. The light consists of twenty-one brilliant lamps with powerful reflectors, placed on a revolving triangular frame, displaying a full-faced light every two minutes, which in clear weather is distinctly visible at the distance of ten leagues. From the rough sea caused by the strong tides about the Head, a communication by boat was found to be very precarious. Mr. Evans first contrived to cross in a box or cradle running upon two strong ropes, with two others at the top, to keep it steady, and hauling lines at each end: this mode served for five years, subsequently to which a bridge of ropes, which was used for fifteen years, was constructed, and during the whole of both these periods not a single accident occurred; but, from the continual wear of the ropes, it was always attended with a degree of danger, and, on a subsequent inspection of the place, the committee of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House ordered a suspension chain bridge to be thrown over the sound, which was accomplished in 1827. This bridge is of one hundred and ten feet span: the chains are firmly bolted into the rock on both sides of the sound, and carried over two massive pillars of stone from the Moelvre quarries, erected for the purpose, and capped with single stones weighing nearly four tons each: the chains support a platform of timber, five feet in breadth, and seventy feet above the level of the sea at high water mark. The erection of the South Stack lighthouse has been of the most extensive benefit to the navigation on this whole line of coast, which was previously dangerous from the numerous rocks and shoals which are scattered around in various directions. Before its erection scarcely a winter passed without some vessels being wrecked off it: during the forty years previous to 1808, no fewer than seventy-three vessels are recorded to have been totally lost here; while, during the twenty-four years that have elapsed since the erection of this lighthouse, only four vessels have been wrecked, having run on shore at the back of the Head during the night in very hazy weather: it has been found of essential benefit to the government packets in particular, which could not, without its aid, have navigated these seas with safety. There is now a moveable light placed at the South Stack, principally for the use of the government packets, which approach the Head with the London mail about half past nine o'clock, P. M., which is lighted in hazy weather: it is a red light, running upon an inclined plane, with a crab winch at the top, and having three lamps and reflectors. In a thick state of the atmosphere the margin of the coast is frequently seen, about thirty or forty feet above the sea, when more elevated objects are completely obscured. Two men, with their families, constantly reside on the island, to attend to the lights, occupying two very neat cottages, also built by the Corporation of the Trinity House, and each receiving a salary of £65 per annum : from the time of the erection of the lighthouse until 1823, every ship that passed paid a halfpenny per ton, but since the latter period this charge has been reduced to a farthing per ton. The scenery around the point on which the lighthouse is built is strikingly bold and romantic, and the structure itself forms one of the most prominent and interesting features in the scenery of this part of North Wales.

No manufactures are carried on at this place : several attempts have been made, at considerable expense, to explore the mineral treasures with which the parish was supposed to abound, but nothing of importance has yet been discovered, except some veins of the Mona marble, called "verd antique," which have been worked to some extent. In these quarries are frequently found fine specimens of steatite, which is also found in the parishes of Amlwch and Llanvechell : this mineral has attracted more attention since it has been ascertained that chromate of iron, a valuable pigment, belongs to the same formation. The trade consists principally in the building of coasting vessels, the repairing of all the post-office steam-packets belonging to the several ports of England and Wales, and the making of ropes and cables. For these purposes there are very extensive premises, consisting of wet and dry docks, smithies, and other works, in which numerous workmen are constantly employed. In the works belonging to the post-office department alone more than four hundred men are generally employed, under the superintendence of a resident engineer appointed by the commissioners of the general post-office. The market is on Saturday. The parish comprises about six thousand acres, of which one thousand are common and uncultivated : the soil, though rocky, is in many places very productive. Holyhead was made, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, a borough contributory, with the newly created boroughs of Amlwch and Llanegwini, to Beaumaris, in the election of a member to serve in parliament : the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the yearly value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands : the present number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which are described in the Appendix to this work, is one hundred and twenty. It is now also a polling-place in the election of a member for the county.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £300 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford, who, in 1820, augmented the income of the curate with an additional stipend of £20 per annum. The church, dedicated to St. Cybi, is by some historians said to have been originally founded by that recluse, during his retirement in this remote part of the principality, about the close of the fourth century ; but by others its foundation is attributed to Maelgwyn Gwynedd, whose arms are placed over the principal entrance, and who, soon after its erection, is said to have endowed it with lands in this county and in that of Carnarvon, and to have made it collegiate for a provost and twelve prebendaries, sometimes styled the rector and brethren. This collegiate establishment, however, is stated on better authority to have been founded by Hwva ab Cynddelw, lord of Llŷs Llivon, in the reign of Owain Gwynedd, who ascended the throne of North Wales in the year 1137 : it continued to flourish till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was £32. 12. 6., of which sum, £8. 12. 6. was received by the provost, and £24 by the prebendaries. This revenue remained in the possession of the crown till the time of James I., who granted it to Francis Morris, from whom it passed through several hands into the possession of Rice Wynne, Esq., who, in 1640, gave the whole of the great tithes of this parish, together with those of the parishes of Bôdewern, Bôdwrog, and Llandrygarn, which were originally chapelries in the parish of Holyhead, to the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford, for the maintenance of two fellows and two scholars ; and directed that the advowson should remain with that body, so long as they should appoint the officiating minister from amongst the said scholars. The present church is a spacious cruciform structure, principally in the decorated style of English architecture, consisting of a nave and aisles, a chancel and north and south transepts, with a very curious and ancient southern porch : its tower, originally rising from the intersection of the nave and transepts, has been rebuilt at the western end, at a comparatively modern period. The exterior of the south transept, and the porch, are curiously ornamented with rude sculpture, representing boars, bears, and other animals, among which is the dragon, supposed to bear some allusion to the reputed founder, Maelgwyn, who was called Draco Insularis. The exterior of the church is embattled, and on one of the walls is the Latin inscription "Sancte Kubi, ora pro nobis." The nave is separated from the aisles by ranges of pillars and pointed arches, of which those on the south side are more lofty than those on the north. The chancel, which, as well as the tower, is of comparatively recent date, is greatly inferior in its character to the nave and transepts, which are much more elegant in the tracery of the windows and other architectural details. The columns which supported the original tower, with their highly enriched capitals, and the springs of the arches, are still remaining at the point of intersection ; and the modern tower, which is square and embattled, but of very inferior character, is surmounted by a low pyramidal roof. There were formerly various other churches, or chapels, in this parish, which, as before observed, was anciently of greater importance and extent than at present ; but they have long since been in ruins, and the only remains are those of Capel Lochwyd, Capel y Gorllŷs, Capel St. Fraed, Capel Gwyngenu, and Towyn y Capel : the last of these, situated on the sea-shore, near the old road, occupied the summit of a mound or tumulus, in which a vast number of human bones have been exposed to the view by the action of the waves which wash its base. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Dr. Edward Wynne, in 1748, built a school-house in the churchyard, and endowed it with £120, the interest of which he appropriated to the payment of a master for teaching six poor boys of this parish. A National school was founded, and a schoolroom was built by subscription in 1818, at an expense of £320, for the gratuitous instruction of children: the building is capable of accommodating three hundred and sixty, and there are at present one hundred and five boys and one hundred and eighty girls, exclusively of the six boys under Dr. Wynne's endowment, who are gratuitously instructed by the same master, to whom the interest of the £120 is paid. Catherine Roberts, in 1756, bequeathed £250 in trust to the minister and churchwardens of this parish; the interest of £125 to be divided annually among four distressed housekeepers, and the interest of the remainder to be distributed among the poor generally. Arthur Griffith bequeathed small portions of land; John Prichard in 1745, bequeathed £40, with preference to his poor relations; Margaret Owen bequeathed a small portion of land; and there are also some other charitable donations and bequests, the proceeds of which are distributed among the poor. There are two unendowed almshouses, which are appropriated as residences for the poor, and called respectively the old and new poor houses.

Of the monastery, said to have been founded here by St. Cybi, towards the close of the fourth century, there are no remains. The walls of the churchyard point out the site of the Roman station supposed to have existed here: they enclose an area in the form of a parallelogram, two hundred and twenty feet in length, and one hundred and thirty feet broad. On one side this area is open to the harbour, having only a parapet along the edge of the precipitous cliffs; but on the other three sides it is defended by strong walls of masonry, six feet in thickness and seventeen feet high. At the angles were circular bastion towers, a small portion only of one of which is now remaining. The walls are still in good preservation, and are perforated with two rows of circular openings, about four inches in diameter, the insides of which are smoothly plastered, and in every respect resembling those which form so remarkable a feature in the walls of Segontium, adjacent to Carnarvon. The cement, mixed with coarse pebbles, is extremely hard, and in every other respect the work displays strong characteristics of Roman origin. On the summit of a mountain, about three miles from the town, are the remains of an ancient military post, consisting of a circular tower, and some portions of walls, in some parts eight feet in height, extending in a straight line for a considerable distance. These ruins, which are called Caer Twr, have by some antiquaries also been considered as of Roman origin; and the mountain on which they are situated is called Pen Caer Gybi, or "the summit of the fortress of Cybi." On the mountain on which the signal station has been established, and not far from the latter, are the remains of an ancient camp, which appears to have been surrounded with a wall of uncemented stones, of which vestiges may still be traced. In 1825, several gold coins of the Emperor Constantine were found in a high state of preservation on one of the hills near Holyhead: one of these, now in the possession of the Marquis of Anglesey, has on the obverse a fine head of the emperor, and on the reverse a wreath, within which is the legend VOTIS. TSE, in high relief. On a farm called Trêvignerth, about a mile to the south-east of Holyhead, is a cromlech nearly perfect. The promontory called the Head, by which the harbour is sheltered from the westerly winds, presents a singular aspect, its sides towards the sea forming in some parts immense perpendicular precipices, while in others they are worn, by the continued action of the waves, into caverns of magnificent and romantic appearance. Of these, one called the "Parliament House" is accessible only by boats at half ebb tide, and consists of a stately series of receding arches, supported by massive and lofty pillars of rock, displaying an interior of picturesque beauty and sublime grandeur. Some of these caverns afford shelter to gulls, razor-bills, guillemots, ravens, cormorants, herons, and other birds; and the loftiest crags are frequented by the peregrine falcon. The eggs of these birds are in great request as a delicacy for the table, and some of the hardiest inhabitants of the vicinity are employed in the hazardous task of procuring them for sale. For this purpose, one man is lowered down by a rope fastened round his body, with the other end secured in the ground on the summit of the cliff, where another remains to guard it: after depositing the eggs in a basket slung at his back, he is drawn up to the brow of the rock, and in this perilous situation is assisted over the edge of the precipice, with his booty, by his companion. The adventurers have become so accustomed to this dangerous employment, that accidents rarely occur; although it has occasionally happened that the man on the summit of the cliff, being overpowered by the weight of his companion, while assisting him to land, has been drawn over the brink, and both have perished. The common near this place, called Towyn y Capel, is bounded on the west by some rocks, over which the sea breaks with tremendous violence, and which, being covered at high water, are exceedingly dangerous to mariners incautiously approaching this part of the coast. William Morris, distinguished as a collector of Welsh manuscripts, and brother of the learned Lewis Morris, a celebrated antiquary and poet, was Comptroller of the Customs at this place, where he died in 1764. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £910. 2.

HOLYWELL (called by the Welsh TRÊFYNNON), a borough, market-town, and parish, partly in the Holywell, and partly in the Northop, division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Flint, and 207 (N. W.) from London, on the road to Holyhead, containing 8969 inhabitants. This place derives its Welsh name of Trêfynnon, or "the town of the well," from one of the most powerful springs in the island, which issues from a rock just below the town, and has been celebrated for many ages for the miraculous efficacy traditionally related to have been imparted to its waters by St. Winifred, to whose memory, after her decease, the fountain was dedicated. Its reported Saxon name of Welston appears to have been derived from the same source; and its present appellation of Holywell has originated in the supposed sacredness of its spring, to which numerous pilgrims of every rank resorted from all parts of the kingdom, to present their offerings at the shrine of its tutelary saint. St. Winifred, according to the monkish legend, was the daughter of Thewith, a powerful lord in this part of the principality, and niece to St. Beuno, under whose protection she lived in monastic seclusion, in a vale which, for its remarkable aridity, had obtained the name of Sych Nant, near the foot of the hill on which the town of Holywell now stands, where Beuno had built a small church, and where there are two fields, still called Gerddi St. Beuno, or "St. Beuno's Gardens." The same authority states that Cradocus, son of a neighbouring king, enamoured of the beauty of St. Winifred, and enraged at her disdainful repulses, struck off her head with his sword, as she was endeavouring to escape from his pursuit; that the severed head, after rolling down the side of the hill, stopped near the church of St. Beuno, and that a spring of prodigious force burst forth with impetuosity from the spot on which it rested. The moss on the sides of this spring is said to have diffused a fragrant odour; and the stones, which were discoloured with her blood, to have assumed, on the anniversary of her decollation, a colour not possessed by them at other times. St. Beuno, taking up the head, united it to the body, which instantly became resuscitated; and Winifred is said to have survived her decapitation for fifteen years, and to have died at Gwytherin, in Denbighshire, where her remains rested till the reign of Stephen, when they were removed (by divine admonition, as it is said,) to the abbey of St. Peter and St. Paul at Shrewsbury, where a fraternity or guild was founded in honour of her memory. After her death her sanctity is said to have been proved by numerous miracles; and the waters of the miraculously formed well were found to be efficacious in the cure of all corporeal infirmities. The legend of St. Winifred would scarcely have been worthy of repetition here, had not its influence on the prosperity of the town of Holywell, and even on its very existence, by causing a vast resort of pilgrims to the extraordinarily copious spring, been extremely great, having even yet hardly ceased to operate. In Domesday-book no mention is made of Holywell, whence Bishop Fleetwood concluded that the story above related was purely the invention of monks living in a later age; and it is somewhat singular that, if the well had really attained the celebrity which it is said to have done at so early a period, the wonder-telling Giraldus Cambrensis, who lodged a night at the abbey of Basingwerk, in this parish, in 1188, in company with Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, then preaching the crusades in Wales, should make no mention of it; a circumstance which induced Dr. Powell to regard the whole story as a fiction, and ascribe it to the monks of the neighbouring abbey, under whose protection the place seems first to have risen into importance, and who procured for it the grant of a market and fair.

This abbey is said to have been founded, in 1131, by Ranulph Earl of Chester, for Cistercian monks, being probably the first establishment of that order in Wales. This is the origin assigned to it by Bishop Tanner; but, according to Bishop Fleetwood, it was founded by King Henry II.; and Mr. Pennant is inclined to attribute its origin to some of the later Welsh princes, who were great benefactors to it, and in their respective charters recite that they give and confirm the several donations to God, St. Mary, the monastery of Basingwerk, and the monks, which had been bestowed on the latter by their predecessors, for the salvation of their souls. Ranulph, however, must in any case have been a great benefactor to this house, as from this period may be dated its rise to importance; and about this time part of the buildings yet standing seems to have been erected. Its previous existence, however, is recorded by a monkish writer, who relates that Richard, son of Hugh Lupus, and the second Norman Earl of Chester, on his return, in 1119, from Normandy, where he had been educated, undertook a pilgrimage to the well of St. Winifred, and that, either in going or returning, he was attacked by the Welsh, and compelled to seek refuge in Basingwerk abbey, in which insecure retreat he applied for relief to St. Werburg, who miraculously raised certain sands in the æstuary of the Dee, between Flintshire and the promontory of Wirrall in Cheshire, which enabled Richard's constable to pass over to his assistance: the sands, said to have been thus formed, have to this day borne the designation of "the Constable's Sands." It was probably Earl Richard who afterwards erected a castle at Basingwerk, for the defence of the abbey, and which was destroyed by the Welsh in the reign of Stephen. During the protracted struggle between the Anglo-Norman invaders of Wales and the native population of this country, the abbey of Basingwerk, upon which the town of Holywell was dependent, appears, together with the surrounding country, to have been alternately in the power of each party; but the monks, by good management, contrived to keep friends with both, at least so far as to escape serious molestation. In 1150, Ranulph Earl of Chester, and Madoc ab Mededydd, Prince of Powys, invading the territories of Owain Gwynedd, sovereign of North Wales, that monarch advanced into Flintshire, to check their progress; and meeting them at Counsylvll, Coleselt, or Coleshill, in the eastern part of this parish, contrary to the usual custom of the Welsh, of scarcely ever risking a general engagement, or of attacking an enemy unless in situations of advantage, he availed himself of the ardour of his forces, and gave them battle. This conduct obtained for Owain a brilliant victory over his enemies, who were superior in number; and so entire was the defeat of the English that few escaped but such as by the swiftness of their horses were enabled to elude the fury of the pursuers. Owain Gwynedd again took post in this parish, at Basingwerk, in 1157, to await the invasion of the English forces led by Henry II., in person, who, having advanced along the sea-shore to Flint, thought either to bring the Welsh prince to an immediate engagement, or to penetrate into the interior of the country. But Owain avoided a battle, and the English, passing through a long narrow defile at Coleshill, after proceeding so far that it was alike hazardous either to advance or retreat, were attacked by the Welsh, who rushed upon them with furious impetuosity from the woods, and threw them into the greatest disorder. Henry was compelled to flee, and several of his nobility were slain, among whom were Eustace Fitz-John and Robert de Courcy; and the few of the vanquished that escaped the slaughter, falling back upon the main body of the English army which was entering the defile, spread a general panic. A report of the king's death being propagated, the Earl of Essex, hereditary standard-bearer of England, threw down the standard, and, in the general consternation that prevailed, the Welsh made dreadful havoc in the ranks of the invaders. The rout was becoming general, when Henry, having escaped from his perilous situation, exposed himself by lifting up the visor of his helmet, and thus restored the courage of his troops, who, led on by their sovereign,

Henry, after his escape from this ambushade, restored the castle of Basingwerk, which he left well fortified and strongly garrisoned, in order to secure a retreat for his forces in case of any similar disaster in their marches through the interior of the principality, much of which at that time formed a dangerous extent of wild forests. As an additional security, and also probably for the protection of the numerous English devotees who went to present their offerings at the shrine of St. Winifred, the same monarch founded here a house of Knights Templars, a military order which had been introduced into England during the preceding reign. He also confirmed the grants already made to the abbey of Basingwerk, and added to them some further immunities, a circumstance which induced Leland mistakenly to ascribe to him its original foundation. The castle, after its restoration by Henry, was twice assaulted by the Welsh, who, after vainly attempting to reduce it, were on both occasions repulsed with considerable loss. After the second attempt, made in 1158, the garrison was considerably augmented, and continued to maintain possession of it till 1165, when, (while in the possession of Hugh de Beauchamp, on whom it had been bestowed by the English monarch), the Welsh, under the conduct of Owain Gwynedd, after defeating the garrison, fired and otherwise so entirely demolished the castle, that not a single vestige of it is now discernible: this exploit facilitated the re-conquest of the maritime parts of Flintshire. Giraldus calls the monastic establishment at this place "Cellula de Basingwerk." A castle is said to have been built at Trêfynnon, or Holywell, in 1210, by Ranulph, the third Earl of Chester of that name. When Edward I. was making preparations for the final conquest of the Welsh, he issued two mandates for the protection of the abbey, on condition that the monks should cease all commerce with the Welsh rebels. This condition they appear to have implicitly observed, and henceforward to have closely attached themselves to that which was so obviously the strongest party. At this period, the monastery of Basingwerk was raised to the dignity of a mitred abbey; and the abbot was summoned by royal mandate to five parliaments which were held during the reign of this monarch. The resort of pilgrims to the well of St. Winifred received the greatest encouragement from the Roman pontiffs; and in the reign of Henry V., Pope Martin V. furnished the abbey of Basingwerk with pardons and indulgences to sell to the devotees. This house continued to flourish until the dissolution, when its revenue, estimated at £157. 15. 2., was granted to Henry ab Harry. The delusive practices above mentioned were renewed in the reign of Mary, by the interest of Thomas Goldwell, Bishop of St. Asaph, who, on the accession of Elizabeth, fled into Italy. The last pilgrim of royal lineage who visited the shrine of St. Winifred was James II., on August 29th, 1686; on which occasion he is said to have received part of the dress worn by Mary Queen of Scots at the time of her execution. His queen addressed to Sir Roger Mostyn, Bart., an order for putting the chapel over the well into the possession of a Roman Catholic priest. At the commencement of the last century, the market and fair formerly held at Holywell having long been disused, the former was revived by letters patent from the crown, dated January 20th, 1703, granted to Sir John Egerton, Bart., bestowing also the privilege of three annual fairs, which, however, were never established. The resort of pilgrims to this place has now nearly ceased, notwithstanding an attempt made some years ago to restore the belief of the vulgar in the miraculous virtues of the waters of St. Winifred's well, in a pamphlet written by Dr. Milner, the Roman Catholic bishop, entitled "Authentic Documents relative to the miraculous cure of Winifred White, of the town of Wolverhampton, at Holywell, in Flintshire, on the 28th of June, 1805;" and containing also details of numerous other cases of the most lamentable diseases said to have been cured by once bathing in the fountain: a triumphant reply to this pamphlet was published by the Rev. P. Roberts, the late learned rector of Halkin.

The parish of Holywell extends for some miles along the southern shore of the wide and sandy æstuary of the Dee, and comprises within its limits the whole course of the Holywell stream, with its attendant valley. Whatever celebrity this place may have anciently derived from the supposed sanctity and miraculous efficacy of the waters of its spring, has been altogether eclipsed by the real and substantial benefits resulting from the application of its copious and powerful stream to manufacturing purposes, by the almost inexhaustible wealth of its mines, and by its advantageous situation near the æstuary of the river Dee; all which have powerfully contributed to raise it to the highest rank among the towns of the principality, whether considered in respect of its mineral productions, its manufactures, or its commerce. The town is pleasantly situated within a mile and a half of the shore, on the declivity of a lofty hill of limestone, in a beautiful vale watered by the impetuous stream issuing from St. Winifred's well, at the bottom of the town, sheltered on one side by lofty hills, and open on the other towards the sea, embracing a picturesque view of the interesting ruins of the ancient abbey of Basingwerk, and a fine prospect over the open country towards Liverpool. The streets are spacious and well paved; the houses are handsome and well built; and the whole town is well lighted with gas, and abundantly supplied with water by wells. The environs, which are enlivened with numerous handsome residences and gentlemen's seats, abound with richly diversified scenery; and from the higher grounds are obtained extensive and beautiful prospects over the surrounding country, which is rich in picturesque beauty. The gently undulating valleys are finely contrasted with the lofty hills by which they are enclosed, and the richly wooded eminences, with the fine stream by which the lower grounds are intersected, and, in the distance, with the expansive waters of the Dee. The air is salubrious, and the opportunities of cold and sea bathing which the place affords render it not only a pleasant place of permanent residence, but also of occasional resort for invalids, for whose comfort every accommodation is provided, with the benefit of good medical advice, and the advantage of numerous pleasant rides and walks in the immediate neighbourhood.

The celebrated well of St. Winifred, the miraculous efficacy of the waters of which was for ages in such repute, and the really sanative virtues of which still attract the notice and regard of numerous visitors, is certainly the most copious in the island. It rises with prodigious force from under the rock immediately below the church, and is received into a spacious and elegant polygonal basin, surrounded by a broad pavement, and surmounted by a beautiful chapel in the later style of English architecture. From the angles of the polygon rise lofty and finely clustered columns, with highly enriched and beautifully ornamented capitals, from which spring arched ribs of appropriate design, exquisitely sculptured at the intersections, and uniting in a common centre, which support an elaborately wrought canopy of exquisite beauty. From the point of intersection is a pendant, on which is sculptured the legend of St. Winifred; and around it, and throughout the whole of the interior, are shields charged with armorial bearings, displaying the arms of England, of Catherine of Arragon, of the Stanley family, and of the abbey of Basingwerk; and opposite to the entrance is a richly canopied niche, in which was formerly a statue of the patron saint. Above this is the chapel of St. Winifred, in the same style of architecture, elaborately ornamented with similar details: the roof of the eastern part, which is pentagonal, and formerly lighted by five windows, is richly groined, and supported on slender columns of light and graceful form. This chapel is lighted by lofty windows of elegant proportion, enriched with delicate tracery; and in front is a recess, separated by an arched screen of elegant design, the roof of which was of finely carved oak. This beautiful edifice, which was erected by the Stanleys in the reign of Henry VIII., has long been used as a school-room, and is still the only room in the town which is appropriated to the use of public meetings. In front of the building is a pleasure bath, thirty-eight feet in length, sixteen in breadth, and eight in its greatest depth, entered by steps, and in which is found in profusion the violet-scented moss so eagerly sought for by visitors at Holywell. This moss is not peculiar to this place, but is found also in several other parts of the kingdom, and in great abundance at a fine spring in the parish of Llandysilio: it is called by botanists Jungermannia Asplenioides. Another species is also found here, called by Linnæus Byssus Iolithus, and by Schwenckfelt Muscus Subrubeus, which adheres to the stone like a coating of fine velvet: the Conferva Gelatinosa is also found in the water of this spring. The chapel is private property, but the spring is common. The well was formerly in the highest reputation for the cure of all disorders, under the auspices of St. Winifred, in honour of whom, as votive offerings from patients said to have been healed by the waters, the crutches of the lame, and the barrows of the impotent, are suspended from the ceiling of the canopy. The water of the well is peculiarly adapted for the purpose of cold bathing: its mean temperature is about 48° of Fahrenheit, and though sometimes, after showers, tinged with a colour like that of whey, it is generally limpid and transparent: it contains a considerable quantity of fixed air, and holds in solution sulphate of lime. According to an experiment lately made, it appears that the water flows into the well at the rate of one thousand two hundred tons per hour: the strong ebullition occasioned by this discharge accounts for pebbles of an ounce in weight being continually suspended, or rather supported aloft, in the stream, which supplies the greater part of the town, and within the distance of one mile and two hundred and thirty-four yards, in which it completes its course to the Dee, works no less than eleven extensive mills, with a power equivalent to that of a thousand horses. On the outside of the great well, close to the road, is a small spring, the waters of which were once famed for the cure of sore eyes.

The beautiful valley at the head of which the town is situated, and through which the waters of St. Winifred's well take their short and precipitate course to the sea, is far more distinguished for the extent and variety of its trade and manufactures, than any tract of similar extent in North Wales; a superiority which it owes to the convenience of its powerful stream for giving motion to machinery, of its situation on the æstuary of the Dee being favourable for maritime commerce, and of the fuel, both of coal and wood, for the manufacture of metals, which abounds in the vicinity. For many ages, the copious stream of St. Winifred served only to turn a corn-mill belonging to the abbey, and a few others for similar purposes, till about the middle of the last century, when several attempts were made to apply it to other purposes, and some small mills in various branches of manufacture were erected. But it was not till the year 1777 that Holywell can be said to have emerged from obscurity, and to have risen into manufacturing and commercial importance. At that time Mr. Smalley introduced the cotton manufacture into this place, and erected a mill on a principle similar to that of one which had been then recently erected at Cromford by Sir Richard Arkwright. Soon after this, Mr. Smalley was joined by an opulent company from Lancashire, who introduced into the manufacture the improved machinery of Sir Richard Arkwright, and in 1783 erected a larger mill, now called the Upper Mill, which works twelve thousand two hundred and eighteen spindles. The same company, in 1787, erected the Lower Mill, adapted to the working of seven thousand four hundred and ninety-two spindles; and in 1791, the Crescent Mill, in which eight thousand two hundred and eighty-six spindles are kept in motion. These mills are applied to the spinning of cotton thread, of which twenty-six thousand and ninety-six lb. are produced on an average weekly, furnishing employment to nearly one thousand persons. There are also upon the same stream several extensive copper-mills, the first of which, for rolling sheet copper, was erected in 1781, by the Parys Mining Company, who in 1783 erected another, called the Hammer Mill, for the manufacture of every description of copper vessels, but particularly the large vessels used in the West India islands in the granulating process of the sugar manufacture. The copper bolts now universally used in ship-building were first invented by the proprietors, and manufactured under a patent at these works, from which also the royal dock-yards were supplied with copper sheathing and rudder bands, previously to the establishment of similar works by government at Portsmouth. The Meadow Mill, an extensive and handsome building, erected in 1788, is appropriated to the manufacture of copper cylinders, which, after being engraved with various patterns, are used in the printing of muslins, and for which a patent was obtained by the same company. In 1806 a mill for drawing copper wire, to be manufactured into copper nails and spikes, for the supply of government, was erected. In these several mills, all of which are worked by the same stream, and form conspicuous and extensive structures in the vale through which it flows, more than a thousand tons of copper are annually manufactured into the various articles above enumerated, and more than a hundred persons are constantly employed. There are also very extensive mills for rolling copper and sheet lead, for casting and drawing patent lead pipes, and for the manufacture of white and red lead, affording constant employment to more than a hundred persons. A foundry for iron castings of every description gives employment to more than fifty persons; and a manufactory for paper by patent machinery has been recently established, in which more than forty persons are regularly engaged. A mill for throwing silk was erected in the town, in 1822, in which more than a hundred persons find employment; and at Pen y Maes a manufactory for the weaving of narrow silk goods was established, in 1821, in which sixty looms are in operation, and about ninety persons employed. In the township of Bagillt, in this parish, are three separate and very extensive establishments for the smelting of lead-ore, in which, conjointly, more than a hundred thousand tons are smelted annually; and attached to these works are refineries, in which, upon an average, forty-two thousand ounces of silver are annually separated from the ore: connected with them are manufactories for sheet lead and pipes; in these several works nearly three hundred men are employed.

The district immediately around Holywell is pre-eminently distinguished for the richness of its mineral treasures, and particularly for its mines of lead and calamine, which appear to have been worked from the earliest period, and still continue to form an almost inexhaustible source of wealth. Several new mines have been opened with success, and have amply rewarded the labours of the enterprising adventurers. Among these, the most considerable is the Milwr mine, about a mile from the town, which was first wrought in 1822: in each of the years 1829 and 1830 it yielded to the proprietors a clear profit of £17,000, and in the latter year alone produced nearly three thousand tons of lead-ore: a steam-engine, with a seventy-inch cylinder, is at present being constructed for the use of this mine, in which two hundred persons are regularly employed. The mine called the Holywell Level was first opened in 1773, from which time till the year 1795 the adventurers lost more than £5000 by the undertaking: from 1800 to 1825, however, the accumulated profits amounted to £131,850, or nearly to £5,300 per annum; but, from the increased expense attending the working of it since this last period, the average profits have not exceeded £1000 per annum. The approach to this mine is near St. Winifred's well, and it was formerly entered by boats, which floated on the water drained from the mine, by means of which the ore was brought to its mouth; but, in 1830, a rail-road was laid down, communicating with the several workings in the level, which extends in a westerly direction for more than eighteen hundred yards, and from which branches another level, extending five hundred yards in a direction from north to south. The ore of this mine, from the greater proportion of silver which it contains, is always worth £1 per ton more than that of any other; the average produce is about a thousand tons per annum, in obtaining which about one hundred men are generally employed: a steam-engine of adequate power is at present being constructed for the use of the mine, and will be fixed about five hundred yards above the mouth of the level. There are several smaller mines of lead-ore in the parish, and also considerable mines of calamine; but the latter have not been worked for the last few years, as that article can now be imported from Germany at a much cheaper rate than that at which it can be obtained in this country. Coal is found in great abundance in the township of Greenfield, in this parish, and is now being worked to a considerable extent; and in the township of Bagillt are also very extensive collieries, affording employment to two hundred and fifty persons, and producing annually more than forty thousand tons of coal, which is chiefly sent coastwise to Chester, Liverpool, and the distant parts of North Wales. The commercial importance of Holywell is commensurate with its manufacturing pre-eminence: its situation on the æstuary of the Dee affords great facility of commercial intercourse with the chief towns in the principality, and with Liverpool and the principal ports on the neighbouring parts of the English coast. Vessels of two hundred tons' burden can approach within two miles of the town, at all states of the tide; and steam-boats and other vessels sail daily for Liverpool from the quay at Bagillt, and from that at Mostyn, near the northern boundary of the parish, by means of which a constant intercourse with that port is regularly maintained. The market, which is one of the largest and best supplied in North Wales, is held on Friday; but the fairs, which were originally obtained by the monks of Basingwerk, and discontinued after the dissolution, have never since been regularly established. By the act for amending the representation of the people, recently passed, Holywell has been created one of the eight contributory boroughs within this county, which unite in returning a member to parliament: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act requires: the limits of the borough are described in the Appendix, and the number of houses of the value above mentioned is at present one hundred and fifty: the bailiffs of Flint are the returning officers. Petty sessions for the division are held here once a month.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 15., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the proprietor of the estate of Llanerch, in the county of Denbigh, on the nomination of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to St. Winifred, and rebuilt in 1769, is a spacious structure of Grecian architecture, sixty-eight feet long and fifty-six wide, consisting of a nave, with north and south aisles, and a chancel, in which is a handsome east window, embellished with modern stained glass: it has also two spacious and elegant galleries over the aisles, and the whole is calculated to contain about three thousand persons. The steeple is plain, square, and very strongly built: remains of the ancient edifice, which was of the same dimensions as the present church, are yet seen in the remarkably plain pillars on each side of the nave of the latter. Part of the churchyard forms a gentle slope, but the greater portion is almost precipitous. There are in the town places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and for Methodists of the New Connexion; also a Roman Catholic chapel: the chapel of the Calvinistic Methodists is a large and handsome building: in the township of Bagillt there are also places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists; in that of Brÿnvordd, one for Independents; and in that of Greenfield, one for Calvinistic Methodists. Mr. Williams bequeathed £100 for educating poor children in the grammar school of this parish, to which Mrs. Poole added £25; Mrs. Keay, otherwise Fox, £60, secured on the Flint turnpike; Edward Price, £25; and an unknown benefactor, £120: the interest of these sums, amounting to £14 per annum, is paid to the master of a school held in the ancient chapel of St. Winifred, who, in consideration of this stipend, instructs gratuitously fifteen boys, for the purchase of books for whose use William Wenlock, in 1691, and Catherine Wenlock, in 1708, each bequeathed a small rent-charge. A National school, in which six hundred poor children are gratuitously instructed; and a dispensary for the relief of the indigent poor, have been established, and are liberally supported by subscription. Ellis Parry, a native of Bagillt and a citizen of London, in 1628, bequeathed a messuage, tenement, and lands, in the township of Bagillt, comprising thirty-five acres, let on lease at a rent of £43. 4., which is distributed weekly in bread to the poor of the parish. The same benefactor also bequeathed a rent-charge of £6, to be paid out of his tenements in London, of which £2 was to be appropriated to placing out two poor boys in service, the same sum as a marriage portion to two poor maids, and the remainder to be equally divided between the vicar and the churchwardens of the parish. Edward George, in 1640, bequeathed a messuage and thirteen parcels of land in the parish of Ysceiviog, for clothing the poor of this parish annually: of this land, six parcels appear to have been lost through neglect: the remainder, comprising fifteen acres, is let on lease at a rental of £19. 19. 6. Mrs. Catherine Jones and Mrs. Sidney Edwards gave to the vicar the sum of £130 in trust for the poor. Mrs. Ellis of Bagillt bequeathed £10; and David Parry of the same township, £50, to which £10 was added by his executors, William Wenlock and John Lloyd, the interest of which sums, together with that of £17, obtained from the sale of Irish cattle which were seized under an act of parliament prohibiting their importation, and £13, the accumulated interest of the last-mentioned bequests, making a total of £100, is annually distributed among the poor. Mrs. Jones also bequeathed £13, which has been deposited since 1826 in the savings bank, and of which the interest is to be applied to the same purpose. There are also several other charitable donations and bequests.

Among the various endowments of the ancient abbey of Basingwerk, which consisted of possessions widely scattered through an extensive tract of country, were the Spon chapel at Coventry, in the county of Warwick, the churches of Glossop and Longdendale, in the county of Derby, and other property in distant places. The remains of the conventual buildings, which are considerable, are situated near the mouth of the Holywell stream, on a slope towards the sea, protected on the west by a deep gully formed by the stream, and on the north-east by the vast ditch and rampart, forming the ancient line of demarcation, called Wat's Dyke, which, proceeding northward through the Strand Fields, near Holywell, terminates on the sea-shore below the abbey. They display various styles of architecture, from the rudest circular arch and low massive column of the earlier Norman, to the middle era of the early English style. The church, which, from the slight traces of its foundations, appears to have been an extensive structure, has entirely disappeared; but two of the Norman arches of the monastery are entire, and the eastern walls of the conventual buildings, with narrow lancet-shaped windows, are almost perfect: the south gable of the refectory, with its beautiful windows, is in tolerable preservation, and the whole of these venerable ruins have an imposing and interesting appearance. The site and revenue of the abbey were granted, in the 32nd of Henry II., to Henry ab Harry, whose daughter conveyed them by marriage to the family of Mostyn of Talacre, ancestor of Sir Edward Mostyn, Bart., the present proprietor. In the field adjoining the abbey are the remains of an ancient oak of large dimensions and venerable appearance, even in its present decayed state: it is called the Abbot's Oak, and is supposed to have been planted in the time of the last abbot. There are also in various places vestiges of a fine broad road anciently leading through the woods from the abbey to St. Winifred's well, and portions of the walls of the commandery of the Knights Templar are still remaining. The name of a hill of narrow and steep ascent immediately above the church, called Brÿn y Castell, appears to mark it as the site of the ancient castle of Trëfynnon, supposed to have been built by Ranulph Earl of Chester, about the year 1210, but of which no historical notice is preserved, and the only vestiges are some small portions of its foundations. In digging the foundation of some of the smelting-houses, the remains of a Roman hypocaust were discovered, a circumstance corroborating the supposition that the mines of this place, which are known to have been worked at a very early period, were not unknown to the Romans. An eminence in this parish, called Brÿn Dychwelwch, or "the Return Hill," is said to have been the place from which Henry II. gave orders for the retreat of his forces, when his whole army was engaged in the defile at Coleshill. The commemoration of St. Winifred's decollation is still annually celebrated on the 22nd of June, and that of the translation of her remains to Shrewsbury on the 3rd of November. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £2508. 16.

HOPE, or ESTYN, a small borough, and a parish, in the Hope division of the hundred of MAELÖR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, on the road from Wrexham to Mold, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from the former, 6 (S. E.) from the latter, 12½ (S. S. E.) from Flint, and 193 (N. W.) from London, containing 2747 inhabitants. This place has been distinguished in the Welsh border history from a very early period. Its castle, situated about a mile from the village, has been generally known by the appellation of Caergwrle, which anciently was also probably applied to the whole parish, and is supposed to be derived from the ancient British words Caer gawr lleon, signifying "the fortress of the gigantic legion;" in explanation of which etymology it is stated that the native Britons gave the distinguishing appellation of "gigantic" to the twentieth Roman legion, surnamed Victrix, whose principal station was that of Deva, now Chester. This conjecture has received material support from the circumstance of a Roman sudatory having been found here, and from vestiges of Roman roads and other works having been until lately visible in the neighbourhood; from which it may be presumed to have formed, like Holt, an outpost to the grand station of Deva. After the withdrawal of the Roman forces from Britain, it appears, from remains still visible, to have been occupied as a post of defence by the native population, who, at some remote period, erected here a mural fortress, which, in the reign of Henry II., formed part of the possessions of a chieftain named Gruffydd Maelor. The first mention of Hope under its present name occurs in the Norman survey, where it is noticed as a small hamlet in the possession of one Gislebert. It gave name to the extensive territory of Hopedale, for which Eustace de Cruer, in the reign of William Rufus, did homage to that monarch, and which appears subsequently to have formed part of the possessions of the Montaltos, Stewards of Chester. The castle, with its dependent territories, was bestowed by Edward I. on Davydd, the brother of Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, who, about the year 1280, was sued for the village of Hope, or Estyn, by William Venables, an Englishman, before the Justiciary of Chester, contrary to the custom of the Welsh, and to the spirit of the agreement under which he held them of the English king. The Justiciary cut down his woods in the neighbourhood of Hope, as well as those of Llewelyn, another of his estates, and sold the timber, which was carried to Ireland. He was moreover threatened, when Reginald de Grey, the other Justiciary, should come into the country, that he should be deprived of his castle of Hope, and that his children should be secured as pledges of his fidelity to the English cause, which, however, undoubtedly influenced by this harsh treatment, as well as by other cogent reasons, he shortly after abandoned for that of his brother and his country. In consequence of this defection, about the middle of June, 1282, Edward I. invested in person the castle of Hope, which was surrendered to him by the dependents of Davydd, almost as soon as he appeared before it, and which he is said to have granted to his queen Eleanor, who rested in it for one night on her route to Carnarvon, where she was about to reside for the purpose of reconciling the newly subjugated Welsh to the government of their English conquerors, by giving birth, in the heart of their ancient dominions, to a prince destined to be their ruler. It is related in Yorke's "Royal Tribes," that while Edward and his consort were staying here, this castle, either by accident or design, was set on fire, and its interior entirely consumed. From the circumstance of its being in the possession of Eleanor, it obtained the name of Queen's Hope; and it has sometimes likewise been distinguished by the appellation of East Hope. In Edward's division of North Wales into counties, after its entire subjugation, Hope was included in that of Flint, and annexed to the earldom of Chester; and the castle, together with the manor of Hope and Hopedale, has always been specified in the charters of the succeeding kings of England, when they respectively created their eldest son, the heir apparent to the crown, Prince of Wales, at the same time investing him with the earldom of Chester. In 1307, this castle and manor were granted to John de Cromwell, on condition that he should repair the former, which was then in a ruinous state; and in 1317, the same Cromwell, who kept possession of the castle till his death, was ordered to raise fifty foot soldiers on his lands in Wales, to aid the king in his war against Scotland. In a survey of the ancient revenue of the earldom of Chester, made in the reign of Edward III., the profits of the manor of Hope and Hopedale are estimated at £63. Edward the Black Prince gave the inhabitants a charter of incorporation, dated at Chester, in 1351, which was confirmed by Richard II., who, in 1388, granted the territory of Hope and Hopedale to John de Holland, Earl of Huntingdon, who, after the deposition of that sovereign by Bolingbroke, was beheaded by the populace at Pleshey, in the county of Essex. In 1401, Henry IV. granted the manor to Sir John Stanley, whose estates were inherited by his descendant, James Lord Stanley, created Earl of Derby by Henry VII. On the arrangements made with regard to the Welsh border counties, in the reign of Henry VIII., Hope was annexed to the county of Denbigh; but shortly afterwards, probably through the influence of the Earl of Derby, who wished to have all his Welsh possessions in the same county, it was restored to the shire within the limits of which it had been originally included by Edward I.

Hope at present forms an insignificant village, agreeably situated on an eminence on the northern side of the river Alyn, which intersects the parish, within the limits of which an abundance of limestone of good quality is found: the Frith lime-works are conducted on a very extensive scale, and afford employment to a considerable number of workmen: great quantities of lime are sent hence to Chester, a distance of twelve miles. By the charter of Edward the Black Prince, it was provided, that the constable of the castle of Caergwrle, or Hope, for the time being, should be mayor of the borough; but, to qualify him for this office, it was necessary that he should solemnly swear, on the Holy Evangelists, that he would preserve inviolate the privileges of the burgesses, as specified in the said charter; and that he would annually, on Michaelmas-day, choose from among their number two bailiffs. By the 27th of Henry VIII. Caergwrle, or Hope, was constituted a contributory borough, to share with Flint, Caerwys, Overton, and Rhuddlan, in the return of a member to serve in parliament. The limits of the borough comprise the whole of the township of Hope, or Estyn, and that of Caergwrle, with part of that of Rhanbervedd, being two miles and a half in extent from east to west, and one and a half from north to south; and the right of voting is vested in all the inhabitants paying scot and lot, who have resided for one year within the borough, of whom the present number is one hundred and twenty. The late act for amending the representation of the people has added the towns of St. Asaph, Holywell, and Mold, to the above-mentioned district of boroughs, but has not altered the boundaries of this borough, nor the nature of the franchise, except by subjecting each voter to the registry: the bailiffs of Flint are the returning officers. Fairs are held on Shrove-Tuesday, May 10th, August 12th, and October 27th.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, a small edifice dedicated to St. Cynvarch, contains some good monuments, among which is one to the memory of Sir John Trevor, Knt., secretary to the Earl of Nottingham, the vanquisher of the "Invincible Armada." There are some small benefactions to the parish for distribution among the poor, and for the apprenticing of poor children. The present remains of the castle form a picturesque ruin, situated on the summit of a rocky hill of great elevation, isolated from the surrounding high grounds, and composed almost entirely of breccia, which was formerly quarried for millstones. On one side this rock is precipitous, and on every other is inaccessible, except only on the north, where its summit is gained by the remains of a circuitous path. The ruin consists of a decayed circular tower, with a few fragments of walls and circumjacent earthworks. From these it does not appear to have been an extensive fortress; but the strength of its situation was well adapted for the defence of the passage from the marches up the vale of the Alyn, which is here contracted into a romantic dingle, and anciently formed the only pass through the neighbouring hills. By whom it was dismantled, or when it fell into decay, is unknown; but it was in a dilapidated state as early as the reign of Henry VIII. On the opposite elevation, across the vale, is an ancient British post, commonly called Caer Estyn, consisting of a wide area enclosed by a single ditch and rampart. The ancient Roman outpost of Caer gawr lleon is supposed to have occupied the site on which the castle was subsequently erected. In 1606, a Roman hypocaust, or sudatory, was discovered in digging near this fortress: it was five ells long, four broad, and half an ell high, and was hewn out of the solid rock: the floor was of brick set in mortar; the roof, supported by hollow brick pillars, consisted of polished tiles, which in several places were perforated, and over which were laid brick tubes: some of the tiles were inscribed LEGIO XX. Other traces of Roman occupation also formerly existed here: large beds of scoria have been discovered near Caer Estyn, supposed to have been the refuse of Roman iron-works; and Roman roads might formerly be traced in several places, leading hence towards Mold and Hawarden, adjacent to the former of which was an artificial mount. In the township of Uchymynydd-Isa, in a little valley on the southern side of Bryn-Yorkyn mountain, are some remains of Offa's Dyke, near the spot where this ancient line of demarcation enters the county of Flint from Denbighshire. In levelling this dyke, in 1828, twenty-two Roman coins of copper were discovered, among which were some of the Emperors Nero, Vespasian, Trajan, Julius Agricola, and Maximilian: here were also found a silver coin of Agrippa, several fibulæ highly ornamented, rings of gold, silver, and copper, pins of ivory and silver, beads of glass and amber, part of a lamp with the word NINVS impressed on it, a votive altar with a mutilated inscription, and several urns containing calcined bones and ashes, all of which are in the possession of the proprietor of the land. Wat's Dyke also traverses this parish, in its course along the eastern bank of the Alyn, passing by the church of Hope, and by Rhyddin, below Caer Estyn, beyond which it soon enters Denbighshire. On the banks of the Alyn at Rhyddin are some fine springs, the waters of which are strongly impregnated with muriate of soda, and were formerly in high repute for their efficacy in the cure of cutaneous and other diseases, greatly resembling in quality those of the fountain at Borrowdale, near Keswick, in Cumberland. In dry weather, pigeons flock to them to pick up the crystallized particles; but their medicinal virtues have been greatly deteriorated by an admixture of other waters, or impoverished by drainage. In the loose earth which covers the calcareous strata of this parish are found numerous antediluvian organic remains, called entrochi and astroites, some of which are of a peculiar species. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £685. 6.

HOPE, a township in the parish of BUTTINGTON, within the jurisdiction of the borough of WELSHPOOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S.) from Welshpool, containing 162 inhabitants. It is one of the incorporated places assessed for the maintenance of their poor in the house of industry at Forden, the average annual expenditure for this township being £57. 16.

HOSELEY, a joint lordship and township with Merford, in the parish of GRESFORD, partly in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, and partly in that of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. E.) from Wrexham. The population is returned with Merford.

HUBBERSTON, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (W. by N.) from Milford, on the turnpike road from Haverfordwest to Haking, or Old Milford, containing 1013 inhabitants. This parish is situated on a creek or inlet of Milford Haven, at the upper end of which are the remains of a religious establishment, formerly called Pill priory, built upon a pill which separates this parish from that of Steynton, and which, though it has obtained the name of Hubberston priory, is locally within the latter parish. Botolphs, the seat of Anthony Innes Stokes, Esq., an elegant modern mansion, erected on the site of some of the conventual buildings of the priory, though not within this parish, closely borders upon it, and is equally remarkable for the style of the building and the beauty of its situation, commanding a pleasing view of the haven, and of the adjacent country. Boat-building is carried on to a considerable extent at Haking, or Old Milford, and affords employment to a few of the inhabitants of this place, which is now included within the boundaries of the new contributory borough of Milford. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 2. 8½., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a small, ancient, and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower: in the chancel are three elegantly canopied recesses, probably for the officiating priests, or perhaps appropriated to the dignitaries of the priory on particular occasions. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists; and a spacious building has been left by its late proprietor for the free use of ministers of every denomination. Mr. George Roch, in 1707, bequeathed a small rent-charge for teaching poor children, and for the relief of distressed housekeepers of the parish; and in 1752, Mr. James Allen bequeathed £50 in money, to be invested in the purchase of land, and the produce to be annually distributed among the poor: these bequests produce about £6 per annum. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £184.6.

HYSSINGTON (called by the Welsh IS-ATTYN), a parish partly in the hundred of CHIRBURY, county of SALOP, but chiefly in the lower division of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (E. by S.) from Montgomery, containing 337 inhabitants. The village is situated at the foot of a mountain, rising to the height of upwards of one thousand seven hundred feet above the level of the sea, and forming the forest of Corndon, or Carn Attyrn, which is partly within the parish: this mountain has three summits, formed by three cairns, the supposed sepulchres of some ancient British heroes, which command extensive views, embracing the Welsh mountains, and the Wrekin, Clee, Malvern, and other hills, together with the Black Mountain in Herefordshire. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1100 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Incumbent of Churchstoke. The church is a small structure, in the early style of English architecture, and appears to have been built within the precincts of an ancient castle, of which some vestiges may be distinctly traced upon the summit of a small rocky eminence adjoining the churchyard. Upon an old bell in the steeple, now broken, was inscribed, in Saxon characters, "Sancta Etheldreda, ora pro nobis." Upon a farm in this parish, called "the Llan," are the remains of an ancient encampment. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £94.17.

IDDOLE, a joint hamlet with Moelvre, in the parish of LLANDEVEYLOG, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{3}{4}$  miles (S.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with Moelvre. It is situated near the eastern bank of the Towy, and commands many beautiful views of that river.

ILSTON, called by the Welsh LLAN-ILLTYD, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Swansea, containing 296 inhabitants. The village, which is situated in the peninsula of Gower, and between two turnpike roads which lead through that liberty, is extremely rural in its appearance; and the surrounding scenery, which is characterized by features of tranquillity and seclusion, is enlivened by the small rivulet called Penarth Pill, winding through a beautiful dell, in which are the ruins of an ancient chapel. On this stream a clothmanufactory was established early in the present century, but it has been discontinued. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9.6.8., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, from whom the parish probably derived its name, is not entitled to architectural notice: it had formerly a chapel of ease, which is now in ruins. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Amidst the rubbish of a limekiln were found, in 1825, about two hundred small silver coins, many of which are in excellent preservation, and are coins of the Roman emperors from Nero to Marcus Aurelius inclusive: the place where they were discovered is called Pengwern, and occupies a commanding situation, plentifully supplied with water, but, though well adapted for the purpose of a military station, there are no vestiges of any encampment, though there are several within the distance of a few miles. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £77.13.

ISCLYDACH (IS-CLYDACH), a hamlet in the parish of LLYWEL, hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (E.) from Trêcastle, containing 362 inhabitants. The name signifies below the Clydach, which stream bounds this hamlet on the west, and the river Usk on the south, where it is crossed by a bridge on the road from Brecknock to Trêcastle. The vale through which the former stream flows is pleasingly diversified and well wooded, and, as well as the banks of the Usk, is ornamented with several agreeable residences. The chapel of Rhŷd y briw is situated in this hamlet, on the left bank of the Usk, having been originally erected, as is supposed, for the convenience of the family of Penry of Llwynycyntein, and subsequently supported by the contributions of the inhabitants of the vicinity, who subscribed forty shillings per annum towards the stipend of a clergyman. The living is now a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llywel. From the circumstance of one of the pieces of ground, purchased in Glamorganshire with the above-mentioned endowment, having valuable beds of coal, discovered subsequent to the purchase, this curacy has become more valuable than the superior benefice of Llywel. The rites of sepulture, marriage, and baptism have for some time been celebrated here, though with what right is questionable. About thirty years ago the curate was licensed on the nomination of the owners and occupiers of land in this hamlet, the vicar not choosing to assert his claim. There is, for distribution among the poor, a small bequest of £1 per annum, made by Roger Jeffreys, in 1714, being a rent-charge on lands near the chapel. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £209.1.

ISCOED (IS-COED), a joint hamlet with Gwilly, in the parish of LLANEDY, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $13\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. N. W.) from Swansea. The population is included in the return for the parish, of which this hamlet forms the northern portion. Gwilly is part of the ancient lordship of Kidwelly, which extended over the same district. The Gwili stream flows on the western boundary of the hamlet, which contains some agreeable residences and well-wooded enclosures on the right bank of the Loughor river. The road from Pont-ar-ddulas to Llandilo-Vawr passes through it, on elevated ground, embracing pleasing views of a rich and cultivated country on the right and left.

ISCOED (IS-COED), a joint hamlet with Cilmargh, in the parish of LLANDEVEYLOG, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. by E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with Cilmargh. Some respectable residences are observable in this hamlet, which is situated on the eastern bank of the river Towy. Near Cilmargh is an ancient weir on that river, in which large quantities of salmon are taken, and conveyed to the market of Carmarthen. A Roman road from Carmarthen to Kidwelly passed through this hamlet.

ISCOED (IS-COED), a township in that part of the parish of MALPAS which is in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. N. W.) from Whitchurch, containing 438 inhabitants. This place, situated on the borders of Cheshire and Shropshire, is the most eastern district of North Wales; and the road from Whitchurch to Wrexham passes through it. The Wich brook, which falls into the river Dee near Worthenbury, bounds the township on the north, the remainder of the parish being in Cheshire. There are brine springs in the neighbourhood. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £206. 18.

ISCOED (IS-COED), a township in the parish of PENEGOES, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Machynlleth, containing 380 inhabitants. The road from Machynlleth to Mallwyd, along the left bank of the Dovey, which here receives the Dulas and other tributary streams, passes through this township, and is for a few miles skirted with thriving hedge-rows, and rich meadows and corn-fields, backed by verdant hills. This hamlet contains several neat cottages and respectable villas, amongst which is Dôlgŷog, on the left bank of the Dovey, an ancient retreat of the Welsh poet, Llywarch Hên, where, by the strains of his harp, he soothed the remembrance of his misfortunes: the parochial church is situated within its limits.

ISHMAEL'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. by W.) from Carmarthen, containing 944 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the sea-shore, and many of the inhabitants obtain a livelihood by collecting for sale the beautiful shells which are found here in great variety and abundance. It contains the improving village of Ferry-side, which is described under its appropriate head; and the seat called Iscoed, an elegant mansion, erected by Sir William Mansel, Bart., and now the property of the Rev. Edward Picton, having been purchased from the son of Sir William by the late General Sir Thomas Picton, G. C. B., who, after eminently distinguishing himself in the late continental war, fell in the battle of Waterloo; also Pengay, the seat of — Bevan, Esq., which commands a most delightful sea view, comprehending the distant shores of Devonshire and Cornwall: this gentleman is one of the few to whom the country is indebted for the introduction of the Norfolk and other improved systems of agriculture. The village of St. Ishmael's is situated on the banks of the navigable river Towy, and the surrounding district is celebrated for the production of barley of very fine quality. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is built upon a rock near the sea-shore, and at high tides the waves approach within thirty yards of its base. Within the limits of the parish is a chapel of ease, called Llansaint chapel, occupying a very elevated site, its lofty tower forming a conspicuous object and a well-known landmark to mariners approaching the coast. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. On a farm called Pen Allt are some remains of old walls, overspread with ivy; and, according to tradition, a monastery formerly existed here; of which, however, no authentic account has been preserved. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £300. 19.

ISHMAEL'S (ST.), a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by N.) from Milford, containing 527 inhabitants. It is situated on the northern shore of Milford Haven, and is separated from the parish of Herbrandston by Sandy haven. There are several respectable residences within its limits, though not entitled to notice as seats of importance: the principal is the neat residence of Mr. Roch, which is supposed to have been originally a grange belonging to Hubberston priory. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 12. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ , endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The tithes are divided into three equal portions, of which one is appropriated to the corporation of the borough of Tewkesbury, another to the incumbent of that parish, and the third to the vicar of St. Ishmael's. The church is romantically situated in a deep sequestered valley, watered by a small estuary which falls into Milford Haven, a short distance below it. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. Immediately above the church is a tenement called Monks, supposed to have been connected with the priory of Hubberston. In the village is a remarkable tumulus, but nothing is known of its history, nor does it appear to have been opened. St. Ishmael's, it is said, was the final retreat of Caradoc of Llancarvan, the celebrated historian of Wales, who here spent the latter years of his life in retirement and seclusion, and, after his decease, was interred with great pomp in the cathedral church of St. David's. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £304. 8

ISMORLAIS (IS-MORLAIS), a hamlet in the parish of LLANNON, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. A stream named Morlais rises here, and, after passing Llangennech, falls into the Loughor river. The parochial church and village of Llannon are situated within the limits of this hamlet.

ISSEL'S, ST., (ST. ISSELL'S), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Tenby, containing 1226 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated at the western extremity of Carmarthen bay, has its surface singularly diversified with abrupt and precipitous eminences and deep dingles, which, being richly wooded, form a striking contrast to the dingy and sterile appearance occasioned by the coal mines in the immediate vicinity. But the greatest ornament to this part of the country is the richly wooded eminence on which stands Hean Castle, the seat of Thomas Stokes, Esq., which commands extensive and interesting marine views, embracing a great variety of beautiful and romantic scenery along the coast. The estate attached to it formerly belonged to the Wogans of Wiston, from whom it passed to its present proprietor, by marriage with one of the coheirresses of that ancient family. Kilgetty, an ancient mansion in this parish, belonging to the family of Picton, and in which the late Lord Milford was born, is in the occupation of a farmer, and is at present going to decay. The parish abounds with excellent coal and culm, of which great quantities are annually raised by a company, and shipped for various parts of the kingdom at Sander's Foot, where a pier is now being constructed, to which a rail-road is already in progress from these mines and those of Begelly. Other improvements have also been commenced, among which a plan for rendering the quay accessible to larger vessels than could previously approach with safety is in a considerable state of advancement. Iron-ore is also found in connexion with the strata of coal, and was formerly wrought to a considerable extent by the Pembrey Iron Company; but the works have been discontinued for the last five or six years, owing to a want of charcoal for fuel, the coal here produced being of the hard species called "stone coal," and consequently unfit to be employed in the manufacture of metals. The sands on this part of the coast are extremely favourable for sea-bathing, and a few families, who prefer retirement and tranquillity, resort hither during the summer season, preferring the humbler, but more peaceable, accommodations which the inns of this place afford, to the gaieties of Tenby. The beach abounds with most of the species of shells found at Tenby, and numerous fossil remains are discovered in the mines, at a great depth from the surface. The turtle, or "scorpion" stone, as it is here called, is frequently met with, and is susceptible of a beautiful polish. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 17. 6., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of St. David's. The church is romantically situated in one of the richly wooded dells with which the parish abounds, and is a neat structure in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, which is seen to great advantage above the wood in which it is embosomed. The free school was founded by John Jones, Esq., who, in 1757, bequeathed £300 in trust for the gratuitous instruction of an equal number of children of both sexes, in reading and writing: the income arising from this bequest, amounting to £16. 12. per annum, is appropriated to the maintenance of the school, the remainder of the funds necessary for which being raised by subscription. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £187. 9.

IS Y COED, a parochial chapelry in the parish of HOLT, hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Wrexham, comprising the townships of Cacca-Dutton, Dutton y Brân, Dutton-Difieth, Ridley, and Sutton, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 594 inhabitants. This place is pleasantly situated on the western bank of the river Dee, by which goods and merchandise might be conveyed to Chester; but there is neither any trade, beyond what is necessary for the supply of the inhabitants, nor any manufacture carried on in the village, the inhabitants of which are chiefly employed in agriculture. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Chester, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church, dedicated to St. Paul, is a neat modern structure, erected, in 1829, by subscription, aided by a grant from the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels, and is capable of accommodating three hundred persons. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A Sunday school is supported by subscription; and there are several small charitable bequests for distribution among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of this chapelry amounts to £274.

IS Y GARREG (IS-GAREG), a township in the parish and hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S. W.) from Machynlleth, containing 392 inhabitants. From this township many pleasing views of the river and vale of the Dovey, from Cemmaes to its influx into Cardigan bay, are obtained; but other parts present lofty mountains and barren wastes, especially in that portion bordering on Cardiganshire. There are slate quarries and lead mines, but the latter are not now worked. Several respectable residences are scattered over the lower part of the township, which is bounded on the north by the Dovey, and on the west by the Llynant, rivers. A small detached portion of it is included within the new boundaries of the borough of Machynlleth. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £222. 17.

IS Y GRAIG (IS-GRAIG), a hamlet in the parish of LLANDDWYWAU, hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Barmouth. The population is returned with the parish. It is bounded on the west by the bay of Cardigan, which here forms an irregular strand, with crags and rude precipices, extending from a chain of the Merionethshire mountains. A remarkable sand-bank, termed the Causeway, or Sarn Badrig, stretches from this coast in a south-western direction, twenty-one miles into the bay, of which about nine miles are dry at low water. In several parts it is covered only to the depth of half a fathom at flood tide, but there are three breaches in it, through which vessels may pass. Some have considered it an artificial construction, and others that it formed a part of the Cantrêv y Gwaelod, or the lowland hundred, which was overwhelmed by the sea at the close of the fifth century. The vulgar notion is, that it was constructed by Saint Patrick, as the name implies, who was born in this neighbourhood, at Gwaredog in Arvon, previously to his mission to Ireland. The general aspect of the hamlet, which contains the parish church, is rugged and mountainous. Agriculture and the manufacture of webs are the chief employment of the inhabitants. A small canal has been recently projected, which will run parallel with, and at a short distance from, the coast, for the purpose of conveying the waters of two small streams to the creek near Llandanwg church.

JEFFRESTON, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. by W.) from Narberth, containing 610 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated on a well-wooded eminence, and forms a conspicuous and interesting feature in the views from the adjacent parts of the country. Near the turnpike road from Narberth to Pembroke, which passes through the parish, and about half-way between Creswell-Quay and the church, is Cresselly, the seat of I. H. Allen, Esq., surrounded with luxuriant plantations. The substrata of the soil of this parish are stone coal and culm, which have been wrought to a very great extent, and still continue to be procured, though on a smaller scale. The mines are thought to be nearly exhausted, but it is probable that, by carrying the shaft to a greater depth, an abundant supply might still be obtained. The coal is shipped at Creswell Quay, in a branch of Milford Haven extending for more than a mile and a half to the south, and partly in this parish, for the coast of Sussex, in vessels of about eighty tons' burden. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 17. 6., endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Chapter of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Jeffry and St. Oswald, is not distinguished by any remarkable architectural features. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £231. 5.

JOHN'S (ST.) juxta SWANSEA, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, adjoining the sea-port town of Swansea, and containing 690 inhabitants. The name of this place, in Welsh "Eglwys Ieuan Aber Tawe," is derived from the dedication of its church, which originally belonged to the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and from its situation adjacent to the town of Swansea, immediately below which the river Tawe discharges its waters into the Bristol channel. The parish, which is small, containing not more than six farms of moderate size, extends nearly a mile in length in a northerly direction from Swansea, within which town it comprises one or two houses. The scenery in the immediate vicinity is not so engaging as that by which the environs of the borough on the south-west side are distinguished; but the distant views comprehend some pleasing features, with a fine prospect, from some parts of the parish, of the Bristol channel and the coast of Devonshire. Within the parish are some coal-works and a manufactory of tobacco pipes: the Hâvod works for smelting copper, and the rolling-mills belonging to F. A. Williams and Co., which are also within its limits, are noticed in the account of Swansea. The whole of the parish is now included within the new boundaries of the contributory borough of Swansea. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir John Morris. The church, dedicated to St. John, having fallen into a state of dilapidation, was taken down and rebuilt in 1824, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels granted £575: the present structure, which is situated within the town of Swansea, is a plain massive edifice, without tower or spire, and contains one thousand free sittings, in consideration of the grant above mentioned, affording great accommodation to the inhabitants of that part of the town, who cannot find room in their own church. The service is performed both in the English and Welsh languages. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £100. 13.

JOHNSTON, a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (S. S. W.) from Haverfordwest, on the road to Milford, containing 194 inhabitants. The environs are pleasant, and contain some agreeable scenery, and in the vicinity are several respectable seats. Johnston Hall, an ancient mansion of the family of Edwards, and for a long time the residence of the late Lord Kensington, is now the property of the present lord, and is in the occupation of Thomas Bowen, Esq. The lands, which are all freehold, are chiefly enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation. This parish abounds with culm and limestone, the former of which is worked for the supply of the neighbourhood, and the latter also on a limited scale, and chiefly burnt for manure. The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with the vicarage of Steynton, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £2. 0. 5., endowed with the rectorial tithes, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is not distinguished by any peculiar architectural features. There is a place of worship for Baptists. A Sunday school, in which about forty children are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £35. 9.

JORDANSTON, a parish in the hundred of DEW-ISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Fishguard, containing 157 inhabitants. It appears to have derived its name from an ancient family estate within its limits, and is pleasantly situated in the north-western part of the county, being intersected by a stream which falls into the river Hog. The surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified, and the views of the adjacent country comprehend a pleasing variety of interesting features. In the immediate vicinity are some handsome seats, of which the principal within the parish are, Jordanston, the ancient family mansion of the Vaughans, agreeably situated in a retired part of the country, and comprehending much pleasing scenery; and Llangwaren, an ancient residence, the property of C. Matthias, Esq., now of Lamphey Court, which, with the extensive and well-cultivated farm attached to it, is at present in the occupation of I. M. Phelps, Esq. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 3. 9., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of G. G. Vaughan, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Cwrda, is a small neat edifice, appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service, in Glamorganshire. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £96. 10.

KERRY (CERI), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MONTGOMERY, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Newtown, containing 2199 inhabitants. The name is of doubtful etymology. Some deduce it from Ceri, the "mountain ash," with which the district is thought formerly to have abounded. Others consider it to be a corruption of Caerau, "fortified places," there being remains of several in the parish and its vicinity, which, in consequence of being situated near the English border, were the scene of frequent contests: but this is evidently erroneous, inasmuch as the place is called by the same name so early as the sixth century, long prior to the construction of those numerous defences which border warfare subsequently rendered necessary. The late Rev. Mr. Jenkins, an ingenious antiquary, and vicar of this parish for many years, was of opinion that the place derived its name from some chieftain, or petty prince, of remote antiquity, whose patrimony it was, a practice which prevailed to a considerable extent in the early ages of the Britons; and supposed that it might have been Ceri Hir Lyngwyn, grandfather of the celebrated Caractacus. In ancient times Kerry, or Ceri, comprehended a district containing the parishes of Kerry and Môchtrêv, the church being then called Llanvihangel yn Ngheri, "the church of St. Michael in Kerry," and formed a comot in the province of Ferregs, coterminous with what is now the upper division of the hundred. The first event of moment mentioned with relation to it is, that it was the scene of a determined, but bloodless, struggle between the celebrated Giraldus Cambrensis, Archdeacon of Brecknock, and Adam, Bishop of St. Asaph, regarding the right to the church, which, although it had for some time been considered as belonging to the diocese of St. David's, was claimed by that prelate, who forthwith raised a strong body of men from Powys, to assist, if necessary, in enforcing his claim. Giraldus, on being apprized of this, despatched messengers to two chieftains of this country, Eionor Clyd and Cadwallon, requesting military aid in asserting the rights of the church of St. David's, determining to anticipate the bishop's design. Having arrived at Kerry, he entered the church, and, ordering the bells to be rung, in token of possession, celebrated mass. Meanwhile messengers having been sent by the bishop, announcing his approach to dedicate the church, the archdeacon commissioned some of his clergy, attended by the dean of the district, to inform him, that, if he came as a friend, he would be kindly received; but if not, he urged him to advance no further. The latter, however, desisted not from his purpose, and was met by the archdeacon and his clergy at the entrance to the churchyard, where a contention arose, each party asserting his respective right to the church. The bishop, putting on his mitre, and taking his pastoral staff in his hand, approached with his attendants, at which also the opposite party, dressed in their surplices and sacerdotal robes, with lighted tapers and elevated crucifix, came forth in processional order, and each began to excommunicate the other; but the archdeacon ordering the bells to be rung three times, in confirmation of his sentence, the bishop and his party mounted horse, and hastily rode off, amid the shouts and pelting of the crowd which so unusual an occurrence had caused to assemble. According to Matthew Paris, Henry III., having led an army to the relief of the castle of Montgomery, which the Welsh were then besieging, and compelled them to abandon their enterprise, advanced further into their country, and was opposed by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, at a place corruptly called Cridia, in the Vale of Kerry. Having employed much time in cutting down a large wood, which had frequently protected the Welsh from previous aggressions of the English forces, he took and demolished a castellated mansion situated in the centre of it, and thereby deprived them of one of their most important posts: observing the highly favourable position of the place, he, with the advice of his minister, Hubert de Burgh, commenced the erection of a castle upon the site of the former edifice: during the progress of the work, he was so harassed by the Welsh, who intercepted his convoys, and cut off his foraging parties, that, after three months labour and considerable expense, he was obliged to abandon his design, and agree to a truce: the conditions were that he should raze to the ground the works which he had constructed, since called "Hubert's Folly," and that the Welsh prince should pay three thousand marks for the materials, and agree to do homage for the lordship of Kerry. In one of the rencontres which took place at that time, William de Breos, lord of Brecknock, was made prisoner by the Welsh.

The parish, which is situated in the southern part of the shire, adjoining the counties of Radnor and Salop, is about thirteen miles in length, varying in breadth from three to five miles, and is divided into four parts for the separate maintenance of the poor: it is intersected by the small rivers Mule and Miheli, which form a junction at the distance of three-quarters of a mile below the village, and includes about twelve thousand acres of old enclosed land, and about ten thousand acres of mountainous land, lately allotted as sheepwalks to different farms, under an act passed in 1797. The village is situated on the road from Newtown to Bishop's Castle: in that part of the parish lying above it are the two narrow picturesque vales of the Mule and the Miheli, and below are the vale of the Mule, after its junction with the Miheli, and that of Ceibutrach, environed on both sides by lofty ridges of hills, which afford pasturage in summer to from twelve to fifteen thousand head of sheep. In the time of the latter princes of Wales this district was covered with almost impenetrable woods, and in the reign of Henry VIII. Leland describes it as a forest without deer. It has since been completely stripped of its sylvan clothing, though extensive plantations have lately been formed, which, in the course of a few years, will, from the nature of the soil being highly favourable to the growth of trees, conduce greatly to embellish the scenery of the vale: the system of agriculture has also been much improved of late years throughout the district. Petty sessions for the upper division of the hundred are held at the village, on the last Friday in every month. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £17. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is stated by Giraldus Cambrensis to have been rebuilt in 1176: it is principally in the Norman style of architecture, and consists of two aisles, separated by eight Norman arches supported on circular and octangular columns, and a massive square tower at the west end, surmounted by a wooden belfry: the font, which is octagonal and very ancient, is adorned in each department with devices emblematical of the Crucifixion. A monumental tablet has been erected to the memory of Giraldus; and on the north side of the window in the south aisle there is a handsome monument, erected at an expense of £525, to the late Richard Jones, Esq., a native of Black Hall, and the benevolent founder of the Black Hall Institution, in this parish: it consists of a white marble bust of the founder, on one side of which is a boy writing, and on the other a girl reading, resting on a pedestal of variegated marble. A neat marble tablet has also lately been put up to the memory of the Rev. Mr. Jenkins, the late vicar. A chapel of ease formerly stood in the township of Gwern-ygo, but no remains of the building can now be traced. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. The Black Hall Institution was founded, in 1787, by the above-named Richard Jones, Esq., who had been a purser in the royal navy, to be "free and open to all Christians, Jews, Turks, and Infidels, that will attend for instruction, that they may hear and learn, and fear the Lord, the great Jehovah." At his decease he bequeathed to trustees funded property consisting of £1000 in the three per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, £1050 four per cent. ditto, and £1000 five per cent. Bank Annuities (the last of which has been advanced on mortgage to the commissioners of the first district of roads in Montgomeryshire), directing the interest to be applied in feeding, clothing, and educating poor children of this parish, and apprenticing poor boys, and the charity to be called by the above-mentioned name. He also bequeathed £700 three per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities to the same trustees, for the support of a Sunday school, established also in 1787, to be called the Kerry Charity Sunday School on the Black Hall Institution. The income of the charity, including a former bequest, amounts to £155. 15. per annum: there are seventy-six boys and fifty-nine girls in the day school, of whom four of each are clothed, and two or three annually apprenticed; and the Sunday school is attended by one hundred children, who, if they choose to stay after the performance of divine service in the morning, are provided with bread and cheese, according to the testamentary directions of the beneficent founder. The school-house stands near the church, and has been extensively repaired and improved at different times, partly by subscription, and partly from the funds of the charity. Divers small bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor, the profits of which are distributed agreeably to the intentions of the donors. On the hills, and in other parts of the parish, are numerous intrenchments, fortifications, and barrows, evincing this neighbourhood to have frequently been the arena of military contentions, unrecorded in history: that in the garden of the parsonage-house, in the township of Trêvlan, consisting of a high mound of earth, encompassed by a moat, is supposed, from its unfinished state, to be the one attempted to be erected by Henry III. The

KEVENLLEECE (CEVN-LLŶS), a parish and contributory borough, in the hundred of KEVENLLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, on the road from Newtown to Builth,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S.W. by S.) from Pen y bont, containing 367 inhabitants. This place, the name of which signifies the "palace ridge," or "hill," is of considerable antiquity, and consists of the borough and the out-parish. A castle of considerable extent and great strength was erected here, about the year 1242, by Ralph Mortimer, which is sometimes called "Castell Glyn Ithon," from its occupying an elevated and commanding site on the banks of the Ithon, by which it was nearly surrounded: the ruins form an interesting object amid the surrounding scenery. The parish is extremely hilly, and, being for the most part destitute of wood, is in general of dreary aspect: the tops of some of the hills, however, command prospects of striking interest. Lead-ore and coal are supposed to exist within its limits, but all attempts to procure these minerals have proved fruitless. Kevenleece is a borough by prescription, and probably owes that distinction to the existence of its ancient castle: the corporation consists of a bailiff, recorder, and burgesses, chosen at the court-leet of the lord of the manor, none of whom exercise magisterial authority. The borough includes within its limits, which were not altered by the Boundary Act recently passed, about one-fifth of the parish, extending about two miles from east to west, and half a mile from north to south. It contributes with Radnor, Rhaiadr, Cnwclâs, Knighton, and, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, Presteign, in sending a member to parliament: the right of voting was formerly in the burgesses at large, nearly two hundred in number, of whom only fifteen are at present resident within the borough, but is now vested, by the late act, in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to its provisions, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of at least ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the present number of houses in the borough, of this value, is only three. It has also been made, by the late Reform Act, a polling-place in the election of a knight for the shire.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8. 19. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is romantically situated on a precipitous knoll, embosomed amid higher hills, and is somewhat difficult of access in winter: it consists of a nave and chancel, with a low tower covered with a shelving roof. There is a place of worship for Independents, endowed with a farm in the parish of Llansantfraid, called Craigueuan, bequeathed by a lady named Jones, and now producing £25 per annum. Thomas Palmer, in 1712, and the Rev. Hugh Powell, in 1713, bequeathed portions of land for the relief of poor housekeepers not receiving parochial aid. The Rev. Mr. Lewis, presumed to have been a former rector, left a sum of money, to be invested in land, which, with a subsequent donation, also vested in land, now produces £25 per annum, which sum is distributed among decayed farmers of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £207.

KIDWELLY, or CYDWELLI, an incorporated market town, and a parish, having separate jurisdiction, locally in the hundred of Kidwelly, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. by E.) from Carmarthen, and 225 (W.) from London, containing 1681 inhabitants, of which number, 1435 are in the borough, and the remainder in the suburbs. This is a place of great antiquity, and by some historians is supposed to have been the scene of the battle between Ambrosius and Vortigern, which Bede states to have been fought in the year 458. This part of the principality, according to Camden, was for many years occupied by the Scots under the sons of Keianus, who were finally expelled by the illustrious British prince, Cunedda. In the reign of William Rufus, William de Londres, one of the twelve knights who attended Fitz-Hamon in his successful attempt upon Glamorgan, and to whom the lordship of Ogmores, in that country, was afterwards assigned, subsequently made a conquest of this district, where he is said to have erected the castle, to which the town was indebted for the importance which it attained. The erection of this fortress, however, is attributed, with greater probability, to one of his descendants, Maurice de Londres, who, according to Camden, after a troublesome war made himself master of Kidwelly, and fortified the old town with walls and a castle. It afterwards became the scene of many important military events. In the year 1114, the town and fortress were surprised and taken by Gruffydd ab Rhys, who retained possession only for a short time; and after its recapture, Gwenllian, wife of Gruffydd, a woman of masculine intrepidity, with a view to recover her husband's territories, placed herself at the head of a body of forces, and, attended by her two sons, attacked Maurice de Londres at a place in the vicinity of the castle, where she was defeated, made prisoner, and put to death by her adversary, one of her sons being also slain, and the other made captive: the place where this battle was fought is still called Maes Gwenllian, or "Gwenllian's Field." In 1148, Cadell, one of the sons of Gruffydd ab Rhys, issuing from Carmarthen with a powerful body of forces, ravaged and laid waste the country around this town. The castle was repaired and strengthened, in 1190, by Rhys ab Gruffydd, but was subsequently demolished in 1233, by Gruffydd, son of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, who had come into this part of the country to oppose the invasions of the Earl of Pembroke, and, hearing that a plot had been concerted by the inhabitants of Kidwelly, to betray him into the power of the English, fired the town, and marched to Carmarthen.

By the marriage of the granddaughter of Maurice de Londres with Henry Earl of Lancaster, the castle and lordship of Kidwelly became the property of this nobleman, and the exclusive jurisdiction at present exercised in the town and lordship owe their origin to the erection of the estates of this earldom into a county palatine in the reign of Edward III. These estates, by descent, became vested in the crown in the reign of Henry VII., who granted the castle and lordship to the celebrated Rhys ab Thomas, to whose assistance that monarch had been materially indebted for the success of his efforts to obtain the crown of England. On the attainder of Gruffydd, grandson of Rhys, they again reverted to the crown, and were sold in the reign of Charles I., to the Vaughans of Golden Grove, in this county; and after the death of John Vaughan, Esq., early in the present century, they became the property of his devisee, Lord Cawdor, whose son and successor, Earl Cawdor, is the present proprietor. The lordship, honour, and liberty of Kidwelly comprises the comots, or hundreds of Carnwallon, Iscennen, and Kidwelly, and contains sixteen parishes and nineteen manors. By virtue of a grant from Charles I., the successive lords have claimed and exercised exclusive jurisdiction within the lordship, independently of the rest of the county of Carmarthen, and also various high, extensive, and important privileges and powers. The lord's officer holds the offices of bailiff itinerant, and bailiff of the liberties of the castles and lordships within the said liberty; and he is also coroner, escheator, and steward of the courts baron, which are held separately for each hundred. He has the return of all writs which run into the liberty, excepting only non omittas writs; and, as bailiff of the liberty, summons, for the assizes and quarter sessions, the grand and petit jurors of that part of the county which lies within its peculiar jurisdiction.

The town occupies a low and uninteresting situation on the banks of the Gwendraeth Vâch, or Lesser Gwendraeth river, which divides it into two portions, called respectively the Old and the New Town, the former of which, situated on the western side, is connected with the latter by a handsome stone bridge. The prosperity of this once important place seems to have been completely annihilated by destructive fires and other misfortunes, prior to the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when its inhabitants were at the lowest ebb of poverty, as appears by a memorial drawn up on their behalf by a native of the place, and presented to Sir George Carew, Knight Marshall. The Old Town, which was formerly surrounded with walls, having three gates, over one of which, in Leland's time, were the remains of a town-hall, with a prison underneath it, and in which are situated the ruins of the castle, now consists, with few exceptions, merely of hovels; and the New Town contains very few respectable dwelling-houses, the majority being thatched cottages of very inferior appearance. The air is salubrious, and the place is considered very healthy; but the importance which it formerly derived from its situation on a fine navigable river, within half a mile of its influx into the great bay of Carmarthen, has ceased from the obstruction of this navigation by the accumulation of sand, which has formed a dangerous bar across the mouth of the river. Its commerce, once flourishing, has in consequence declined; and the opening of collieries, and the establishment of copper-works at Llanelly, to which port this is a creek, have transferred the trade of Kidwelly to that place, and the town has almost entirely sunk into decay. Many fruitless attempts have been made to improve the navigation of the river, and various sums expended in unavailing efforts to remove the obstructions which impeded it. Some docks, and a short canal, were constructed here about the year 1766, by Mr. Keymer, a private individual: the former are situated about half a mile from the town, and the latter was intended to convey coal from the mouth of the neighbouring pits to the vessels in the harbour. Some years ago, this navigation was transferred to a company, known as the "Kidwelly Canal Company," by whom it was extended a distance of two miles up the vale of Gwendraeth; and a branch, three miles and a half in length, was constructed to communicate with Pembrey harbour. Here were formerly both iron and tin works, the former of which have been entirely abandoned, and the latter are now conducted only on a very limited scale. The only exports are coal, to the opposite side of the Bristol channel, and corn, cheese, and other agricultural produce to Bristol. Markets were formerly held by charter, on Tuesday and Friday; but the former has been discontinued, and the latter, from the proximity of Carmarthen and Llanelly, has become merely a market for butchers' meat and vegetables. Fairs are held on May 24th, August 1st, and October 29th. This town received its first charter of incorporation from Henry VI.: James II., in the sixteenth year of his reign, granted to its inhabitants their present charter, by which the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, two bailiffs, and a common council of twelve aldermen and twelve principal burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, chamberlain, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The mayor is annually chosen from the aldermen, and the bailiffs, who act as sheriffs, from the principal burgesses. The mayor, and one of the aldermen elected for that purpose, are justices of the peace within the borough. The corporation, by their charter, are empowered to hold courts of quarter session for the borough; are entitled to the goods of felons and all escheats whatsoever, and to take custom of all goods and merchandise entered inwards or cleared outwards from the port; and possess other important privileges. A court of record for pleas of debt and trespass, to the amount of £200, arising within the borough, is held every alternate Monday, before the mayor, assisted by the town-clerk, who claims the power of issuing process to hold to bail in actions of debt; and a court for the recovery of debts under forty shillings is held every third week, the jurisdiction of which extends over the entire hundred. The town-hall is a tenement, possessing no architectural features worthy of notice, which has been fitted up for this purpose, and attached to which is a small place of confinement, serving occasionally as a lock-up house for the borough.

The parish of Kidwelly is divided into St. Mary's within, and St. Mary's without the borough, each division separately maintaining its own poor. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 10., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated in the New Town, is an ancient cruciform structure, of which the transepts are now in ruins, with a square embattled tower at the western end, surmounted by a very lofty spire: over the entrance is a figure of the Virgin, and in the interior is a monumental effigy of a priest, with an inscription, now illegible. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, conducted on the National system, is supported by subscription, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children. At Penallt, near this place, was anciently a small priory of Benedictine monks, founded about the year 1130, by Roger, Bishop of Sarum, who dedicated it to St. Mary, and made it a cell to the abbey of Sherborne in Dorsetshire: it continued to flourish till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was £38: the present remains are very inconsiderable. Leland, speaking of the castle, in the reign of Henry VIII., states that it was then "meately wel kept up," and "veri fair and doble waullid;" having been repaired by Alice de Londres, wife of one of the Dukes of Lancaster, and again in the reign of Henry VII. The present remains of this edifice occupy a bold rocky eminence on the western side of the Gwendraeth Vâch, and are in a more perfect state of preservation than any other of a similar character in the principality: their appearance is grand and imposing, the ruins comprising a quadrangular area, enclosed by strong walls defended with massive circular towers at the angles, and also by bastions in the intervals: the principal entrance, which is on the west side, is under a magnificent gateway, flanked by two round towers, and is still in good preservation. Many of the state apartments are almost entire, and the groined ceilings of some of them, together with other portions of the edifice, display interesting features of the early style of English architecture. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the town amounts to £388. 4., and for those of the remainder of the parish to £152. 11.

KIFIG (CYFFIG), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. by S.) from St. Clear's, containing 544 inhabitants. This parish is intersected by the old road from St. Clear's to Narberth. The living is a perpetual curacy, consolidated with that of Marros, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's: it was formerly dependent on the mother church of Laugharne, but having been lately endowed with £8 per annum by the vicar of that parish, and with £600 royal bounty, it was united with Marros, and the consolidated incumbency is in the gift of the Vicar of Laugharne. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Sir John Crow, Bart., bequeathed £50, the interest of which is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £136.

KILAY (CILE), a joint hamlet with Trêgorn, in the parish of LLANDAROG, hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (E. S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. The Gwendraeth Vechan river flows through this hamlet, and on its right bank are the remains of an ancient chapel, called Capel Ivan.

KILCARW (CÎL-CARW), a joint hamlet with Gorycoed, in the parish of LLANGENDEIRN, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish, of which it forms the south-eastern portion. It occupies a part of the district between the Gwendraeth Vawr and Gwendraeth

Vechan rivers; and the road from Llannon to Llangendeirn passes through it. The mountain of Mynydd Llangendeirn, running parallel with the latter river, is situated here, and, from its deep indentations, gives name to the hamlet, which implies the retreat of the stag.

KÎLGERRAN (CÎL-GARON), a parish (formerly an incorporated market town) in the hundred of KÎLGERRAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{4}$  miles (S. S. E.) from Cardigan, containing 879 inhabitants. This place owes its origin to the erection of a castle, of great strength and extent, of which the original foundation is involved in much obscurity: some writers attribute it to Roger de Montgomery, and others to Gilbert Earl of Clare. In the year 1164, this important fortress was taken from the English by Rhŷs ab Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, by whom it was considerably strengthened; and in the following year the Normans and Flemings made an unsuccessful attack upon it. During the civil war between his two sons, Gruffydd and Rhŷs, the former of whom had succeeded to his father's dominions, it was captured by Gruffydd, in 1199, from whom, however, it was wrested by William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, about the year 1204. Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, in 1215, included the capture of this castle among his other numerous conquests in this part of the principality, but ceded it, in the following year, to a native chieftain named Maelgwyn, from whom it was retaken, in 1222, by the Earl of Pembroke, who immediately commenced the erection of a new fortress, which was finished by the garrison, during the earl's absence in London, whither he had been summoned to attend the king. The castle thenceforward continued annexed to the earldom of Pembroke, until the decease of the youngest son of Earl William, when these vast estates descended to coheirresses, and the castle and lordship of Kîlgerran were separated from it. The importance of the castle imparted a proportionate degree of consequence to the town, which was endowed with corporate privileges, and continued to flourish until the decay of the former, on which it underwent a like decline.

It is now only a small village, consisting of one street, about half a mile in length, the houses in which are mean, straggling, and irregularly built, with the church at the western extremity. The river Teivy, which runs on the east and north to its æstuary below Cardigan, here winds in beautiful and majestic reaches through the vale to which it gives name, and which at every bend presents some fresh features of novel and picturesque beauty. In sailing up the stream, in one part of its course, the hanging woods which clothe the sides of the environing hills recede from the margin of the stream, and leave room for a narrow strip of meadow land, whilst the beautifully varied scenery on the opposite bank is terminated by the august ruins of the castle, which crown the summit of a projecting rock rising precipitously from the brink of the river: on the opposite side, the noble woods which give name to the valuable estate and mansion of Coedmore, the seat of Thomas Lloyd, Esq., cover the sides and summit of the rock, partially disclosing at intervals impending masses, which contrast finely with the sylvan beauties of the scene. Pursuing the course of the river, rich groves, alternating with the naked rock, continue to excite the admiration of the traveller, till he arrives within a short distance of Llêchrhŷd bridge, where the vale expands on either side, margined by luxuriant meadows, from which the hills recede, beautifully varied with churches, seats, and cottages, embosomed in the foliage of successive plantations. On this river is the Kîlgerran royal weir, which was purchased from the crown by Thomas Lloyd, Esq., of Coedmore. There are three mansions in the parish, namely, Glandovan, the seat of Abel Anthony Gower, Esq., of which family was the late Admiral Sir Erasmus Gower, who accompanied Earl Macartney in his embassy to China, and greatly distinguished himself in the naval service of his country; Castell Maelgwyn, also the property of Mr. Gower, but now in the occupation of — Davies, Esq.; and Rhôs y Gilwen, the elegant modern mansion of John Humphreys, Esq., who obtained this estate by marriage with Catherine, daughter of the late Thomas Colby, Esq., of Fynnonau, and erected the present house. There are extensive slate-quarries in the parish, which are actively worked, and enjoy a facility of communication with the sea by means of the Teivy, which is navigable as high as Llêchrhŷd bridge, about three miles above Cardigan. The market, formerly held on Wednesday, has fallen into disuse; but fairs are held annually on August 21st and November 12th, for the sale of cattle, horses, pigs, &c. This place has long since lost its municipal privileges, but retains the semblance of a corporation, in the election annually of a portreeve, who is chosen by a jury of burgesses at the court leet, which is held twice a year: the tolls of the fairs are paid to him, but his other duties are little more than nominal.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Llawddog, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, and in tolerably good repair, with a square tower at the western end: in the churchyard there is a rude stone, bearing an inscription now illegible, but evidently a Roman monumental stone. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists. A school, in which about forty children are instructed, is supported by contributions from the gentry resident in the vicinity. The ruins of the castle rank among the most striking, extensive, and picturesque remains of the ancient fortresses in South Wales: they stand on the edge of a rock which rises perpendicularly from the southern bank of the Teivy, and consist of several bastions of different forms, with portions of the curtain wall: the castle formerly had two wards, the plan of which, with the position of the integral parts, may be clearly traced. It is at present, together with that of Pembroke, held by grant from the crown, made in the reign of James II., by Pryse Pryse, Esq., of Gogerddan, in the county of Cardigan. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £203. 7.

KÎLGIL (CÎLGIL), a township in the parish of LLANYRE, hundred of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E.) from Rhaiadr. The population is included in the return for the parish, of which it forms the northern portion, and is bounded on the east by the river Ithon. The parochial church is situated in this township, which contains some marshy ground on the banks of the river.

KILGWYN (CÎL-GWYN), a chapelry in the parish of NEVERN, hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. S. E.) from Newport. The population is returned with the parish. The chapel is dedicated to St. Mary. It is situated at the foot and near the south-eastern declivity of Carn Ingli mountain and common, on the former of which are some ancient carneddau.

KILIEUCHA (CÎLIAU UCHÂV) a township, consisting of the lower division of the parish of LLANDYSILIO-GOGO, in the lower division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $16\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. N. W.) from Lampeter. The population is returned with the parish. The parochial church is situated in this township, which lies on the shore of Cardigan bay. There are several respectable residences scattered over the neighbourhood; and here is an ancient mansion, called Cwm Cynin, the property of the family of Parry, now converted into a farm-house. On an eminence in this district the Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., after being joined by Rhys ab Thomas, is stated to have encamped with his army previously to proceeding against Richard III., where he was hospitably entertained by Davydd ab Evan, of Llwyn Davydd, to whom he presented a golden goblet, which is now said to be in the possession of the Vaughans of Golden Grove. Capel Cynin, a chapel dedicated to St. Cynin, is situated in this township: having been suffered to fall into decay, it was rebuilt in 1820 by the parishioners. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £2000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Major Parry, the proprietor of the Cwm Cynin estate. The Cynin and another stream here fall into the bay of Cardigan, the shore of which is bold and precipitous, with eleven fathoms at low water a short distance from the coast. Garn Wen, or "the white heap," is a circular formation of loose stones, about sixty-eight yards in diameter, divided into three compartments, with a low stone rampart surrounding it; within a short distance to the south-west is an appendage, composed of three acres of ground, formerly encompassed with a mound of earth; the whole is situated above the farm of Cilieu, near the coast. On the hill of Llwyn Davydd are vestiges of what is supposed to have been a castle, comprising two circumvallations, two hundred feet in diameter, with high mounds and deep ditches, and containing in the centre what has the appearance of a tumulus: it is conjectured to be the site of Castell Meib Wynion, or "the castle of the sons of Wynion," captured in 1164, by Rhys ab Gruffydd, and by others supposed to be the castellated mansion of the Tewdws. The mouth of the river at Cwm Tewdwr forms a small haven, from which a few craft are engaged in the culm and limestone trade, the latter being occasionally burnt also for manure.

KILKEN (CÎL-CAIN), a parish in the Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Mold, containing 1189 inhabitants. This parish is supposed by some to have derived its name from Cil, a retreat, and Cain, fair, or pleasant; but others deduce it from Eurgain, niece to St. Asaph, second bishop of the see, which, after his canonization, obtained its name from him. Eurgain was brought up and educated by her uncle, and, during the general persecutions which at that time assailed the establishment of the Christian religion, retired to the district included in the present parish of Kilken, in a vale under Moel Vamma, the loftiest of the Clwydian mountains, where she built a cell, and lived in solitude and devotion. From her pious and exemplary life she acquired the appellation of Eurgain, signifying "the fairness of gold;" and shortly afterwards a church was erected near the site of her hermitage, and consecrated to her memory: the vale in which she dwelt is still called Nant Cain, and the brook which runs from the mountain that shelters it also retains the name of Cain. The village is pleasantly situated on the river Alyn, and the vicinity is enlivened by pleasing and finely varied scenery. The parish comprises five thousand five hundred and fifty acres of land, which are chiefly gravelly, with some wet stiff soil: it is partly hilly and partly flat: two thousand four hundred acres of waste land were enclosed pursuant to an act obtained in 1793. On the mountain of Moel Vamma, near its confines, is the Jubilee Column, erected to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of George the Third's accession to the throne. The neighbourhood abounds with mineral wealth, and considerable mines of lead were formerly wrought to great advantage; but, owing to the low price of the ore, some of them are at present discontinued. Fairs are held on March 14th, July 7th, and October 12th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 6., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: there is also a sinecure rectory, rated at £16. 14. 7., and in the gift of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small but interesting structure, and is distinguished for the beauty of its roof of finely carved oak, which was brought from Basingwerk abbey, at the dissolution of that establishment: it is an elegant piece of workmanship, and is supported by arches springing from corbels decorated with angels bearing shields, on which the cross and other emblems of the Crucifixion are displayed. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A parochial school has recently been erected by subscription, but the endowment is very inconsiderable, and only a few children receive instruction. There are various charitable bequests to a considerable amount for distribution among the poor. In the mountainous districts of the parish are several small camps and numerous tumuli. Near Kilken Hall, in the vale of Nannerch, is the celebrated Fynnon Leinw, or "flowing well," which Camden describes as flowing and ebbing with the tide; but this peculiarity has long since ceased to distinguish it: it is a copious and limpid spring, and is much resorted to for bathing, for which purpose it has been enclosed, and is said to possess properties fully equal, if not superior, to those of the far-famed spring at Holywell. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £626. 13.

KILKENNIN (CÎL-CENIN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $9\frac{1}{4}$  miles (N. W. by N.) from Lampeter, comprising the Upper and Lower hamlets, each of which maintains its own poor, and containing 695 inhabitants. This place is remarkable in history as the scene of a slaughter committed, in 1210, by Rhys and Owain ab

Gruffydd, at the head of a chosen band of three hundred men, on a superior body of English and Welsh troops, under the command of their uncle Maelgwyn, whom John King of England had reinforced with a body of auxiliaries, to aid him in recovering possession of the estates wrested from him by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, the reigning prince of North Wales, and by him given to Maelgwyn's nephews, who, unable to meet in open combat the force under their uncle's command, here approached his camp secretly by night, and, furiously rushing upon his unarmed soldiers, slew many of them, and compelled the rest, among whom was Maelgwyn himself, to seek safety by flight. The parish is computed to contain about one thousand acres, mostly arable, in some parts rocky and hilly, and in others flat, of which about forty are subject to inundation: the only river is the Ayron, which skirts a part of it. The living is vicarial, being consolidated with the vicarage of Llanbadarn-Trêveglwys, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Cannen, has recently been rebuilt, in the later style of English architecture, the expense of which was defrayed by public contributions. There is a place of worship for Independents. On the summit of an eminence, in this parish, are the remains of an ancient castle, called Bwlch y Castell, of the foundation and history of which no particulars have been recorded. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £126. 18.

KILLEY (CÎL-LE), a joint parcel with Prysg, in the parish of LLANGATTOCK, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (W.) from Crickhowel. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated in a pleasing vale, through which a stream flows into the river Usk, and abounds with limestone, the quarrying and burning of which give employment to a great portion of the inhabitants: a railway proceeds from the quarries to the Brecknock canal, which crosses the hamlet. The ancient and extensive park of Cîl-le Lan was formerly an appendage of the castle of Crickhowel, at the other side of the river Usk, with which there was a connexion by a private bridge, which has long since been demolished, but its abutments were discovered about fifty years ago, when a high flood carried away a part of the soil of the river. Within the limestone rock, in a recess of the mountain, termed Darren y Cîl-le, is a cave of considerable dimensions, called Eglwys Vaen, or "the Stone Church." There are two large carneddau on the Carno mountain, where a sanguinary battle was fought between Ethelbald King of Mercia and Roderic Molwynog, a prince of North Wales, in which the latter is said to have been victorious.

KILLYMAENLLWYD (CÎL Y MAENLLWYD), a parish partly in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, and partly in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Narberth, containing 609 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the banks of the river Tâf, which here separates the counties of Carmarthen and Pembroke, and, with a very small exception, is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery, though not characterized by any peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing, and is agreeably diversified with wood and water. Coedllŷs, the seat of the family of Philipps, the heiress of which house was married to the late Lord Milford, and which is now the property of John P. A. Lloyd Philipps, of Dale Castle, in the county of Pembroke, Esq., is beautifully situated in a richly-wooded vale on the banks of the river Tâf, of which simplicity and retirement are the leading features. That part of the parish which is within the county of Pembroke maintains its own poor separately from that which is within the county of Carmarthen. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 10., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Philip and St. James. At Castel-Dauyran there is a chapel of ease; and, according to tradition, there was formerly at the same place an ancient mansion called the Castle, the property of two sisters, who jointly possessed the chapelry and the castle, of the latter of which there are no vestiges. Camden notices a quantity of Roman coins, which had been recently found in this parish: they were of impure silver, and the series reached from the time of Commodus, who first debased the coin of the empire, to the fifth tribuneship of Gordian III., A. D. 243: among them were some of Helvius Pertinax, M. Opellius, Antoninus Diadumenianus, Julius Verus Maximus, Cælius Balbinus, Clodius Pupienus, Aquilia Severa, wife of Heliogabalus, and Sallustia Barbia Orbiana. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £159. 2.

KILRHEDYN (CÎL-RHEDYN), a parish partly in the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, and partly in that of KÎLGERRAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 1078 inhabitants. It is intersected by the small river Cuch, which here forms the line of boundary between the two counties, and comprises nearly eight thousand acres. Within its limits are two neat residences, namely, Glâs-Bant, that of Mr. Howel, and Dyfryn, that of the Rev. Mr. Lewis. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8. 12. 8½., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Teilo, is not distinguished by any architectural features of importance. There are places of worship for Baptists and Presbyterians, also for a congregation simply styling themselves "Dissenters." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £154. 17.

KILWYCH (CÎL-WYCH), a parcel in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL CWM DŴ, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. by W.) from Crickhowel, containing 334 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying "the cheerful retreat," is applicable to its situation in the pleasing vale of Cwm dŵ. A certain portion of the tithes of this parcel was anciently granted to the prior and monks of St. John the Evangelist in Brecknock, by Pycard, a Norman knight, to whom Bernard de Newmarch gave the lordship of Ystradiw; but on the dissolution of the priory they passed into lay occupation, in which they still remain. Penarth, a beautiful seat on the banks of the Usk, originally belonging to the Vaughans, afterwards sold to William Augustus Gott, Esq., who built the present mansion, and now the property of Joseph Bailey, Esq., commands rich and pleasing views of the Vale of Crickhowel.

KILYBEBILL (CÎL BEBYLL), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Neath, and containing 398 inhabitants, of which number, 122 are in the Upper, and 276 in the Lower, division. This parish, the name of which signifies "the retreat of the tents," is situated in a pleasant glen, opening at its southern extremity into the Vale of Neath, and is separated from the parish of Llan-guicke by the river Tawy, over which is a handsome stone bridge of one arch, called Pont ar Dawe, constructed by the self-taught architect of Pont y Prydd: the span of the arch is about eighty feet, and the whole structure, though inferior in its dimensions to Pont y Prydd, is superior to it in the beauty of its architecture. Kilybebill Place, the ancient seat of the family of Herbert, now the property of H. Leach, Esq., has been so completely modernized and greatly improved by its present proprietor, as scarcely to retain any vestige of its ancient character: the grounds are well disposed, and the house commands a good view of the sea and of the abrupt knolls and eminences near Briton-Ferry. One of the ladies of the family of Herbert was maid of honour to Catherine of Braganza, consort of Charles II., and was afterwards appointed mistress of the robes to that queen, who presented her with one of the only two portraits of her majesty, painted by Sir Peter Lely, which is still preserved in the house. The parish is comprised in the vast mineral basin of South Wales, and great quantities of coal are shipped from the port of Swansea to different parts of the kingdom, by means of the Swansea canal, to which are railways from the various works in this district. This coal is raised by level, and, by an ingenious contrivance of Mr. Branton of London, the machinery possesses a material advantage over that in common use: this is effected by a small wheel circumscribing the drum, round which the cord is coiled in a contrary direction to the smaller; and, by attaching the full trams to one end of the lower cord, and those at the pit's mouth to the end of the upper cord, the former are drawn over a level of four hundred yards, while the others descend an inclined plane double that length, the diameters of the wheels being respectively in proportion. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £4. 6. 8., endowed with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, is a small plain building, with a massive square embattled tower. There are places of worship for Baptists and Methodists. The late Mrs. Herbert bequeathed £5 per annum, which is regularly paid by Mr. Leach to the poor of this and the adjoining parish of Llanguicke. On the hill called March Hywel are several tumuli, on opening one of which a platform of stone was found, exhibiting strong appearances of the action of fire; and on one side of it was an urn of unbaked clay, containing ashes, remnants of bones, and charcoal, as fresh apparently as when first deposited. Celts, and a weapon of yellow metal, supposed to be a Roman sword, have also been found here. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £100. 10.

KILYCWM (CÎL Y CWM), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N.N.W.) from Llandovery, comprising the Upper and Lower hamlets, and containing 1637 inhabitants, of which number, 924 are in the Upper, and 713 in the Lower, hamlet. This parish, which is intersected by the river Towey, extends for nearly ten miles in length, and is in some parts five miles in breadth, being for the most part enclosed. Copper and lead ores abound within its limits, and mines of both were formerly worked to a considerable extent, but they are not now in operation. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Thynne Howe Gwynne, Esq. There is also a vicarage noticed in the king's books, which is rated at £5. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There are three places of worship for Baptists, and one for Calvinistic Methodists. The late Rowland Pryse, Esq., bequeathed £5 per annum for the support of a charity school, which sum is regularly paid by his representative, John Pryse Lloyd, of Glanseven, Esq., and £1 per annum, of which one-half is appropriated to the purchase of books for the children, and the remainder distributed in bread to the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £507. 15., of which sum, £236 is raised for the Upper, and £271. 15. for the Lower, division.

KINNERTON (HIGHER), a township in that part of the parish of DODDLESTON which is in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{4}$  miles (S.E. by S.) from Hawarden, containing 450 inhabitants. The remainder of the parish is in the hundred of Broxton, county of Chester. This township supports its own poor by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure being £78. 16.

KITPLOITH (CYD-PLWYV), a joint hamlet with Portscyborvawr, in the parish of LLANDEVEYLOG, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (S.) from Carmarthen, containing, with Portscyborvawr, 247 inhabitants. It forms the northern portion of the parish, where the ground is rather undulating than hilly or mountainous, and contains many pleasing and agreeable residences.

KNELSTON, or KNOLLSTON, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (W. by S.) from Swansea, containing 125 inhabitants. This is a very small parish, and the church, which was dedicated to St. Maurice, is now in ruins. Marriages, baptisms, and burials, are solemnized at the church of the adjoining parish of Llanddewi, for which additional duty a certain stipend is paid to the vicar of that parish by the Dean and Chapter of St. David's, to whom the rectorial tithes of Knelston are appropriated. The living is a vicarage, not in charge, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter. A school for the gratuitous instruction of children of this parish, and of the parishes of Llanddewi and Llangennith, is principally supported by the incumbent. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £41. 16.

KNIGHTON, a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR,

SOUTH WALES,  $9\frac{3}{4}$  miles (N. E. by N.) from New Radnor, and 158 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 1259 inhabitants. The Welsh name of this place is Trêv y Clawdd, signifying "the town upon the dyke," and is derived from its situation on that stupendous rampart of earth which Offa King of the Mercians raised as a line of separation between the territories of the Cambrian princes and his own widely extended dominions. The town is beautifully situated on an eminence rising boldly from the southern bank of the river Teme, and at the head of a deep vale sheltered on all sides by surrounding hills of lofty elevation, crowned with timber of luxuriant growth, and commanding extensive and finely varied prospects over the surrounding country. The two principal streets, which intersect each other at right angles, are regularly formed, and contain some well-built houses of respectable appearance; and, owing to the declivity of their situation, they are constantly clean, adding much to the neat appearance of the place, which is inhabited by many families of respectability. The parish has almost every where an undulating surface; but the lands, notwithstanding the loftiness of their elevation in some parts, are mostly enclosed and cultivated.

There are neither manufactures nor trade carried on in the town, with the exception only of what arises from its situation on a public thoroughfare, and for the supply of its inhabitants. The turnpike roads from Builth, in the county of Brecknock, and from Kington, in that of Hereford, through Presteign, after uniting within two miles and a half to the south of this town, form the high road from those places, through Knighton, to Shrewsbury. An establishment for dressing and dyeing the wool which the peasants spun in their own houses was formerly carried on, but, together with the spinning, has been discontinued, it having been found cheaper to get the wool from Yorkshire. Flannels and whittles (a Flemish term for shawls) are brought hither from Newtown in Montgomeryshire. A large wool-stapling establishment formerly existed, which failed in 1811; there is still a little business done in this branch of trade, but several large warehouses, which were formerly used for it, have either been converted into dwelling-houses, or are altogether unemployed. The market, which is on Thursday, is plentifully supplied with provisions, and is attended by dealers even from Birmingham and its vicinity, who come hither to purchase meat, poultry, eggs, butter, cheese, &c. Fairs are held annually on the Thursday before Easter, May 17th, October 2nd, the last Thursday in October, and the Thursday before November 12th.

The parish is divided into three parts, namely, the borough, the lordship of Farrington, and the township of Cwmgilla: the poor rates are collected separately for the borough, and jointly for Farrington and Cwmgilla; and the poor of the whole parish are maintained generally out of the common fund. The borough is co-extensive with the manor, its common title being "The Manor and Borough of Knighton." It is under the superintendence of a bailiff, burgesses, and constables: the bailiff is appointed annually at the court leet held for the manor, which belongs to the crown; his duty extends to little more than collecting the chief-rents of the manor, and receiving in trust, as chief municipal officer, the tolls of the market: the burgesses, are made by a presentation of a jury of burgesses, selected by the steward of the manor. Knighton, together with Cnwelâs, Kevenllece, Rhaiadr, and (by the late act for amending the representation of the people) Presteign, contributes, with the borough of Radnor, to send one representative to parliament: the right of election was formerly in the burgesses at large, in number about thirty, nearly all of whom are resident, though some doubt exists as to the title of all but three or four: it is now, by the late act, vested in the resident burgesses, if duly qualified according to its provisions, and in every male person of full age, occupying either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of ten pounds and upwards, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of tenements of this value is eighty-six. A court for the recovery of small debts was anciently held here, once in three weeks, which, having been discontinued for several years, was revived eight or nine years ago, but was again discontinued in 1830, in consequence of the death of the presiding officer. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here; and Knighton has been made, by the late Reform Act, one of the polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Salop, and diocese of Hereford, endowed with £600 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Warden of the Hospital of Clun. The church, which is dedicated to St. Edward, and pleasantly situated on the bank of the river Teme, is a comparatively modern edifice. A small school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, to which Mrs. Barnsley bequeathed £50, and Mr. Thomas Meyrick and Lieutenant-Colonel Winwood each gave a portion of land, is supported partly by the income arising from these benefactions, and partly by subscription. There are six small almshouses for the poor, the founder of which is unknown, and several charitable donations and bequests for distribution. Of an ancient castle, which is said to have commanded the town, there are not the slightest vestiges, neither can the exact site be accurately pointed out. There are two tumuli in the parish; and on the summit of a steep hill, about three miles from the town, are the remains of a very extensive British camp. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £320. 6.

LALESTON, a parish in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (W.) from Bridgend, comprising the Upper and Lower hamlets, each of which maintains its own poor, and containing 442 inhabitants, of which number, 204 are in the Upper, and 238 in the Lower, hamlet. This parish derives its name from Lalys, a native of Palestine, and an eminent architect, whom Richard de Granville brought over with him on his return from the Holy Land, and employed to build the abbey of Neath in this county. As a reward for the ability which he displayed in the erection of that magnificent structure, Richard bestowed on him this manor, to which he gave his name, and on which he resided, until, after erecting several churches and castles in the principality, he was appointed architect to Henry I., and removed to London. The village bears every appearance of antiquity; the windows of the houses are square, and the doorways arched with stone. Near the church is a handsome house, the property and residence of John Bennet, Esq. In the upper division of the parish are extensive collieries, belonging to Messrs. Jenkins and Lewis, which are in full operation. Iron-ore also abounds, but, from the present depressed state of the trade in that metal, it is not worked to any great extent. A fair for cattle is annually held in the village on the second Monday in March. The living is consolidated with the vicarage of Newcastle, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is a spacious and venerable structure, the tower of which was built by Lalys, the celebrated architect above-named. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Thomas Bennet, of Laleston House, Esq., in 1762, bequeathed the sum of £52. 10., the interest of which is distributed annually among the poor not receiving parochial relief; and £600, to be appropriated in equal portions to the repairing and beautifying of the churches of Laleston, Newton, and Pyle, which was carried into effect by his executors. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £181. 15.

from Haverfordwest, containing 286 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the western part of the county, and at no great distance from St. Bride's bay, comprises a considerable tract of enclosed and cultivated land, with an extensive common, and is intersected by a small rivulet, which falls into the western Cleddau. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Pembroke College, Oxford. There is a place of worship open to dissenters of every denomination. A parochial school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is supported at the expense of the incumbent. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £66. 15.

LAMPETER (LLAN-BEDR) PONT-STEPHEN, a borough, market-town, and parish, partly in the upper division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, but chiefly in that of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 27 miles (E.) from Cardigan, and 203 (W. by N.) from London, containing, with the hamlet of Trêvycod, 1317 inhabitants. The name signifies the church of St. Peter, the distinguishing appellation having been added from the erection of a bridge over the river Teivy, at the distance of about half a mile, as has been vaguely conjectured, by King Stephen, in one of his inroads into Wales: that monarch is also said to have encamped in a meadow near the river, thence called "The King's Meadow;" and in an adjoining field was formerly a subterraneous apartment, called "The King's Cellar," to which led a curious flight of stone steps, removed a few years ago by a farmer, for the sake of the materials. But the bridge appears, from ancient Welsh pedigrees, to have been the work of an inferior manorial proprietor in this neighbourhood, called Stephen, whose name was used to designate this useful erection, and thus became conjoined with that of the adjacent town and parish. This was formerly a place of greater extent and importance than at present, "the men of Llan-Bedr" being repeatedly mentioned in terms of distinction in the Welsh Chronicle; and this opinion is corroborated by a plot of ground, to the south-west of the town, being still called Mynwent Twmas, "St. Thomas' Churchyard," where fragments of leaden coffins have been frequently dug up: the street leading towards it is also called St. Thomas'-street, and tradition reports the ruins of the edifice to have been visible about two hundred years ago. The ancient lords of this place are represented to have been men of great wealth: their mansion was delightfully situated on the declivity of an eminence to the west of the town; and there are still some remains of a causeway, which, according to tradition, led from it to the western door of the church. The castle of Lampeter is stated to have been demolished, towards the middle of the twelfth century, by Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, in an expedition against the Normans and Flemings in Cardiganshire and the parts adjacent: it is supposed to have stood in a meadow on the right of the road leading to Aberystwith, the site being marked by a lofty artificial mound, surrounded by an intrenchment. In 1188, Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, Giraldus Cambrensis, John, abbot of Whitland, and Sisillus, abbot of the neighbouring monastery of Strata Florida, here successively exerted their eloquence in preaching the crusades.

The town, which is small and straggling, consisting for the most part of low houses indifferently built, is pleasantly situated in the beautiful Vale of Teivy, on the northern bank of that river, which here forms the boundary between the counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen, and in a cultivated tract of small extent, surrounded on every side by mountains of considerable elevation, over which, and adjacent to it, a new bridge is now in progress of erection: it is amply supplied with water from the river and from springs in the neighbourhood. Its principal architectural ornament, the establishment of which has been the means of promoting the prosperity of the town, is the College of St. David, a handsome and commodious edifice, begun August 12th, 1822 (when the first stone was laid with great ceremony), and opened for the reception of students on March 1st, 1827, having been built from a design by Mr. C. R. Cockrell. It was founded by George IV., at the suggestion of Dr. Burgess, then Bishop of St. David's, incorporated by royal charter, and endowed by act of parliament with six livings, the establishment to consist of a principal, vice-principal, and three professors, but only one professor yet resides: accommodation is afforded for seventy students, who are admitted from all parts, with a preference to natives of the principality, for whose benefit especially this useful institution was established: the total annual amount of the necessary expenses of the students, of whom there are at present forty-five, does not exceed from £50 to £54 per annum. Francis Burton, Esq., late one of the justices of great sessions for the counties of Chester, Denbigh, Flint, and Montgomery, gave £100 to this college, to be invested in the public funds, as the commencement of a foundation for annual prizes for competition among the students; and prizes presented by different individuals have been annually awarded. An act of parliament has been obtained for the construction of a new line of road from this town to Llandovery, but the work has not yet been commenced. The inhabitants procure grocery and various other articles of domestic consumption from Bristol, which are brought by sea to Aberaeron, and thence by land carriage a distance of thirteen miles: coal, of a bituminous quality, from Newport and Llanelly, which is brought to the same port; and stone, coal, and culm by land from Llandebie and Llandyvan, a distance of about thirty miles: there is neither trade nor manufacture carried on here. The market is on Saturday: three principal fairs, in addition to others of inferior note, are held annually on the Wednesday in Whitsun-week, July 10th, and October 19th.

The earliest charter of incorporation, of which there is a copy extant, is that of Henry VI., which, however, recites others as far back as the reign of Edward II.: that under which the borough is now governed is a confirmatory charter of George III., dated in 1814. The principal officer is a portreeve, appointed annually at the court leet held for the manor, whose authority is undefined, and, as at present exercised, limited in extent: there are also a town-clerk, constable, and beadle. Lampeter is contributory with Cardigan, Aberystwith, and Atpar, in the return of a member to parliament: the right of election was formerly in the burgesses at large, the number of whom, in 1816, was six hundred, but cannot at present be exactly ascertained: it is now, by the late act for amending the representation of the people, vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of ten pounds and upwards, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of burgesses at present resident within the borough is thirty, and about two hundred more reside within seven miles; and the number of tenements of the annual value of not less than ten pounds is, within the ancient limits of the borough, fifty-eight exclusively of twelve sets of apartments in the college, occupied by students paying each not less than ten pounds per annum, and, within the new limits of the borough, which are correctly defined in the Appendix to this work, sixty-one. The freedom is bestowed by a jury of burgesses appointed at the manorial court leet. The Easter quarter sessions for the county are held at Lampeter; and it has also been recently made one of the polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire. The town-hall is a commodious edifice, erected in 1818, at the expense of Richard Hart Davis, Esq., lord of the manor: the lower part is appropriated to the use of the market.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Peter the Apostle, is a plain unadorned building of considerable antiquity, situated on a pleasing eminence a little to the north of the town; and its external appearance is rendered still more venerable by an abundance of yew trees in the cemetery. It consists of a nave, south aisle, and chancel, with a square tower; the two former are separated from each other by pointed arches, and from the chancel by an ornamented screen. It contains the remains of a rood-loft, a very ancient font decorated with sculpture in a singular manner, and some ancient monuments, principally of the family of Lloyd of Millfield. The churchyard commands a fine view of the Vale of Teivy. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school affords the means of instruction to from sixty to one hundred children; and there is an unendowed grammar school. In the town and its vicinity are numerous remains of military intrenchments, and other works of early date, monuments of the fortitude and persevering opposition which the Welsh displayed in defending their territory from the inroads of invading armies. A little northward of the church is an artificial mound of earth, supposed to be either a sepulchral tumulus, or the site of a fortress; and near Olwen is another artificial elevation, the site of a Roman encampment, where part of a Roman mill was discovered a few years ago. Eastward of this, on the summit of a hill called Allt-gôch, are the prostrate stones of a Druidical temple, on one side of which is a Roman camp of considerable extent, and on the other a British, or Flemish, encampment, of an oval form, and much larger. There are also traces of other fortifications, and of a Roman road which led from Loventium, at Llanio, to Menevia, at or near St. David's. A house in the town, called the Priory, is supposed to occupy the site of a conventual establishment, of which no record has been preserved: there are some low ruined walls in the garden belonging to it. In the vicinity are some mineral springs, but they are not much resorted to. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £436. 4.

LAMPETER-VELVREY (LLAN-BEDR-VELVRE), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E.) from Narberth, containing 984 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the rich and fertile vale of Lampeter, and on the south side of the river Marlais, extends for nearly six miles from east to west, and about three miles from north to south. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied; and the parish, which is of considerable antiquity, contains several objects of interest to the antiquary. Limestone is found here in abundance, and is quarried for building purposes, and also burnt into lime as a manure for the supply of the surrounding country. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a very ancient structure, consisting of two aisles separated by plain pointed arches. In the north aisle is an altar-tomb to a member of the family of Philipps, of Lampeter House, which seat is now the property and residence of Captain Twyning. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. A parochial school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is supported by subscription. John Jones, M.D., in 1698, bequeathed certain lands and tenements for the relief of poor families, and for apprenticing poor children of the parishes of Lawrenny, Cosheston, St. David's, and Lampeter-Velvrey, now producing a considerable sum annually, which is distributed in proportion to the number of deserving objects in the different parishes. A posting inn at the entrance of the county from Carmarthen, distinguished by the name Taverner's, occupies the site of the ancient "Taverne y spitty," an hospitium formerly belonging to Whitland abbey, upon the bank of the river Tâf; and Blaengwyddnoe, now a farm-house, was the grange of that religious establishment. To the south-west of the latter place are some very extensive earthworks, called Castel Meherin, on the summit of a high ridge commanding a full view of the sea, and forming one of a chain of forts continued in a north-westerly direction along this part of the coast; and in a field adjoining the turnpike road, a little to the north-east, are two semicircular embankments, commanding the passage of three several valleys. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £331. 3.

LAMPHEY, called by the Welsh LLANFYDD, a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from Pembroke, on the road to Tenby, containing 436 inhabitants. This place, which takes its name from the dedication of its church to St. Faith, was among the first of those in South Wales in which the early Normans obtained a settlement. According to Buck, as quoted by Grose, it was the head of a lordship marcher; and it anciently contained one of the princely residences of the bishops of St. David's, of which there are considerable remains. At what period it first became the property of the archiepiscopal and subsequently episcopal church of St. David's is not precisely known; but a deed dated at Lamphey, in the middle of the thirteenth century, by Bishop Carew, is still extant; and, according to Giraldus Cambrensis, it appears to have been an episcopal residence in the time of Arnulph de Montgomery, who possessed himself of this part of the principality in the reign of Henry I. At least a great part of the episcopal palace (even the whole of it according to some writers) was built by Bishop Gower, in 1335: the various styles of architecture which characterize its ruins shew plainly that it was the work of successive periods, and that it did not attain the splendour for which it was remarkable, but by the accumulated additions and improvements of its successive proprietors, of whom Bishop Gower probably built the great hall and the square tower, distinguished for their beautiful open parapets. This portion of the possessions of the see of St. David's was alienated to the crown by Bishop Barlow, in the reign of Henry VIII., by whom Lamphey was granted to Devereux, Viscount Hereford, father of the unfortunate Earl of Essex, who passed the greater part of his youth in this palace. After the attainder of the earl, in the reign of Elizabeth, this estate was purchased by Sir Hugh Owen, of Orielton, by whose descendant, Sir John Owen, Bart., it was sold to its present proprietor, Charles Matthias, Esq., who has erected an elegant modern mansion, called Lamphey Court, with a noble portico of four Ionic columns, near the ruins of the ancient palace. Besides this seat, the parish contains several genteel residences, occupied by opulent families: Portclew, a modern mansion, the residence of Thomas Parry, Esq., is beautifully situated on an eminence commanding a fine view of the sea, and having at its base some fine smooth and firm sands, well adapted for sea-bathing, and affording a delightful walk. Lamphey Park, the property of Mrs. Thomas, also occupies a pleasant situation: the grounds contain some pleasing scenery, and are tastefully disposed. North Down, the property of Colonel Kemm, is a genteel residence, now in the occupation of the Rev. B. Byers. Indications of coal have been observed in this parish, from which it is concluded that strata of this fossil here extend in a direction from north-east to south-west, but no attempt has hitherto been made to work it: limestone is found in great abundance and of excellent quality, and a considerable quantity is quarried for building purposes, and also burnt into lime.

All the land in that part of the parish which was alienated from the see in the reign of Henry VIII., and which constitutes a large portion of it, including the park, which alone contains many hundred acres of fine land, is tithe-free, and the great tithes of the other part, which are leased by the bishop to the lord of the manor, scarcely produce £50 per annum. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 8. 11½., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Faith, was thoroughly repaired in 1826, partly by subscription, and partly by an additional church rate, aided by a grant of £100 from the Incorporated Society for promoting the erection and enlargement of churches and chapels, by which two hundred additional sittings have been obtained, of which, in consideration of the grant from the Society, one hundred and thirty-five are to be for ever free and unappropriated. A National school has been established, for which a commodious school-room, with a neat cottage for the residence of the master and mistress, was erected in 1828, by subscription, aided by a grant of £70 from the parent society, with which this school has been incorporated. The ground for the school-house and garden was granted rent-free, on lease for sixty years, by Charles Matthias, Esq., lord of the manor, who contributed £50 towards defraying the expense of the building, and subscribes £10 per annum for the support of the institution. About one hundred children of both sexes are gratuitously instructed in this establishment, which is well conducted, and liberally supported by subscription. The remains of the ancient palace, which amply display its former splendour, consist of the great hall, seventy-six feet in length and twenty in width, the walls of which are surmounted by an elegant open parapet of delicate tracery; another apartment, sixty feet long and twenty-six wide; the chancel of the chapel, of which the east window, still entire, is a beautiful composition, enriched with elegant tracery; the grand entrance on the south, and the square tower above-noticed, now enclosed within the gardens of the newly erected mansion, in which it forms an interesting object. The greatest attention is paid to the preservation of these elegant remains, and every precaution has been taken by the proprietor of Lamphey Court to arrest the decay to which this venerable pile was rapidly falling from previous neglect. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £120. 13.

LAMVA (LLAMPHY), a hamlet in the parish of ST. BRIDE'S MAJOR, hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Bridgend, containing 163 inhabitants.

LANTWIT-MAJOR, otherwise LLAN-ILLTYD-VAWR, a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Cowbridge, containing 1076 inhabitants. This place, originally called by the Welsh Caer Wrgorn, derived its subsequent name of Llan-Illyd, of which its more general appellation Lantwit is only a modification, from the dedication of its church to St. Illyd, or Iltutus, and its distinguishing adjunct Vawr, or Major, from its pre-eminence among other places of the same name in different parts of the principality. The parish, which is of considerable extent, comprises one of the most interesting districts in South Wales, and appears to have been inhabited from a very remote period; but whether originally by the ancient Britons or the Romans cannot be satisfactorily ascertained. Modern writers are of opinion that the small village of Boverton, in this parish, was the site of the Roman station Bovium, placed in the Itineraries on the line of the Julia Via Maritima, between the stations of Isca Silurum (Caerlleon) and Nidum (Neath). This opinion derives weight, not only from the affinity between the names, and the coincidence of its situation between those two stations; but also from the course of a Roman road, which has been distinctly traced, leading to some camps of Roman construction near that village, where also other relics of Roman antiquity have been discovered. In the fifth century, a college was established here, or rather revived on the ruins of a more ancient institution, said to have been founded by the Roman Emperor Theodosius, which, after his name, was called by the Welsh "Bangor Tewdws," and in which the heresiarch Pelagius is said to have been educated. This institution was afterwards destroyed by a band of Irish pirates, who, landing on this part of the coast, carried away by violence its principal, Maenwyn, better known as St. Patrick, the apostle and tutelary saint of Ireland. Soon after this event, St. Germanus, who was sent into Britain by the Gallican bishops, to suppress the Pelagian heresy, and is supposed to have been hospitably entertained at Boverton, where the native reguli continued to reside occasionally, till the overthrow of their power by Robert Fitz-Hamon, associating the old college of Theodosius with the name of Pelagius, selected the site of that institution at Lantwit, then called Caer Wrgorn, for the foundation of one of those seminaries for the education of the British clergy, which he deemed it expedient to erect, as a powerful means of eradicating this heresy. In the establishment of this institution he was greatly assisted by the king of the country; and, on its completion, he placed it under the superintendence of Illyd, or Iltutus, who had accompanied him into Britain, and under whose management it flourished exceedingly, and was amply endowed by Meuric, Arthur, and Morgan, successive reguli of this part of the country. Scholars flocked to this seminary from all parts of Christendom, among whom were the sons of the British nobles and foreign princes, besides numerous others, amounting at one time to more than two thousand pupils. For the accommodation of this large number there were not less than four hundred lodging apartments and seven large halls, or colleges. The course of instruction adopted by Iltutus embraced not only such sacred and profane literature as was requisite for clerical education, but also included husbandry and other useful arts; and the common plough now in use in some parts of Wales is still called St. Illyd's plough, in honour of Iltutus, who was regarded as the inventor of it. For many generations this seminary continued to be the university of Britain, and to be frequented by the most illustrious persons of all countries, till its revenue was transferred to the abbey of Tewkesbury by Robert Fitz-Hamon, when the universities of England acquired the ascendancy, and that of Illtut sank into comparative obscurity. That holy and learned man is said to have presided over this institution for the protracted term of ninety years; and among the eminent persons who were his pupils may be enumerated Gildas, the historian; David, who removed the episcopal see from Caerlleon to St. David's, and who ultimately became the patron saint of Wales; Paulinus, Bishop of Leon in Spain; Samson, successor to David in the see, and afterwards Bishop of Dôl in Brittany; Talhaiarn, a celebrated bard and a distinguished saint; Taliesin, an eminent bard; and many others. According to Sir Henry Spelman, a large assembly was convened in the church of this establishment, in 560, to negotiate a treaty of peace between Morgan, regulus of this part of the country, and his uncle Trioc, whom the former most treacherously slew, and afterwards made his peace with the church by remitting to this establishment the annual tribute of a pot of honey and an iron kettle. This school lingered for a long period in comparative insignificance, and was not finally closed till the reign of Henry VIII., when the remaining portion of its tithes, and an annual payment called the abbot's rent, being all that remained to it of its ancient endowments, were seized by that monarch, and, together with the revenue of the dissolved monastery of Tewkesbury, conferred on the Dean and Chapter of St. Peter's, in the city of Gloucester, which that sovereign had recently erected into a bishoprick.

The parish is situated on the coast of the Bristol channel, in a fine open country, and comprises a large tract of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a high state of cultivation. The soil, of which the substratum is a blue limestone, is, for richness and fertility, almost unequalled in any part of South Wales; and the surrounding scenery, though not in general distinguished by any striking peculiarity of character, is occasionally diversified by features of picturesque beauty and romantic grandeur. A long range of hills, running through the county in a direction from east to west, separates the mountainous from the level districts of the spacious and fertile Vale of Glamorgan, the latter of which are occasionally enlivened with numerous churches and villages, and enriched with thriving plantations and groves embowering the seats and villas of the resident gentry. The village, which is situated in the centre of this pleasing vale, displays obvious indications of its original extent and importance, and has in every respect the appearance of a large dilapidated town: it occupies a large extent of ground, but presents several chasms in its streets, some of which are nearly choked up with the ruins of decayed houses, and others are scarcely distinguishable, except by their situation within the limits of the town, from the numerous roads that appear to converge towards this place, as a common centre. The town-hall is still remaining, and in a state of good repair: it resembles, in its appearance, those ancient buildings which in some places are called court-houses and church-houses, though of much larger dimensions; the ascent to it is by a double flight of steps at one end: over it is a bell on which the clock strikes, said to have been presented to St. Illtut by the pope, and by Holinshed to have been taken, among other spoils, by an army which King Edgar, towards the latter end of his reign, brought into Glamorgan-shire, to chastise the Welsh, who had rebelled against him; on removing this bell, in the year 1815, it was found to bear the inscription "Ora pro nobis, Sancte Illtute." The ancient gaol has been demolished only within the last fifty years; the name of Gallows way is still retained in the road where executions usually took place, and where human skeletons have been found at various times. Whatever municipal privileges Lantwit may appear, from these circumstances, to have formerly possessed, have long been lost, even, according to some authorities, since the time of Henry VII. That it formerly carried on a considerable trade with the coasts of Somersetshire appears evident; and the dialect of that county is said to have been prevalent here within the memory of men living at the commencement of the present century: in the vicinity is the ancient port of Colhow, now Colhugh, where, during the reign of Henry VIII., vessels frequently sheltered; though now, by the changes which have taken place on this part of the coast, it is avoided by mariners as dangerous. The remains of the ancient harbour may still be traced, and, notwithstanding the great encroachment made by the sea, the foundation of the pier, and the piles of wood by which it was defended on the western side, are still visible at low water. Though the village of Boverton is far inferior in extent and population to Lantwit-Major, yet, as the seat of the ancient reguli of this portion of the principality, and also as the principal place prior to the establishment of the schools of Illtut, it has in all ancient documents held the precedence, and given title to the manor, which is to this day in the court rolls styled the "Lordship of Boviarton and Lantwit." After the conquest of this part of the principality by the Normans, the manor was granted to Robert Fitz-Hamon, from whom it passed to the lords paramount of Glamorgan, as part of the great lordship. It became vested in the crown in the reign of Henry VII., who granted it to his uncle, Jasper Duke of Bedford, by whom it was given to Gruffydd Voss, whose daughter and heiress conveyed it by marriage to Roger Seys, Esq., from which family it passed by marriage to Robert Jones, Esq., of Fonmon castle, who sold it to the late Elias Vanderhorst of Bristol, from whom it passed into the possession of John Tunno, Esq., its present proprietor. A fair is held here annually on June 22nd.

The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Llysworney annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £14. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester, who are impropiators of the tithes. In 1080, the tithes and advowson of the parish belonged to Iestyn ab Gwrgan, and, together with the rest of his property, were seized by Robert Fitz-Hamon, and conveyed by marriage of his only daughter to Robert Fitz-Henry, Earl of Gloucester, by whom they were afterwards conferred on his newly-founded abbey of Tewkesbury, upon the dissolution of which they were granted by Henry VIII. to the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The present church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is a spacious and venerable pile of building, erected, according to an old manuscript, by R. Neville, Earl of Warwick and Lord of Glamorgan, in the reign of Henry VI., and comprising, in addition to that portion of it in which divine service is performed, a more ancient structure, separated only from the former by the tower, to the west of which it is situated. From this latter a door opened into a dilapidated building, in a line with it, called the Lady Chapel, the walls of which were ornamented with busts and figures of saints, now destroyed: this chapel, which is almost a ruin, was forty feet and a half in length. The old church, which was sixty-four feet and a half long, is said to have been deserted on account of the dampness of its situation; but this would have equally operated against the erection of a contiguous structure of larger dimensions. Nearly in the centre of it are two monumental stones, brought, as it is said, in 1730, by Mr. Thomas Morgan, schoolmaster and parish clerk, from a place called the "Great House," where it is said there was formerly a church, and which are minutely described in the sixth volume of the Archæologia Londinensis, accompanied with plates; and in a room behind the altar, probably that used for the vestry, is a gigantic figure of a man in the costume of the time of Henry VIII., elaborately sculptured in freestone, of the kind found near the river side at Bridgend, in this county, with an English inscription, simply stating it to be the statue of "Prince Richard Hopkins," also described in the same publication. Near this statue is the bust of a child, sculptured in alto relievo; and in a niche near the altar is the figure of a person kneeling, rudely sculptured, and habited in a costume similar to that of Hopkins. The more modern church, which is ninety-eight feet in length and fifty-three in breadth, consists of a nave, with a north and south aisle, and a chancel, and has a very handsome altar-piece. In the churchyard, near the south entrance, is a stone placed flat in the ground, which appears to have been part of an ancient cross, carved with knots and other devices: it is about six feet in length, and is said to have been placed there by Morgan, who removed it also from the "Great House." On the north side of the church also in the churchyard, is a curious stone called St. Illtyd's Cross, noticed by Gough, in his Additions to Camden, which was erected in the sixth century, in honour of that saint, by Archbishop Samson: on the western side of it is inscribed, in the several compartments, "Crux Illuti," "Samson redis," and "Samuel egisar," for excisor, Samuel being the name of the sculptor; and on the eastern side is "Samson posuit hanc crucem pro annia (instead of anima) ejus:" this stone is elaborately carved, and was once the pedestal of a cross; its height above the ground is six feet three inches, and its breadth is two feet six inches at the bottom, and one foot ten inches at the top. A very curious monumental stone, forming originally the shaft of a cross, which anciently stood near the porch of the church, and which, on the interment of a corpse of extraordinary size, having been undermined in digging the grave, fell down upon the coffin, and was covered with earth in filling up the grave, was, in 1789, discovered by Mr. Edward Williams, who was led to search for it by a traditional story relating to it, at that time current in the neighbourhood. This stone, which is nine feet in height, two feet four inches broad at the base, and one foot seven inches at the upper end, and about one foot three inches in thickness, bears the following inscription: "In nomine Dñi Summi incipit crux Salvatoris, quæ præ- paravit Samsoni Apati pro anima sua et pro anima Juth ahelo rex et Artmali Togat crux me:" it appears, from the old register of Llandaf, that Juthahel, King of Glamorgan, and Artmael, King of Gwent, bestowed lands and conferred great privileges on the churches of St. Illtyd. This ancient stone must have been buried before the continuator of Camden copied the inscriptions on St. Illtyd's monument, as he makes no mention of it, which he doubtless would have done had it been then visible. After it had been raised out of the grave, in 1789, it lay on the ground till 1793, when Mr. Williams obtained assistance and placed it in an erect position against the east side of the church porch. Close to the wall of the lower or old church is another stone worthy of notice, of a pyramidal form, about seven feet high, and curiously carved, having a deep groove on the inside, next the wall: it has been supposed to have formed part of a heathen altar, but how or for what purpose it was placed there has not been satisfactorily explained.

About the year 1705, a daughter of Evan Seys, Esq., bequeathed £600 to be invested in land, and the rents to be paid to a minister for preaching a sermon every Sunday evening in the parish church; or, in the event of his not being permitted to do so in this parish, the bequest to be transferred to the parish of Eglwys-Brewis, in this county. Mrs. Margaret Seys bequeathed also £200, directing the interest to be applied to teaching ten poor children, and apprenticing one poor boy. Robert Powel, in 1726, bequeathed some land; and there are some other small donations and bequests to the poor of this parish. About a mile and a half from the village of Boverton, on the lofty cliffs overhanging the Bristol channel, are the remains of two Roman camps: that on the eastern cliff, which defends one side of the valley of Colhugh, is called the "Castle Ditches;" it is a very strong post, accessible on one side only: the other, which is also upon the sea-coast, is about two miles distant from Castle Ditches, and about the same distance from Boverton. In many of the gardens and small enclosures at this place, and in its vicinity, human skeletons have been discovered, and Roman coins dug up: of the latter, several were found in November 1798, which were sold to the Rev. Robert Nicholl and others; those in the possession of that gentleman are chiefly coins of Nero, Vespasian, Domitian, Nerva, Trajan, Adrian, Antoninus Pius, and other Roman emperors: they were found by some labourers employed in filling up an old quarry not far from Eglwys-Brewis, near Boverton, and are of silver. There are still several remains of the ancient collegiate buildings in different parts of the parish: the house in connexion with the rectorial tithes, which were severed from the monastery of Illtutus by Robert Fitz-Hamon, is still a respectable edifice, with hanging gardens descending towards the church, and having several spacious rooms, which have been generally occupied by the parish schoolmaster, and are capable of containing some hundreds of persons. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £653. 12.

LANTWIT juxta NEATH, or LANTWIT LOWER (LLAN-ILLTYD), a parish, comprising the townships of Clyne, Lantwit, and Resolvend, which separately maintain their own poor, in the hundred of NEATH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, adjoining the borough of Neath, and containing 1117 inhabitants, of which number, 727 are in the hamlet of Lantwit. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Neath, and comprises a considerable extent of country, which is richly wooded and enlivened with much beautiful and pleasingly diversified scenery. The surface is finely varied, and from the higher grounds are obtained some pleasing and extensive views. The soil is various: coal and iron-ore are found in different parts of the parish; and there are some extensive quarries of paving-stone of good quality. The principal coal-works are those of Messrs. Riddle, Yong, and Co., in which about forty men are constantly employed; and the quarries, which are not now worked to their full extent, afford employment to about fifteen men. The living is consolidated with the rectory of Neath, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church is dedicated to St. Illtyd, from which circumstance the parish derives its name, properly "Llan-Illtyd," but contracted into "Lantwit." There was formerly a chapel in this parish, called Ynys Vâch, but it was never consecrated, and was suffered many years ago to fall into decay. Morgan Jenkins, in 1692, bequeathed a small portion of land to the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £323. 1., of which sum, £205. 16. is raised on the hamlet of Lantwit.

LANTWIT-VAIRDRE (LLAN-ILLTYD-VAERDRE), a parish in the hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Llantrissant, comprising the Higher and Lower divisions, and containing 811 inhabitants. The river Tâf runs along the eastern confines of this parish, which abounds with coal: this fuel is worked for exportation at the Maes-Mawr collieries, where about forty persons are employed: from these works a tram-road communicates with the Glamorganshire canal: there are also several smaller collieries, worked by shaft, only for home consumption. In the north-eastern part of the parish, on the banks of the Tâf, a populous and increasing village has been brought into existence by the erection of very extensive works belonging to Messrs. Biddulph and Co., of Ledbury, for the manufacture of patent wrought-iron railway plates. Many cottages have also been built here by Mr. Crawshay, for the workmen to be employed in tin-mills, which he purposes to establish at this place. The river Tâf is here crossed by two bridges, over one of which is a tram-road, connecting the new works with the canal, which passes within a few yards on the other side of the river. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llantrissant, (to which the vicarial tithes are appropriated), in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is situated in a sequestered spot, and surrounded only by a few cottages: having become exceedingly dilapidated, it is about speedily to undergo a thorough repair. Morgan Griffith, in 1644, gave by will a rent-charge of £2, for the benefit of four poor families of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £286. 13.

LAUGHARNE, otherwise TALYCHARN, an incorporated sea-port and market town, and a parish, in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $12\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W.) from Carmarthen, and 228 (W.) from London, containing 2020 inhabitants, of which number, 1423 are in the township of Laugharne, and the remainder in the rest of the parish. The ancient British name of this place, Tâlcharn, or Tâlycoran, from which was derived its subsequent appellation of Llacharn, since modernized into Laugharne, is supposed to have originated in its situation above the mouth of the river Coran, which here falls into the Tâf, near the influx of the latter river into Carmarthen bay, from which circumstance also it is not unfrequently called in the Welsh histories Abercoran. It appears to have attained a considerable degree of importance at a very early period, and to have been distinguished as a fortified place prior to the Norman invasion. Of the original foundation of the castle nothing satisfactory has been recorded: it is, however, supposed that the princes of Dynevor had either a palace or a fortress at this place, which subsequently fell into the hands of the Norman invaders, who, for the greater security of the territories which they usurped in this part of the principality, replaced it with a castle of greater strength. Frequent mention of this castle occurs in the Welsh annals; and during the continued struggles between the Normans and the Welsh, who were ever upon the alert to recover the territories of which they had been dispossessed, and also in the numerous contests which arose between the native chieftains for the extension of their dominions, it was, from its strength and importance, an object of frequent contention, and alternately in the possession of the belligerent parties. Henry II., on his return from a fruitless expedition into Ireland, in 1172, passed through this place, where he was met by Rhys ab Gruffydd, the last sovereign prince of South Wales, who entertained him in the castle, paid him homage as his vassal, and received from him his son Howel, whom that monarch had long held as a hostage. In the year 1215, this castle, together with several other fortresses, at that time in the hands of the Normans, was taken and destroyed by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, but was rebuilt in the following reign, by Sir Guido de Brian, who, having espoused one of the daughters of Prince Rhys, obtained the lordship of Talycharn, and procured for the town a charter of incorporation, with many valuable privileges, conferring on the burgesses an extensive grant of land, of which they still retain possession. On the death of Sir Guido, the lordship of Talycharn descended to one of his two daughters and coheiresses, who married Owen Laugharne, of St. Bride's, in the county of Pembroke. The castle is said to have been again destroyed by the forces under Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, in 1256, from which time few particulars of its history are recorded till the reign of Henry VII., though it was probably rebuilt within that period, as that monarch, among other grants, in compensation for his great services, gave this castle and its dependencies to Sir Rhys ab Thomas, who attended him to Bosworth Field, and by his valour and influence contributed materially to the success of the enterprise which placed him on the throne. On the attainder of the grandson of Rhys, the castle reverted to the crown. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., it was first garrisoned for the king, but was taken, in 1644, by the parliamentarian forces, under General William Laugharne. Afterwards, when this commander had embraced the royal cause, it was besieged by Cromwell in person, against whom it held out for three weeks ; but several breaches having been made in the walls, the garrison surrendered upon honourable terms, and the castle was soon afterwards dismantled.

The town is beautifully situated on a level plot of ground, enclosed on every side, except towards the sea, by lofty eminences richly clothed with timber, and consists principally of one long and spacious street, intersected at right angles by a shorter thoroughfare, leading to that part of it called the Cors, in which are some new buildings. The houses are in general well built, and of respectable appearance ; the streets are partially paved, and the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. The sheltered situation of the town protects it from the keenness of the winds, and renders it peculiarly desirable as a residence for persons of delicate health ; and on the eminences by which it is immediately encircled are several neat cottage residences, adapted to those whose constitutions may require the influence of the sea breeze and a bracing atmosphere. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and from the higher grounds are obtained extensive prospects over the bay of Carmarthen, and the adjacent country, which abounds with picturesque beauty. The appearance of the town, which is considered one of the cleanest and best built in South Wales, embosomed in an amphitheatre of verdant hills, and ornamented with the venerable remains of its ancient castle, is truly romantic ; and the advantages of good society and retirement which it affords, with the abundance and moderate price of provisions, are among the attractions which it offers to families who may be desirous of combining economy with comfort. A reading-room has been established, and it is also in contemplation to open a billiard-room. The port is a creek to that of Llanelly, and its trade is very inconsiderable, being principally confined to the exportation of butter and corn, which it shares with St. Clear's. The haven, formed by the river Tâf, at a short distance from the town, is accessible to vessels of considerable burden. The parish, which is divided into two portions, called respectively the Town hamlet and the Parish, each separately maintaining its own poor, comprises a large tract of arable and pasture land, nearly all of which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil, though varying with the surface, is in general fertile and productive ; and the labouring inhabitants, with the exception only of such few as are connected with the small extent of trade carried on at the port, are principally employed in agriculture. The market, which is abundantly supplied with corn and with provisions of all kinds, is on Friday ; and fairs are held annually on May 6th and September 28th. The borough was first incorporated by Sir Guido de Brian, whose charter was confirmed by Henry III., and subsequently ratified and enlarged by Edward VI., who vested the government in a portreeve, recorder, aldermen, and an indefinite number of burgesses, assisted by two common attorneys, four constables, and other officers. The portreeve, who is elected annually, and the recorder, are chosen from the burgesses by a grand jury of that body, appointed for the purpose, which is changed every year, and of which the foreman must have served the office of portreeve and become an alderman : the common attorneys and constables are appointed from the jurymen ; and the burgesses are made by a presentation of the grand jury.

The corporation possess lands, granted by Sir Guido, now of the value of £20,000 : seventy-six of the senior poor burgesses enjoy for life portions of land, the least of which entitles to vote for the county member. The town-hall is a neat building of ordinary dimensions, with a small square tower, situated at the point of intersection of the principal street with the smaller one, where there is a commodious market-place.

This place constitutes a prebend in the cathedral church of Winchester, rated in the king's books at £45. The living is a vicarage, with the rectory of Llsansadwrnen annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Winchester. The church, dedicated to St. Martin, is a spacious and venerable cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, supported on pointed arches : it occupies a picturesque situation on an eminence under a richly wooded bank, by which it is partly concealed from view. The walls of the building are strengthened with projecting buttresses, and within are covered by numerous tablets. At the west end is a handsome organ, presented to the church by the late Vice-Admiral Laugharne, whose sister, during her lifetime, contributed £10. 10., and whose nephew, Capt. William Laugharne, R. N., who is still living, £5. 5., towards the stipend of an organist. Among the monuments contained in the church is a large mural tablet, bearing a long inscription, to the memory of Sir John Powell, one of the judges who presided at the trial of the seven bishops, in the reign of James II. : he resided at Broadway House, a little to the west of the town, and, dying at the age of sixty-three, was interred here in 1696. The richly embroidered mantle of Sir Guido de Brian is still preserved in it. The chapels of Kifig and Marrôs, formerly dependent on this church, have been endowed with £8 per annum each by the Vicar of Laugharne, and subsequently by the Governors of Queen Anne's bounty, the former with £600 and the latter with £800, and are now united into one benefice, in the patronage of the Vicar of Laugharne. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Elizabeth Foster bequeathed £150 four per cent. Bank annuities, for instructing poor children of this parish in reading and in the principles of the Christian religion ; and Mary Griffiths and Jane Morgan gave each £52 towards the support of a charity school. Miss Theodosia Laugharne, sister of Vice-Admiral Laugharne, bequeathed at her death £1800 in the three per cents., to be appropriated to the annual payment of a salary of £30 to an organist ; and of an annuity of £20 to her servant for life, which is afterwards to be assigned to the maintenance of a school in the parish of Llangunock, and the remainder to the poor of this parish. Zacharias Thomas bequeathed a rent-charge of £4, payable out of his freehold of Norwaddin, in this parish ; and Mrs. Letitia Cornwallis gave £100, which, with the accumulated interest, now produces £10. 13. 8. per annum, for the relief of the poor. The remains of the ancient castle, which crowns the summit of a cliff at the mouth of the Tâf, near the southern extremity of the town, are extensive and in an excellent state of preservation, forming an interesting and prominent feature in the scenery of the place: near the gateway is a handsome modern edifice, the residence of the family of the late Col. Starke, by whom the interior of the castle and the adjoining ground have been tastefully laid out. About a mile from the town are some remains of an ancient building, called Roche's castle, which, according to local tradition, are said to be the vestiges of an ancient monastery, though by whom founded, or for what order of brethren, is not known. The family of the Laugharnes have been settled at this place ever since the marriage of their ancestor, Owen Laugharne, with the daughter of Sir Guido de Brian, Lord High Admiral of England, and anciently lord of Talycharn. Descended from this family, and probably a native of this town, was Lieutenant-General William Laugharne, who first distinguished himself as an officer in the parliamentary army, but who, afterwards joining the royalist party, garrisoned Laugharne, Tenby, and Pembroke, for the king, and at the last-named place was taken prisoner: he was tried for his life, together with Colonels Powell and Poyer, who had also been made prisoners by Cromwell, and found guilty of high treason. After sentence of death had been passed upon these three officers, Cromwell was induced to consent that it should be carried into execution only upon one of them, and gave orders to determine by lot which should be the victim. Three papers were folded up for this purpose, on two of which was written "Life given by God," and the third was left blank. According to an arrangement agreed upon by the prisoners, the lots were drawn by a child, and the fatal blank was assigned to Colonel Poyer, who was shot in Covent Garden, on the 25th of April, 1649. Dr. Josiah Tucker, Dean of Gloucester, an eminent divine and a celebrated literary and political writer, was born in this parish, in the year 1712, and died at the advanced age of eighty-seven, in the year 1799: his writings were chiefly on subjects connected with the times in which he lived, and, though masterpieces of the kind, possess little interest at present: he was the liberal patron of that premature and extraordinary genius, John Henderson, who, under his auspices, prosecuted his studies at Oxford, where he took his degree of B. A., and died at the age of thirty-one, in 1788. Reynal Pecoek, of whom little more is stated than that he was a very learned man, was also a native of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £905. 7., of which sum, £528. 16. is applied for those of the Town hamlet, and £376. 11. for those of the remainder of the parish.

LAVAR (ABOVE), a division in the parish of LLANSANTRAID GLYNN CERIOG, hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Llangollen. The population is included in the return for the parish. It takes the adjunct from its situation on the river Ceiriog, which passes through this division.

LAVAR (BELOW), a division in the parish of LLANSANTRAID GLYNN CERIOG, hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Llangollen. The population is returned with the parish. The adjunct is derived from its being situated in the lower part of the Vale of the Ceiriog. Several of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of flannel.

LAVERNOCK, otherwise LARNOCK, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN,

SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. by W.) from Cardiff, containing 77 inhabitants. The living is a rectory not in charge, consolidated with the vicarage of Penarth, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, is situated close to the edge of the water, the parish lying on the shore of the Bristol channel. Lead-ore has been obtained here, but the works are now discontinued: the principal substratum is lias limestone, in which the usual fossils abound: in the cliffs under this limestone are found tripoli, and lapis cariosus, or rotten stone, intermingled with a red marly earth, in which are imbedded blocks of gypseous alabaster. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £27. 10.

LAWHADEN, or LLEWHADEN (LLAN-HAUADEN), a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. N. W.) from Narberth, containing 657 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Aidan, Bishop of Lindisfarne, who died in the year 651, was for many years distinguished as the principal episcopal residence of the bishops of St. David's, who had a magnificent castle and palace here, with a very extensive park, and forest of red deer, noticed by Leland. This truly splendid structure, which was built entirely of hewn stone, was the favourite residence of Bishop Beck, who contributed greatly to its embellishment: it was adapted in every respect to the purposes of domestic convenience, and had every appendage of luxury and state. The exact time of its original foundation is not known; but from a deed of feoffment, bearing date 1383, it appears that John Fowley was at that time constable of the castle and master of the board of works to Bishop Hoton, who conveyed to him and to Ellen his wife certain lands in the vicinity, which are now the property of his descendants. In the reign of Henry VIII., Lawhaden castle, together with the other episcopal palaces of this diocese, was stripped of its leaden roof by Bishop Barlow, who subsequently availed himself of the dilapidation which he had caused, as a plea for carrying into effect his purpose of transferring the see to Carmarthen. From this period the palace was suffered to fall into decay; but the ruins, which are still venerable and majestic in their appearance, afford imposing evidence of its pristine grandeur. The parish comprises a large tract of rich arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The village is situated on the summit of a lofty ridge overhanging the river Cleddy, and commanding a fine view of the adjacent country, which abounds with richly varied scenery; and within the parish are some highly interesting and pleasingly romantic features, among which are, the church, beautifully situated on the margin of the river, under a richly wooded eminence, and the majestic and venerable ruins of the ancient castle immediately above it; Ridge-way, an elegant modern mansion, erected by the late I. H. Foley, Esq., and now the residence of his widow, occupying a portion of the lands granted to the ancestor of that gentleman by Bishop Hoton, in the year 1383; and, in the village, is also a good family house belonging to the Skyrmes, whose ancestor accompanied Oliver Cromwell into the principality during the parliamentary war, and obtained a settlement at this place.

This parish constitutes a prebend in the cathedral church of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £17.17.1., and annexed to the Chancellorship of the cathedral by Bishop Beck, in 1287. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Blettherston annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8.18.6½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Aidan, is an ancient and venerable edifice, with a handsome tower, and in its retired and beautiful situation forms an interesting and romantic feature in the scenery around the village. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. It is in contemplation to establish a National school for the gratuitous instruction of children, in connexion with the parent society in London. The remains of the ancient castle form a majestic and venerable ruin, crowning the summit of a precipitous eminence, commanding a magnificent and extensive prospect. The site was originally surrounded by a moat, over which was a drawbridge leading to the principal entrance, through a noble gateway defended by two circular towers: this portion of the building is still in a state of tolerable preservation: there are also the remains of two octagonal towers (which appear to have contained the state apartments and rooms of residence), of part of a small but very elegant chapel, and some portions of the outer walls. Some fragments of the park walls are yet remaining, and the land which they now serve to enclose is some of the very richest in the county. The prevailing character of the architecture is that of the early English style, and the ruins have a most beautiful and picturesque appearance from every point of view. On the road side there are the remains of an ancient building, covered with ivy, which is said to have been founded by Bishop Beck, as an hospitium for pilgrims visiting St. David's shrine. Lawhaden castle was the head of the barony in right of which the Bishops of St. David's claim their seat in the house of peers. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £155.17.

LAWRENCE (ST.), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 8½ miles (N. by W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 211 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the north-western part of the county, and comprehends a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, of which the greater portion is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surface is boldly undulated; the surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing; and from the higher grounds some good views are obtained of the adjoining country, which is much diversified. The soil, though varying in different parts of the parish, is in general fertile: the parochial rates are assessed by the ploughland. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3.18.9., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Lawrence, from which circumstance the parish derives its name, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £52.6.

LAWRENNY (LAWRENNEY), a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.N.E.) from Pembroke, containing 422 inhabitants. This parish is situated on a branch of Milford Haven, over which it has a ferry, and comprises a large portion of enclosed and well-cultivated land. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in some parts enriched with noble plantations. Lawrenny Hall, the ancient seat of the late Hugh Barlow, Esq., who represented Pembroke and its contributory boroughs in eight successive parliaments, and now a ruin, is beautifully situated on a point of land between Milford Haven, on the west, and a wide creek branching from it to the north-east, towards Creswell bay: the demesne, which is co-extensive with the parish, is embellished with a rich variety of scenery, presenting an agreeable contrast of wood and water; and the luxuriant groves which shaded the ancient mansion are still seen in every point of view, embosoming the venerable church, which formed an interesting and highly picturesque object in the views from the hall. This fine estate is entailed on the family of — Lort Philipps, of Haverfordwest, Esq. Limestone, both for building and to be burned for manure, abounds in this parish; and the quarrying and burning of it affords employment to a portion of the inhabitants, a great number of whom are also engaged, during the winter season, in dredging for oysters, which are found here in great abundance, and conveyed principally to the London market, in boats from Chatham and Rochester, for the loading of which the coast affords every facility. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £13, and in the patronage of Mrs. Barlow. The church, dedicated to St. Caradoc, is a venerable cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, with an elegant square embattled tower, which is seen to great advantage from almost every side, rising above the rich foliage by which the body is concealed. In a sepulchral chapel belonging to the family of Barlow is a splendid monument to the memory of the late Hugh Barlow, Esq., consisting of an altar-tomb of variegated marble, on which is placed an elegant sarcophagus of white marble, bearing the family arms of Barlow and Crespigny: this monument was erected by his widow, who was of the latter family, and who also placed in the chapel two superb vases of alabaster, four feet in height, supported on pedestals of white marble. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. This is one of the four parishes to which Dr. Jones bequeathed, in 1698, considerable property for the relief of decayed housekeepers and the apprenticing of children, with a discretionary power to his executor and brother, the Rev. William Jones, to whose memory a handsome mural tablet has been erected in the church of this place, to add other parishes: the portion assigned to Lawrenny, from the produce of this charity, is about £30 per ann., appropriated pursuant to the directions of the testator. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure of £171.2.

LEADBROOK (LEAD-BROOK) MAJOR, a township in the parish of NORTHOP, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 1½ mile (N.) of Northop, containing 83 inhabitants. It is situated on the æstuary of the Dee, and comprises a considerable portion of its sands, which are dry at low water, and may therefore be brought into cultivation at a small expense. It is supposed to derive its name from the quantity of lead formerly washed out of the brook here.

LEADBROOK (LEAD-BROOK) MINOR, a township in the parish of NORTHOP, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. N. W.) from Northop, containing 24 inhabitants.

LECKWITH (LLËCHWEDD, or LLËCH-WYDD), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Cardiff, containing 112 inhabitants. This parish, of which the name signifies "the slope of the cliff," is situated on the river Ely, over which is a bridge of two arches. Limestone of good quality is found here in great abundance, and large quantities are quarried for building purposes, and also burnt as an article of manure for the supply of the surrounding neighbourhood. The village is situated on an eminence overlooking the marshes which intervene between it and Cardiff, and from Leckwith hill are some interesting and extensive views. The inhabitants are, from the exhalations rising from the lower grounds, subject to ague. The living, with Llandough and Cogan, forms a consolidated discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. The church, which is remarkable for the simplicity of its style, is dedicated to St. James, and stands upon a high bank above the marshes. The poor children of the parish are gratuitously instructed in the National school at Llandough. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £146. 1.

LEIGHTON, a township in that part of the parish of WORTHEN which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAWRSE, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Welshpool, containing 213 inhabitants. The river Severn is crossed here by a wooden bridge, on the road from Churchstoke to Welshpool; and Offa's Dyke passes nearly in a parallel line with that river through the township. This is one of several parishes and townships incorporated for the support of their poor in the house of industry at Forden: the average annual assessment for this township is £81. 8.

LETTERSON, LETTARDSTON, or LETTERSTON, a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (N.) from Haverfordwest, containing 493 inhabitants. This place derived its name from the ancient family of the Lettards, to whom the parish anciently belonged, and who gave the advowson of the living, together with the chapel of Llanvair, to the preceptory of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, which had been founded at Slebech, in this county. The parish is pleasantly situated in the north-western part of the county, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Haverfordwest to Fishguard. The surrounding scenery is pleasing, and in certain places somewhat picturesque: the distant views embrace an extensive tract of finely diversified and richly cultivated country. In the vicinity are some handsome seats and pleasing villas; and within the parish is Heathfield Lodge, the property of John Hill Harris, Esq., of Priskilly Forest, and now the residence of that gentleman's brother-in-law, William Jones, Esq. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llanvair-Nant-y-Gove annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £12. 11. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Giles, is not remarkable for any striking architectural features. The rectory-house has been recently rebuilt, under the provisions of Gilbert's act of parliament, by the present incumbent, and is a handsome edifice. In this parish, on a common near the road, are several tumuli, supposed to be sepulchral. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £65. 12.

LISVANE (LLÛS-VAEN), a parish in the hundred of KIBBOR, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. by E.) from Cardiff, containing 253 inhabitants. It is situated on the western bank of the Romeney, which here separates the counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Plymouth, and C. K. Kemeys Tynte, Esq., alternately. The church, dedicated to St. Denis, is a small structure. Mary Lewis, by deed in 1728, gave a rent-charge of £23 for teaching and apprenticing poor children of the parishes of Lisvane and Llanishen: there is also a small endowment of £1. 15. per annum for distribution among the poor not receiving parochial relief. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £131.

LLAN, a joint hamlet with Blaenau, in the parish of LLANGENDEIRN, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is returned with the parish. The hamlet takes its name from the parochial church being situated within its limits, near the right bank of the Gwendraeth Vechan river, which flows through it. The Mynydd Llangendeirn, an abrupt and irregular mountain, on which are two ancient circular earthworks, bounds it on the east.

LLAN, a hamlet in the parish of PEMBREY, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. S. E.) from Kidwelly. The population is included in the return for the parish. This hamlet takes its name from the parochial church being situated here: it occupies the south-eastern declivity of a lofty hill, at the mouth of the Burry river, which commands extensive prospects of Carmarthen bay, the Bristol channel, and the opposite coasts of Devonshire. In the south is a large tract of marsh land, on which numerous flocks of sheep are depastured, and through which the canal from Llanelly to Kidwelly proceeds, being connected with two capacious harbours, and a pier four hundred yards long, projecting into the Burry river.

LLAN, a joint township with Llêch and Llwyn, in the parish of LLANRHAIADR in KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. W.) from Ruthin. The population is included in the return for the parish. Courts leet and baron, with view of frankpledge, are held at Llanrhaiadr, before the steward of the Bishop of Bangor, to whom the manors of Llan and Llêch belong.

WALES, comprising the sea-port and market-town of Barmouth, and containing 1448 inhabitants. This parish extends for more than nine miles in length and four in breadth: the upper parts are rocky and mountainous, but about one-half of its surface is under cultivation. In 1810, an act of parliament was obtained for enclosing the common and waste lands in this and the adjoining parishes, under the provisions of which six thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight acres were allotted to Llanaber, and are now nearly all enclosed. From the hills and other elevated grounds fine views are obtained over Cardigan bay, the river Mawddach, and the surrounding country, which is characterized by varied features of bold and pleasing scenery. The village extends along the coast; and on the sands may be seen, at low water, an ancient stone which formerly served as a foot-bridge, inscribed with the legend "Hic jacet Calixtus Monedo Regi." Copper and lead ores were formerly found at Buddugre, in this parish; and on its southern side the river Mawddach is navigable for barges of less than twenty tons' burden from Barmouth to within two miles of Dôlgelley. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £11. 18. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Bôdvan, is a spacious structure, in the early style of English architecture: the interior consists of a nave, with north and south aisles, and a chancel; the aisles are each separated from the nave by five finely pointed arches, with massive round piers: the south entrance is under an arch richly ornamented with mouldings. There is an ancient font of elegant design; and among the monuments is one to the memory of the Rev. Robert Morgan. A chapel of ease was erected at Barmouth, in the year 1830. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Richard Roberts bequeathed £20 to the poor; and the Rev. Mr. Morgan, in 1739, gave £40 in trust, for the payment of twenty shillings annually to twenty of the poorest inhabitants who can repeat the Catechism in Welsh, and the other moiety of the interest to be distributed among such poor children as can read Welsh and repeat the Welsh Catechism: there are also some smaller charitable donations for distribution among the poor. On the borders of this parish and that of Llanddwywau, near the coast, stands an old family mansion, called Egryn. It was anciently the residence of a cymmro of some rank, and was occupied by friars in the fifteenth century, but has been converted into a farm-house. The interior is divided into three compartments, formed by pointed arches of Irish oak, which extend from the basement and support the roof, and the whole is of a curious construction. Hêndrêv-Vechan, in this parish, was the residence of four celebrated Welsh bards, namely, William, Richard, John, and Thomas Phillips, who flourished successively in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. Within its limits is an ancient encampment. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £510. 14.

LLANALLGO (LLAN-ALLGOV), a parish in the hundred of TWRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (E. by N.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 417 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable antiquity, derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Alltgo, son of Caw o Vrydain, by whom it was originally founded, about the commencement of the seventh century. It is situated on the coast of the Irish sea, by which it is bounded on the east, and, though of small extent, is rich in mineral treasures, and contains a large proportion of fertile land, which is for the most part enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The great range of limestone strata, which stretches from Flintshire through the county of Denbigh, by Great Orme's Head, and is continued under the bay of Beaumaris and along the northern shore of Anglesey, terminates at Moelvre, in this parish, where are extensive quarries of clouded, or variegated, marble, in considerable estimation for the variety and brilliancy of its colours, and the high polish of which it is susceptible. Great quantities of this marble, which is well adapted for mantel-pieces and ornamental statuary, are obtained from these mines, and shipped off to various parts of Great Britain. In this parish are also some quarries of black and grey marble, of good quality, which afforded materials for the construction of the pier and the erection of the lighthouse at Holyhead. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llaneluadr, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Gallgov, is a small but handsome cruciform structure, containing in the east window of the chancel, which is of elegant design, some fragments of ancient stained glass: it was thoroughly repaired in 1831. Near it is Fynnon Gallgov, or "St. Gallgov's Well:" its waters, which are strongly impregnated with sulphate of lime, were formerly held in high veneration for the miraculous cures ascribed to them, and are still regarded as highly beneficial in some chronic diseases. Adjoining the west front of the church is Capel Fynnon, or "the chapel of the Well," a small neat edifice, formerly appropriated to the use of the votaries of the patron of the spring, to whose influence the miraculous efficacy of its waters was attributed. In the adjoining parish of Llaneluadr are the ruins of an ancient chapel, formerly belonging to the church of this parish, and still called Capel Lligwy, from the name of the farm on which it is situated. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £91. 17.

LLANANO (LLAN-ANNO), a parish partly in the hundred of KNIGHTON, and partly in that of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 12½ miles (W.) from Knighton, containing 343 inhabitants. The surface of this parish is uneven, and in some parts even precipitously hilly: the lands are partly enclosed and cultivated, and the soil in these portions is generally fertile and productive. The scenery is for the most part of a soft and pleasing character; and from the higher grounds may be obtained some extensive views over the adjacent country. The turnpike road from Builth, in Brecknockshire, to Newtown, in the county of Montgomery, passes through the parish a little to the east of the church. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Llanbister in the collegiate church of Brecknock, although Lord Kensington, who is lessee of the tithes, has of late exercised this privilege. The church, dedicated to St. Wonno or Ano, is a small edifice, undistinguished by any remarkable architectural features, but beautifully situated on the bank of the river Ithon. There is a place of worship for Anabaptists. On the summit of a rocky eminence rising abruptly from the river Ithon, and commanding the entrance of a narrow defile, are the remains of an ancient castle, called "Tŷ yn y Bwlch," probably one of the residences of the ancient chieftains of Maenllydd. Within the limits of the parish is a mineral spring, called Fynnon Newydd, or "the New Well," the water of which is sulphureous, and efficacious in the cure of scorbutic and scrophulous diseases. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £138. 15.

LLANARMON (LLAN-ARMON), a parish in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. E.) from Pwllheli, on the road to Carnarvon, containing 613 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated in a fertile plain, and the neighbourhood partakes of the pleasing scenery which prevails in this part of the country. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to that of Llangybi, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Garmon, is an ancient and spacious structure in good repair: some additional windows have lately been inserted, previously to which alteration the interior was very dark. There is neither a parsonage-house nor glebe land attached to the living. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. The Rev. Mr. Griffith, in 1729, bequeathed, in trust to the minister and churchwardens, lands producing £2. 10. per annum, for the benefit of the poor of the parish; and Mrs. Jones left £20, of which the interest is given to poor widows. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £220. 18.

LLANARMON (LLAN-ARMON), a parish, a small portion of which is in the hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, and the rest in the hundred of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4½ miles (E. by S.) from Ruthin, containing 1475 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated on the river Alyn. In the township of Eryrys are mines of lead-ore, which have been very productive, but are now nearly exhausted. In 1828, a very powerful steam-engine was erected for pumping the water from the mines, but, from the low price of lead-ore, the proprietors have materially lessened the extent of their operations: there is abundance of ore in the neighbourhood, and when it will fetch a price sufficient to indemnify the adventurers, there is little doubt of its being raised in large quantities. Fairs are held on July 30th and October 19th. The living comprises both a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph: the former is a sinecure, rated in the king's books at £31. 15., and the latter, which is discharged, at £12. 5. 10.; both are in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Germanus, or Garmon, is a large plain edifice: the interior is appropriately fitted up for divine service, and contains numerous ancient and interesting monuments. Under an arch in the south wall is the recumbent figure of a knight, completely armed, bearing in his right hand a short sword, and on his left arm a shield, with the inscription "Hic jacet Gryfyd ap Llewelyn ap

Ynyr." Within a niche in the outer wall of the church is the figure of a bishop, six feet four inches in height, which is said to be that of St. Germanus, Bishop of Auxerre, who, with St. Lupus, gained over the Picts and Saxons, at Maes Garmon near Mold, in the year 420, the celebrated victory called by historians Victoria Alleluatica: there are also several handsome monuments to the family of Lloyd. Mrs. Margaret Vaughan, of Bôdidris, bequeathed an estate in the parish of Llanellidan, producing about £30 per annum, for educating and apprenticing five poor boys in each of the parishes of Llanarmon and Llandegla. There are also some trifling bequests and charitable donations, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor on St. Thomas' day. Throughout the vale in which the village is situated, and on every neighbouring eminence, are numerous tumuli, of which several have been opened at various times, and found to contain sepulchral urns filled with ashes, with human bones, which had resisted the action of the fire, scattered about them in profusion. In 1810, one of the largest was opened in the township of Gelliguanan, and found to contain the skeleton of a horse and his rider, in a position in which they might have fallen; near the ribs of the horse was found a brass spur, weighing seventeen ounces. In 1827, another was opened, near the village of Llanarmon, in which was discovered an urn of baked clay, with three skulls and various other bones lying within a circular enclosure of stones near it. Within a short distance of the same spot, another of these tumuli was opened in 1831, and near its centre were discovered three urns of coarse clay, the largest of which, containing about three quarts, was filled with fine grey ashes: near them were several bones, a copper coin of the Emperor Nero, a fibula of copper, gilt and enamelled, and a plain ring of the same metal. About a mile and a half from the village are two artificial mounds of large dimensions, on the summit of the loftier of which formerly stood the castle of Iâl, built by Owain Gwynedd, in 1148, of which not a fragment now remains, except some traces of the rampart and fosse by which it was surrounded. On the summit of a rocky knoll, near Tommen y Rhodwydd, is a spring dedicated to St. Garmon, the water of which is said neither to increase nor diminish at any time, nor has it any visible inlet or outlet, and superstition attributes to it miraculous properties. Some plantations of considerable extent have been formed, within the last thirty years, in the township of Gelliguanan, by W. M. Thackeray, Esq., M. D., which are now in a flourishing condition. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £630. 19.

LLANARMON-DYFRYN-CERIOG (LLAN-ARMON-DYFRYN-CERIÖG), a parish in the Cynlleth and Môchnant division of the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (W. N. W.) from Oswestry, containing 307 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Ceiriog, is supposed to have been the burial-place of St. Germanus, the celebrated bishop of Auxerre. Fairs are held on the first Monday after April 11th, August 13th, and October 19th. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £8. 11. 10½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St.

Germanus, is an ancient and spacious building, but entirely destitute of architectural character, and in a very dilapidated condition. About forty yards to the west of it, and within the cemetery, is a large oblong tumulus, which is said to be the sepulchre of St. Germanus. Mr. Thomas Humphreys, in 1731, bequeathed £48, the interest arising from which sum is annually distributed among the poor of the parish, according to the will of the testator. On the summit of a hill within a mile of the village, towards the north-west, is a very extensive circular encampment, defended by a double fosse, with an entrance on the west, near which are some large and detached masses of stone. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £153. 15.

LLANARMON-MYNYDD-MAWR (LLAN-ARMON-MYNYDD-MAWR), a parish in the Cynlleth and Môchnant division of the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (W.) from Oswestry, containing 164 inhabitants. This parish comprises an uneven but chiefly elevated tract near the southernmost extremity of the county. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llanrhaidr. The church, dedicated to St. Garmon, was formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church of Llanrhaidr, only a mile and a half distant, the vicar of which place still receives the tithes of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £52. 2.

LLANARTH (LLAN-ARTH), a parish in the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 13 miles (N. W. by W.) from Lampeter, consisting of two divisions, North and South, and containing 2449 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable extent, is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road leading from Cardigan to Aberystwith, and is intersected by the river Llethy, which falls into Cardigan bay at Llanina. The Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., on the second night after his landing at Milford Haven, encamped his forces at Wern Newydd, in this neighbourhood, where he was hospitably entertained by Einon ab Davydd Llwyd, on his route through this county to Bosworth Field. The surface of the parish is boldly undulated, and in some parts mountainous: the lands are partially enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is strikingly varied by picturesque dingles and sterile mountains; and from the higher grounds some pleasing and extensive views are obtained over St. George's channel. Noyad Llanarth, anciently the seat of the family of Griffiths, is now a spacious modern mansion, the residence of Lord Kensington. Fairs are annually held in the village on January 12th, March 12th, June 17th, September 22nd, and October 27th, for horses, cattle, and merchandise. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Llanina annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 1½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Vylltyg, is a venerable structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a lofty and substantial tower, and is situated on the declivity of a high hill: in the churchyard, a little to the north of the church, is a stone four feet and a half in height, and two feet ten inches in breadth, bearing a rude cross, and having an inscription, which, however, is so much obliterated as to be illegible. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. In this parish are the remains of an extensive encampment, called Castell Moeddyn, and on the farm of Pen Voel is another, called Pen y Gaer. Of Castell Mabwynion, also in this parish, which was allotted by Prince Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, in his partition of the reconquered territories in South Wales, in 1216, to Rhys ab Gruffydd, there are not any remains, neither is the exact site of it known. There is a tumulus of earth, called Crûg Côch, on an extensive common here. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of both divisions of the parish amounts to £694. 2.

LLANARTHNEY (LLAN-ARTHNEU), a parish in the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7½ miles (E.) from Carmarthen, containing 1839 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the south bank of the river Towey, and comprehends a considerable portion of the mountain of Mynydd-Mawr, and a large tract of arable and pasture land, of which nearly the whole is enclosed, and in a high state of cultivation. The village, through which passes the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Llandilovawr, is surrounded by a profusion of the richest and most picturesque scenery: situated on the south bank of the Towey, on one of the finest reaches of that beautiful river, it appears to be entirely enclosed by lofty eminences of singularly diversified aspect. To the south rise some of the richly-wooded heights on the Myddelton estate: the distant hills which form one side of the vale of Cothy, receding to the north, open a passage for that stream to its confluence with the Towey. Other objects possessing interest no less from their historical association than from their venerable antiquity, form striking features in the landscape. The shattered walls of Dryslwyn castle crown the summit of an isolated rocky eminence, which rises abruptly out of the vale; and a little further westward is a larger eminence, called Grongar hill, rising in like manner from the vale, and distinguished as the subject of one of Dyer's most popular poems: but pre-eminent above the rest, in historical interest and romantic grandeur of appearance, are the ancient towers of Dynevor castle, seen in the distance, rising above a forest of aged oaks, which clothe the sides of a considerable declivity. Myddelton Hall, originally the property of David, brother of Sir Hugh Myddelton, and subsequently that of the late Sir William Paxton, who built the present mansion, is now the seat of — Adams, Esq.: it occupies an eminence at a short distance from the vale, commanding an extensive and magnificent prospect over the surrounding country. The mansion is an elegant and spacious structure of Grecian architecture, with a noble portico. The grounds are very extensive, and are laid out with great taste; and among the numerous improvements made by the late proprietor is an elegant tower, raised to the memory of the late Admiral Lord Nelson, and situated on the highest summit of the long ridge of mountains which extends from below Llandilovawr to the sea, forming the southern boundary of the vale. This building, the ground plan of which is triangular in form, consists of three circular towers connected by walls terminating with an embattled parapet, above which the towers at the angles rise to the height of several feet: from the centre of this pile rises a hexagonal turret of considerable elevation, forming an observatory, from which an almost unbounded and beautiful prospect is obtained over the surrounding country. On the second story of the structure is a sumptuous banqueting-room, and in the several fronts of the basement story are spacious arched entrances, above which are tablets with appropriate inscriptions in English, Welsh, and Latin, in honour of the hero to whose memory the building was erected. Within the park are some strongly impregnated chalybeate springs, the waters of which were, by direction of the late Sir William Paxton, submitted to an analysis by Drs. Saunders and Babington, and found to contain, in one gallon, 16 cubic inches of carbonic acid gas, 4 inches of atmospheric air, 4 grains of carbonate of lime, 5 grains of carbonate of iron, 6 grains of muriate of soda,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  grains of muriate of lime, and 2 grains of sulphate of lime: hot and cold baths have been erected near them. Fairs are held here on June 5th and 6th, and the first Monday after July 12th; and at Voel Gastell, in the neighbourhood, on the northern declivity of the mountain of Mynydd-Mawr, another is held on June 24th.

This parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a neat plain edifice, with a low square tower, but presents no architectural details of importance: in the churchyard are the remains of an ancient Saxon cross, now forming part of a stile at the entrance. The original church of this parish is traditionally stated to have stood about four hundred yards to the north of the present edifice, on the bank of the Towey, by an extraordinary overflow of which river it is said to have been destroyed: the site is still called Hên Llan, or "the Old Church." There were formerly two chapels of ease to the mother church, of which one is now in ruins, and the other occupied by a congregation of dissenters. There is a place of worship for Baptists, and the Calvinistic Methodists assemble in the chapel of ease above noticed, in which also divine service according to the rites of the church of England is occasionally performed, in order to retain possession. A few years since, a ring of pure gold, with a medallion of the Virgin Mary with a lamb in her arms, was discovered in a field in this parish, and is now in the possession of Capt. Edwardes Gwynne, of Rhŷdygors, near Carmarthen. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £586. 11.

LLANASAPH, or LLANASA (LLAN-ASAPH), a parish in the Llanasaph division of the hundred of PRESTATYN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by W.) from Holywell, containing 2373 inhabitants. It comprises about seven thousand acres of land: the highest point within its limits, which is called Gorseddau, has an elevation of seven hundred feet. The village is situated in a pleasant valley, at the northern extremity of the county, on the south-western shore of the æstuary of the Dee, near its influx into the Irish sea. The vicinity is picturesquely adorned with numerous genteel residences, among the most remarkable of which is Gyrn, the seat of John Douglas, Esq., a handsome building of modern erection, in the castellated style of English architecture, and having four lofty and elegant towers: it occupies an elevated situation, commanding a beautiful and varied prospect of the æstuaries of the Dee and Mersey, with their respective shores, the Hillbre islands, and the Irish sea; immediately below it is the Point of Air lighthouse, and that of the Black Rock forms a striking object in the distance: its gallery of paintings contains many of the finest productions of the Italian and Flemish masters, and ranks among the most splendid and valuable of modern collections. Talacre, the property and residence of Sir Edward Mostyn, Bart., is pleasantly situated in the township of Gwespyr, nearly adjacent to the shore, and commands fine views of the bay of Llandulas and the Irish sea: a former mansion, which was built in the reign of James I., and considerably enlarged in 1710, was taken down in 1825, and a new one erected on its site, which was destroyed by fire in 1827, before it was entirely completed: it is now being rebuilt, in the decorated style of English architecture, upon a plan that will render it one of the most distinguished mansions in the principality, both as regards its extent and the beauty of its style, and the rich and diversified prospects it commands: the whole of the materials are obtained upon the estate, the ornamental mouldings, chimney-pieces, and window-frames, being composed of the fine freestone for which the neighbouring quarries are celebrated, whilst the floors, doors, and furniture are made of oak grown in the neighbouring woods. Golden Grove, the seat of Edward Morgan, Esq., is an elegant mansion, in the Elizabethan style: it occupies a sheltered situation among the hills, adorned with woods and plantations, and embracing prospects of great extent, variety, and magnificence, including the whole of the Snowdonian range of mountains. In 1812, an extensive tract of rich land was recovered from the sea, by means of an embankment nearly two miles in length, at an expense of £4000, which was defrayed by the freeholders; and twelve hundred acres, adjoining the Point of Air lighthouse, are now under cultivation, producing plentiful crops of grain of every description, particularly wheat: the land thus enclosed constitutes the new township of Trewaelod. The soil on the higher lands is light; and on the lower, rich and well adapted for the cultivation of corn. An agricultural experiment of a singular kind was made here in 1814, in the cultivation of hollyhocks, with which one hundred and forty-seven acres were planted; and extensive buildings were erected for manufacturing the produce: the object of this undertaking was never publicly known, and, after some years of spirited but unavailing efforts, the adventurers were reduced to bankruptcy, and obliged to abandon their scheme. This parish is noted for the abundance and value of its mineral productions: at Trelogan are extensive lead mines belonging to the crown, which have been worked for many years with great profit; and throughout the southern part of the parish there are other mines of lead and calamine, whilst the northern and eastern parts abound with valuable strata of coal and extensive quarries of freestone of the finest quality, all lying near the beach, and in full operation, their produce being shipped to various parts of the kingdom. Here commences the extensive coal tract of Flintshire, which extends south-eastward, parallel with the shores of the Dee. A new road has lately been formed along the sea-shore, at a considerable expense, by the principal landed proprietors of the neighbourhood, from Greenfield, in the parish of Holywell, to Talacre, in this parish. The lighthouse at the Point of Air belongs to the corporation of the Trinity House, and was erected for the accommodation of vessels navigating the æstuary of the Dee, to and from Chester.

The living is a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. 5½, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: it is endowed with the rectorial tithes of the townships of Axton and Trelogan, and with seven-fifteenths of the small tithes of the whole parish. The church, dedicated to St. Kentigern and St. Asaph, is a spacious and exceedingly neat structure, rebuilt, except the east end, in 1737, and consisting of a nave, chancel, and north aisle: the chancel is ornamented with a handsome window of stained glass, brought from Basingwerk abbey, and presented by Harry ab Harry, a native of this parish, who purchased the site of that house, after the dissolution. This church was granted as an impropriation, in 1385, to Lawrence Child, Bishop of St. Asaph, to supply the cathedral with lights, and for repairing the injury which it sustained during the wars. There are places of worship for Calvinistic, and Wesleyan Methodists, also a Roman Catholic chapel in the house at Talacre. Thomas ab Hugh, by will dated in 1671, bequeathed £30 for the erection of a school-house, which, however, had no endowment until the year 1801, when £10 per annum was assigned from the parochial funds, for the instruction of twelve boys, in addition to whom five are gratuitously taught from funds provided by Sir Edward Mostyn, Bart. Thomas ab Hugh, at the same time, gave £50 to buy bread for the poor, for which purpose also £20 was given by Edward Owens, in 1672; £6 by John Conway, in 1697; £22 by Edward Roberts, in 1702; and £50 by Roger Mostyn, in 1731: the greater part of these sums has been judiciously vested in the purchase of a tenement in the parish of Llandrillo yn Rhôs, now producing £15 per annum, which is expended in bread, given every Sunday to the poor. In the township of Gwespyr are the ruins of a chapel, dedicated to St. Beuno, which was used as a chapel of ease prior to the Reformation, but since that period divine service has not been performed in it. Numerous tumuli are dispersed among the higher grounds of this parish, in one part of which are eighteen in an unbroken line, with several others lying at a short distance from them. Offa's Dyke forms for some distance a boundary line between this parish and those of Whitford, Newmarket, and Gwaenyscor, after which it enters the former, and separates the townships of Golden Grove and Kelston, whence it is continued to the sea-shore near Talacre: its course in this parish is upwards of four miles, in which it is nearly perfect in many places, though in others it can only be traced with great difficulty: it is most distinctly seen at the lodge leading to Golden Grove. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £777. 14.

LLANAVAN (LLAN-AVAN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 384 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Avan, is pleasantly situated on the river Ystwith, which at this place forms a fine bold curve, and is enriched on both its banks with pleasingly varied and highly picturesque scenery: a neat modern stone bridge has been erected over this river. Within the parish is Cross Wood, the seat of the Earl of Lisburne, a neat mansion, pleasantly situated in grounds which are tastefully laid out. Lead-ore was formerly procured here at the Grogwynion mines, but these are now exhausted, and no new mines have been opened. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Chichester family, to whom the tithes are impropriated. The church is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and south transept: part of the ancient screen which separated the chancel from the nave is still remaining, and exhibits an elegant specimen of carved work: the ancient font, octangular in form, is also preserved. Among the communion plate is a curious ancient dish of silver, gilt, and embossed with twelve figures, of which ten represent warriors, and the other two dragons: all are arranged in couples, and engaged in combat. The church is situated within half a mile of the river, and in the churchyard is a fine avenue of trees, leading from the entrance of the cemetery to the south transept. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £46. 19.

LLANAVAN-VAWR (LLAN-AVAN-VAWR), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Builth, comprising the hamlet of Llŷsdinam, which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 936 inhabitants, of which number, 252 are in the first, 249 in the second, and 222 in the third, division of the parish; the remainder being included in the above-mentioned hamlet. The surface of this parish is abruptly broken into precipitous eminences and deep glens, and the soil varies in richness in proportion to the degree of elevation. On the higher lands it is dry and light, having little or no depth: in the lower parts the common lands consist chiefly of turf, and peat composed of decayed vegetables, about four or five inches in depth, resting on a bed of blue or greyish clay; and in the deep glens the soil is in general a stiff clay, which increases in depth as it approaches to the banks of streams, and is better adapted for tillage than for pasture. The parish is bounded on the north by a small stream called the Whevri, and the scenery of the neighbourhood is strikingly varied, and in many places highly picturesque. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Alltmawr and Llanavan-Vechan annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's: the impropriate tithes of the parish belong to the Dean and Chapter of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Avan, consists only of a nave of considerable length, with a low massive tower at the western end, containing five bells, which appears from a tablet on the south side of it to have been built at the expense of the parishioners, in 1765: the body of the edifice, which is very neat, was rebuilt at the cost of the parish, in 1814. There are within the walls neither ancient monuments nor inscriptions, though it is said that several of the vicars are interred beneath the altar-piece. In the churchyard is an altar-tomb, with the inscription Hic jacet Sanctus Avanus Episcopus: the stone is of a very hard and durable kind, and the letters, which are deeply cut, are in a very perfect state. The vicarage-house, called Persant, is pleasantly situated on the bank of the Whevri, about a quarter of a mile below the church, and has about fifty acres of glebe land attached to it. There is a place of worship for Baptists, called Troed-rhiw-dalar. Brÿniogar, formerly the residence of a branch of the Gwynne family of Garth, was anciently a distinguished mansion. At a small distance from the church is a Maen Hir, or upright stone, supposed to be of Druidical erection. A poet named Mâb y Cloch-yddyn, "the sexton's son," who flourished in the latter part of the fourteenth century, and was author of a poem in praise of Gwenhwyvar, wife of Hywel ab Tydyr ab Griffith, and who, by some writers, is identified with Macclav ab Lywarch, was born in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole of the parish, including the hamlet of Llÿsdinam, amounts to £467.3., of which sum, £144.13. is raised on the first division, £109.14. on the second, £110.11. on the third, and the remainder on the hamlet of Llÿsdinam.

LLANAVAN-VECHAN, or LLANVECHAN (LLAN-AVAN-VECHAN), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. by S.) from Builth, including a portion of the hamlet of Gwrvog, which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and the rest of which is included in the parish of Llanlleonvel, and containing 189 inhabitants. This parish, comprising about three thousand acres, is situated on the banks of the river Irvon, which, in its course from west to east, divides the parish into two nearly equal portions; and the high road from Builth to Llandovery, through Llangammarch, passes through the village. That part of the hamlet of Gwrvog which is within its limits consists of a narrow slip of land lying on the south side of the river Irvon, and is united in the assessment to the king's taxes, as well as for the support of the poor, with the rest of the hamlet in the adjoining parish of Llanlleonvel. The northern part of the parish has a gently undulating surface, while the southern is hilly, comprising part of the northern declivities of the Eppynt hills. On the north side of the Irvon, and near the bank of that river, are some fertile meadows and luxuriant groves of picturesque appearance; but the general aspect of the neighbourhood is neither pleasing nor interesting. At the extremity of a narrow glen, on the south side of the river, is a frightful precipice, called Graig ddô, from which the dell receives the name of Cwm Graig ddô, or "the vale of the black rock." This rock, which is but scantily clothed with wood, appears, when viewed from the higher grounds, to afford a comfortable shelter to the inhabitants of the vale beneath, while, as viewed from below, its appearance is altogether terrific. The parish is separated from that of Llanganten by the Havrena stream: the soil of the upper lands is light, but that of the lower, especially as they approach the river, is clayey: the whole is for the most part cold.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llanavan-Vawr, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Avan, and situated on the north side of the high road, is a small edifice, covered with slate, which is procured from the mountains, in laminæ varying from one inch to three inches in thickness. Gwrvog, in this parish, was formerly a family mansion, but, like many others in this part of the country, has been deserted by its proprietor, and is now a farm-house. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £43.12.

LLANBABO (LLAN-BABO), a parish in the hundred of TÂL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N. W. by W.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 174 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to its original founder, Pabo, one of the ancient native princes of Wales, who, for his valour in defending his country from the aggressions of the Scots and Picts, was styled Pabo Post Prydain, or "the support of Britain," and after his canonization became one of the most venerated saints of the principality. The parish, which is of small extent, is situated near the north bank of the river Alaw, and is separated from the chapelry of Llanerchymedd by the extensive marsh called Morva Alaw, which is impassable except during a dry summer. The lands, though principally marshy, are well cultivated, and the soil is productive. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llandeusan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, founded by St. Pabo in the year 460, is a small plain edifice, remarkable only as containing the ancient monument of its founder, which was discovered about the middle of the seventeenth century, buried nearly six feet below the surface of the ground, and afterwards placed in an upright position in the church. This monument, which is of stone, appears to have formed the lid of a sarcophagus, and has the effigy of the saint in a recumbent posture, habited in a long loose robe, fastened in front with button loops: the head is crowned, and the right hand grasps a sceptre: along the edge of the stone, on the left side of the figure, is a commemorative inscription in Latin. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £47.19.

LLANBADARN ISÂ YN Y CROYTHEN (LLAN-BADARN-Y-CREUDDYN), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 891 inhabitants. This large township, which forms a portion of the district of this extensive parish lying south of the river Rheidol, extends from that river to the northern bank of the Ystwith, and contains some pleasing residences, the principal of which is Nant Eos, the seat of Col. William Powel. The township is in general well wooded, and the roads from Aberystwith to Rhaiadr and Llanidloes and to Cardigan pass through it. A separate assessment is made for the maintenance of the poor: the average annual expenditure amounts to £346.8.

LLANBADARN-ODWYNNE (LLAN-BADARN-ODYN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N.N.E.) from Lampeter, containing 558 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Paternus, and its distinguishing adjunct from its conspicuous position on the summit of a lofty eminence, is situated near the river Aëron, and from the higher grounds is obtained a fine view of the Vale of Aëron, which abounds with pleasing and richly varied scenery. It formerly constituted a prebend in the collegiate church of Llandewy-Brevi, founded by Thomas Beck, Bishop of St. David's, in 1187, and was rated in the king's books at £6. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rev. Samuel Evans, the present incumbent. The church is a small edifice, consisting only of a nave and chancel, situated on a lofty eminence; and from the churchyard is an interesting view of the vale beneath, and an extensive prospect over the surrounding country. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, which is the largest dissenting place of worship in South Wales. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £89. 10.

LLANBADARN-TRÊVEGLWYS (LLAN-BADARN-TRÊV-EGLWYS), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (S. by W.) from Aberystwith, containing 982 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Arth, formerly constituted one of the prebends in the collegiate church of Llandewy-Brevi, and was rated in the king's books at £12. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Kilkennin annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with one-third of the tithes, and with £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is dedicated to St. Padarn, or Paternus. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £170. 2.

LLANBADARN UCHÂ YN Y CROYTHEN (LLAN-BADARN Y CREUDDYN), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the upper division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $12\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Aberystwith, containing 743 inhabitants. It is situated in the upper part of the parish, which is here wild and mountainous, and on the eastern bank of the river Rheidol, which rushes in foaming torrents along a rocky bottom, in a deep precipitous gulph, with its sides covered with thick brushwood, until it is joined by the Mynach at a short distance. The small chapel of Yspitty Cynvyn, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is situated in this township. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the majority of the landholders in that part of the parish which is above Nant Lymystaw, who pay sixpence in the pound, on an old survey, towards the minister's stipend. In the burial-ground are four large stones, the largest eleven feet high and six broad, standing upright, and forming the periphery of the quadrant of a circle, having the chapel in the centre, which were probably a Druidical enclosure. Through the burial-ground of the chapel a footpath leads to a rude wooden bridge, composed of one plank, thrown over a vast chasm, between two precipitous rocks, beneath which the Rheidol rushes with great force: it is called the Parson's bridge. The tithes of this township belong to the Chichester family. The celebrated Devil's bridge, with its romantic and picturesque scenery, is situated in this township, but is described in the article on the parish. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure being £153. 16.

LLANBADARN-VAWR (LLAN-BADARN-VAWR), a parish comprising the sea-port, borough, and market and post town of Aberystwith, from which the church is one mile distant, to the south-east, and the hamlets of Broncastellan and Clarach, in the upper division, and those of Cwmrheidol, Elerch, Isâ yn Dre', Uchâ yn Dre', Isâ yn Vainor, Uchâ yn Vainor, Melindwr, Parcel-Canol, and Trêvirig, in the lower division, of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN; and the hamlets of Llanbadarn Isâ yn y Croythen and Llanbadarn Uchâ yn y Croythen, each of all these hamlets maintaining its own poor, in the upper division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES; and containing 9824 inhabitants. The name of this extensive parish, which is of very remote antiquity, is derived from the dedication of its church, and its distinguishing adjunct from the pre-eminence which it enjoyed with respect to other parishes of that name, and also to distinguish it from the adjoining town of Aberystwith, which was anciently called Llanbadarn Gaerog, or the "Walled Llanbadarn." St. Padarn, or Paternus, to whom the church is dedicated, was a divine of considerable celebrity: he is said to have studied under Iltutus at Lantwit Major, or in Glamorganshire, and is associated with Teilo and David in the Welsh Triads, as one of the three blessed visitors. He is supposed to have founded a religious establishment here, which afterwards was erected into an episcopal see, of which he became the first bishop, and a suffragan to the Archbishop of St. David's. Paternus continued to preside over this see for twenty-one years, during which period he erected several churches, and founded divers monasteries in various parts of the province of Caredigion, now comprised chiefly in the county of Cardigan, in which he placed colonies of monks from the principal establishment at Llanbadarn, and at the end of that period, being recalled into Brittany, where he was made Bishop of Vannes, was succeeded in this diocese, which was afterwards called, after its first diocesan, "Paternensis," by Cynoc. The see appears to have flourished for nearly a century, and notice of a bishop of Llanbadarn occurs in the minutes of a synod held in the county of Worcester, in the year 601. About this time Llanbadarn is said to have lost its episcopal privileges, in consequence of the violent conduct of the inhabitants, who killed their bishop, and the church is said to have been annexed, after the dissolution of the see, to that of St. David's. The name of the bishop who thus became the victim of their fury is not mentioned in existing annals, neither is there any particular record of the event; but Humphrey Lloyd supposes it to have been Bishop Idnerth, to whose memory there is a monumental inscription in the parish church of Llandewy-Brevi. The suffragan bishop of Llanbadarn was one of the deputation appointed to meet St. Augustine, on his landing in Britain, with a view to resist the encroachments which were apprehended from the church of Rome, by opposing every attempt on the part of that missionary to establish the supremacy of the pope over the British church. The church was destroyed in 987, by the Danes, whose ravages in this part of the principality were carried to so great an extent, that Meredydd Prince of South Wales compounded with these ferocious invaders for the security of his territories, by the payment of one penny for every man within his dominions; this payment was called "the tribute of the black army." In 1038, this place was reduced to ashes by Gruffydd ab Llewelyn ab Sitsylt, who wrested it by violence from the hands of Howel ab Edwin; but in the year 1106, when Ithel and Madoc, who were in alliance with Henry I., ravaged all the county of Cardigan, with the exception of this place and Llandewy-Brevi, it suffered only an attack upon its sanctuary, from which several of Owain ab Madoc's men, who had taken refuge there, were dragged by force and put to death. Gilbert Strongbow, Earl of Strgyll, who, in 1109, erected the castle of Aberystwith, in this parish, gave the emoluments of this church to the monastery of St. Peter at Gloucester, in the year 1111; but the ancient establishment does not appear at that time to have been dissolved, for mention occurs of John, arch-priest of Llanbadarn, in the Welsh annals, in the year 1136, wherein he is stated to have been canonized for his great piety; and in the same annals, in the year 1143, the death of Sulien ab Rhythmarch, a man of great knowledge, and one of the College of Llanbadarn, is noticed. In the year 1116, Gruffydd ab Rhys, who had been invited into this part of the principality to assist in recovering from the Norman settlers the territories which they had usurped in the province of Cardigan, encamped his forces at Glâs Grûg, in this parish, previously to his unsuccessful attempt on Aberystwith castle: his failure in this enterprise was by some superstitiously attributed to an act of impiety, of which he was guilty, in taking some cattle to refresh his forces from within the limits of the extensive sanctuary attached to the church of Llanbadarn. Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, attended by Giraldus Cambrensis, visited this place, in 1188, on his tour to preach the crusades throughout the principality. Upon this occasion it is especially noticed by Giraldus, in his Itinerary, that the revenue of the monastery was chiefly enjoyed by laymen of one family, and that the affairs of the establishment were in a very bad state. The church was subsequently appropriated to the abbey of Vale Royal, in the county of Chester, founded by Edward I. During the insurrection headed by a native chieftain named Rhys ab Meredydd, in 1287, Llanbadarn-Vawr was the principal place of rendezvous for the English forces in South Wales.

The parish, which extends on an average about fifteen miles in length and six in breadth, is intersected by the rivers Ystwith and Rheidol, and comprehends a district distinguished for the abundance of its mineral wealth. The surface is generally hilly, in some parts even mountainous, and is also agreeably diversified with picturesque valleys; and the lands, with the exception of some large tracts of common and extensive elevated wastes, which, however, bear but a small proportion to the extent of the parish, are enclosed and cultivated; but the system of tillage, though it has considerably improved of late years, has not yet attained any great degree of excellence. The village is pleasantly situated under a high ridge on the banks of the river Rheidol, and consists of one straggling street of considerable length. The surrounding scenery is boldly and richly varied, combining many features of picturesque and romantic beauty; and from the higher grounds are obtained extensive and interesting views of the bay of Cardigan and the adjacent country. In the neighbourhood, and within the parish, are several noble mansions and elegant seats, of which the principal are, Nant Eos, the seat of Colonel William Powel, a spacious and well built mansion, beautifully situated in a richly wooded vale, comprising much pleasing scenery; Gogerddan, the seat of Pryse Pryse, Esq.; and Glân rheidol, the residence of James Hughes, Esq. The soil is various, in some parts affording only scanty pasturage for sheep, and in general being rather poor than fertile and productive. The principal mineral produce is lead-ore: from the mines, which were formerly worked upon a very extensive scale, Sir Hugh Myddelton chiefly derived the princely revenue which he patriotically expended, in the reign of James I., in supplying the metropolis with water by means of the New River. After this period the mines were continued in successful operation by Mr. Bushel, who, in the reign of Charles I., obtained from that monarch the privilege of establishing a mint in the castle of Aberystwith, as noticed in the article on that town. At present they are not worked to any great extent; indeed, owing to the great reduction in the price of the ore, and the deterioration of its quality, very few of them are in operation. The Cwm Symlog and Darrenvâch mines, which are situated on the estate of Pryse Pryse, Esq., are now in the occupation of Messrs. John Williams, Junr., and Brothers, of Scorrier House, near Truro, in the county of Cornwall: the quantity of ore raised from them, in the year 1831, was eighty tons, producing about sixty tons of fine lead, containing in every ton thirty-four ounces of pure silver. The Cwmrheidol mine, in the hamlet of that name, in the same year produced sixty tons of ore, from which forty-five tons of fine lead were extracted; but the proportion of silver intermixed with the ore of this mine was too inconsiderable to compensate for the trouble of separating it. The situation of the parish, on the coast of Cardigan bay, is highly favourable for the exportation of the produce of its mines; and the turnpike roads from Aberystwith to Llanidloes, Machynlleth, and Radnor, afford great facilities of intercourse with the neighbouring districts.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the arch-deaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £20, endowed with £450 private benefaction, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Padarn, and situated near the centre of the village, is an ancient and venerable cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a large square tower rising from the centre, supported on four massive columns, and surmounted by a low spire. The chancel contains several mural monuments to the principal families of the neighbourhood, among which may be more particularly noticed those to the families of Nant Eos and Gogerddan: of these, one of the most interesting is of white marble, sculptured by Flaxman, to the memory of Harriet, daughter of Viscount Ashbrook, and late wife of Pryse Pryse, Esq.: above this monument is a canopy exquisitely carved, in the most elaborate style of later English architecture. In the churchyard are two ancient British crosses without any inscription. At Yspitty, in the hamlet of Croythen Uchâ, is a chapel of ease, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the landholders in that part of the parish which is above Nant Lymystaw, who pay sixpence in the pound, according to an old survey, towards the stipend of the minister. From the greatly increased population of the parish it has been found advisable, in addition to the newly-erected chapel in the town of Aberystwith, to build a chapel also at Tyn Llidiart, in the hamlet of Parcel-Canol, for the erection of which a plan is now under consideration, and subscriptions have been opened, several hundred pounds having been already contributed. The number of places of worship for dissenters, including those in the town of Aberystwith, is no fewer than seventeen or eighteen, namely, for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Roderick Richards, of Pen Bont, in 1752, bequeathed £104; Jacob Evans, late of Penlanolew, in 1760, bequeathed £40; and John Jones, in 1783, left £50, for the instruction of poor children of this parish. Lewis Jones, late of Caeaeabâch, bequeathed £200 for teaching poor children of four hamlets; and Richard Lewis, late of Abercumdole, left £150 towards instructing those in the hamlet of Parcel-Canol: there are also some smaller charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor. The Roman Via Occidentalis, now called the Sarn Helen, passed through the parish; and about a mile eastward from the church are the remains of Glâs Grûg, the fortified post occupied by Gruffydd ab Rhys prior to his attack on Aberystwith castle. Davydd ab Gwilym, an eminent Welsh poet, was born at Broginin, in this parish, in 1340: he became Bard of Glamorgan, and is said to have written one hundred and fifty poems: he died in 1400, and was buried at Ystrad Flûr, or Strata Florida. Lewis Morris, an antiquary of some eminence, and surveyor of the mines royal, was interred in the church of this place: he had for some time preceding his death resided at Penbrÿn, in this county. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole of this extensive parish amounts to £2172. 1.

LLANBADARN-VAWR (LLAN-BADARN-VAWR), a parish in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, comprising the village of Pen y Bont, where there is a receiving-house for letters, and containing 491 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Ithon: the high road from Builth to Newtown runs through it, passing close by the church, within a few hundred yards of which it is crossed by that from Kington to Rhaiadr and Aberystwith, which also traverses it. The surface is for the most part irregular, and the soil in the low lands consists chiefly of clay: the only mansion is Pen y Bont Hall, the residence of I. C. Severn, Esq.; and Pen y Bont Court is a genteel residence, forming from its elevated situation a pleasing object. The village of Pen y Bont, the post-office at which is dependent on those at Kington and Rhaiadr, consists only of about a dozen houses, one of them an excellent inn, at which the petty sessions for the hundred of Kevenleece are occasionally held. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Paternus, is situated about a mile and a half from Pen y Bont, and consists of a nave and chancel, the latter ceiled, with an entrance porch: the churchyard contains some fine yew trees. There are places of worship for Anabaptists and Calvinistic Methodists, the former of which is endowed with a portion of land. There are two small bequests of ten shillings per annum each for the poor, one paid out of the tenement of Cwm Trallong, in this parish, and the other out of a farm called Lluest, in that of Llandewi Ystradenny. Near Pen y Bont there is a chalybeate spring, which is not in high repute, being but little known. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £185. 9.

LLANBADARN-VYNYDD (LLAN-BADARN-VYNYDD), a parish in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (S.) from Newtown, containing 518 inhabitants. The aspect of this parish, which is situated on the banks of the Ithon, in a mountainous district, is dreary and wild; and the scenery, though bold and striking, is not diversified with features either of beauty or of interest. The mountains, notwithstanding their appearance of barrenness, afford pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep. An excellent and commodious inn has been recently erected in the village, which is enlivened by the traffic it derives from its situation on the turnpike road from Builth, in Brecknockshire, to Newtown in the county of Montgomery. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Llanbister in the Collegiate Church of Brecknock, although Lord Kensington, who is lessee of the tithes, has recently presented to it. The church, dedicated to St. Padarn, or Paternus, is a small edifice, consisting only of a nave and chancel, and possessing no architectural claims to particular description. The produce of some inconsiderable charitable benefactions is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. There is a well called Fynnon Ddewi, or "David's Well," the water of which is slightly impregnated with sulphur, and is considered efficacious in the cure of scorbutic complaints. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £244. 12.

LLANBADARN-Y-GARREG (LLAN-BADARN-Y-GAREG), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Builth, containing 98 inhabitants. This parish comprises only about three hundred acres of enclosed land, and is situated on the small river Edwy, by which it is intersected, and of which the stream is here very narrow. The living is annexed to the rectory of Caregrina, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Padarn, is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, which are appropriately fitted up for divine service: it has no tower or steeple, but a single bell is suspended under a small shed. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A rent-charge of £12, on a farm called Llanola, in this parish, was bequeathed by a Mrs. Gwynne of that place, to be annually distributed among the poor of the parishes of Aberedwy, Llanvareth, and Llanbadarn y Garreg; and an unknown benefactor also gave £10 in money, producing ten shillings per annum, for the relief of decayed housekeepers of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £59. 6.

LLANBADRIG (LLAN-BADRIG), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Amlwch, containing 1364 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Patrick, who, being commissioned by Pope Celestine to preach the doctrines of Christianity to the Irish, is said to have been on his way thither detained for some time in Mona, the present Anglesey, and to have founded at this place, in the year 440, the first Christian church which was built in the island. The parish, which is situated on the shore of the Irish sea, is about seven miles in length: it is divided into two unequal parts, called Llanbadrig-Clegyrog and Llanbadrig-Cemmes, which, though distinct for other purposes, are united for the maintenance of their poor. The lands are generally enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil is productive. The substratum is limestone, and the great limestone formation which stretches from Flintshire through the county of Denbigh, and is continued under the bay of Beaumaris, terminates at the Middle Mouse, a small island about a mile from the main land of this parish, called also "Ynys Badrig," from the circumstance of its having been the place from which St. Patrick, on his departure from the island, embarked for Dublin. In this parish is a strong vein of ochre of various colours, and an extraordinarily fine white clay of the Cimolia kind: copper-ore has also been found here, but not in sufficient quantity to encourage adventurers to establish any works. At Cemmes is found blue-veined and white-veined grey marble, and also the hard primitive rock called serpentine. The small creek of Cemmes affords facility for landing coal and other commodities, and is highly advantageous for the shipping of marble and the other mineral produce of the adjoining parish of Llanvechell. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7. 8. 1½, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Patrick, is inconveniently situated on the shore, and so near to the sea that, during the prevalence of northerly or north-westerly winds, the waves break over it with such violence as to interrupt, and frequently to prevent, the performance of divine service; and even the funeral service has been unavoidably deferred for several days during the continuance of those winds, at which time the church is altogether inaccessible. The poor children of Llanbadrig are eligible to the school founded at Llanvechell by Mr. Wynne. Mr. Richard Gwyn, in 1723, bequeathed certain lands for the gratuitous instruction of poor children; and William Davies, in 1751, bequeathed £60 to the poor of this parish, the interest of which, together with some other small charitable donations and bequests, is annually distributed among them. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £364. 17.

LLANBEBLIG (LLAN-BEBLIG), a parish in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, containing, with the borough of Carnarvon, which is situated within its limits, 7642 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Peblie, or Publicus, who, according to the Welsh annalists, was the son of Maximus and his wife Helen, daughter of Eudaf, Duke of Cornwall, and who, assuming a religious habit, retired from the world and lived in seclusion at this place. The history of the parish is so connected with that of the borough of Carnarvon, that it has been necessarily anticipated in the account of that town. Richard II. bestowed the church of Llanbeblig, together with the chapel of Carnarvon, on the convent of St. Mary in Chester, in order to augment the endowment of that establishment. This parish is situated on the river Seiont, and is traversed by a rail-road leading from the slate quarries in the Vale of Nantlle to the quay at Carnarvon. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Carnarvon annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £12. 5. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chester: the vicarage is endowed with one-third of the great tithes, and the remaining two-thirds are appropriated to the see of Chester. The church, dedicated to St. Peblie, is a spacious and venerable cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture, but considerably modernized by successive repairs, and contains some ancient and interesting monuments, among which is the tomb of Sir William Gruffydd of Penrhyn, who died in 1587, and Margaret, daughter of John Wynn ab Meredydd, whose figures are represented lying on a mat, exquisitely sculptured in marble, the former in complete armour. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A very thin plate of gold, about four inches in length and one in breadth, supposed to be a Basilidian talisman of the second century, was discovered here within the last few years: it bears two inscriptions, the first of which is in Greek, and the second in astral, or magic, characters. The remains of the Roman station Segontium, and other important relics of antiquity contained in this parish, are described in the article on CARNARVON. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, including those of the town of Carnarvon, amounts to £1582. 18.

LLANBEDR (LLAN-BEDR), a parish in the hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N. E. by E.) from Crickhowel, containing 359 inhabitants. This parish, both in ancient writings and modern usage, is generally distinguished by the adjunct Ystradwy, or Ystrad-Iw, by which appellation the entire district now forming the hundred of Crickhowel was designated till the 27th of Henry VIII., when, upon the consolidation of the lordships marcher established in the ancient Brecheiniog into the present county of Brecknock, and the subsequent subdivision of that county into hundreds, the lordship of Crickhowel obtaining the pre-eminence, gave name to the hundred, and that of Ystradwy is retained only as an addition to the name of this single parish. The parish is watered by the two streams called respectively Greater and Lesser Grwny, which, descending from the mountains, after uniting within its limits, and flowing through the adjoining parish of Llangeney, fall into the river Usk a little below the small village of Glangrwny, where it is crossed by a bridge on the road from Crickhowel to Abergavenny. An act of parliament was obtained, many years ago, for making a turnpike road from Crickhowel to Hereford, through the parish of Llanbedr; but it was so imperfectly drawn up, and its provisions were found so burdensome, that, upon a subsequent application to parliament for its renewal, it was thrown out, and the road is now only parochial. The village is situated in a vale, or glen, abounding with picturesque scenery, of which the leading feature is an exceeding softness and simplicity of character. Embosomed by surrounding mountains, of which Cadair Arthur, or "Great Arthur's Chair," and the Sugar Loaf hill, are the principal, it is seldom visited by tourists. The steepest banks of the Lesser Grwny are richly clothed with wood from the very margin of the stream to the horizon; and the hills, though of considerable elevation, are smooth and grassy, affording excellent pasturage for sheep and young cattle, which in numerous flocks and herds are seen grazing along their sides and summits. The only family residence of any importance in this parish is Moor Park, the seat of John Powell, Esq., whose father built the mansion, which is quite unique in its style of architecture.

The living is a rectory, with Partrishew annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £16. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a very ancient structure, consisting of two aisles and a chancel, with a square embattled tower at the western end. The consecration of a church at "Llanbedr in Ystradwy" by Herewald, Bishop of Llandaf, who governed that see from 1056 to 1103, is recorded in the old register of Llandaf; and the tower, which is of grey stone, and evidently much older than any other part of the church, may probably be a part of that ancient structure: the aisles are separated from each other by a range of pointed arches; the north aisle, which appears to be the more ancient, has the remains of the old timber frame roof; and the south aisle, which appears to have been added at a later period, having been built probably about the reign of Edward IV., or perhaps so late as that of Henry VII., has a vaulted roof of timber: they have both been ceiled, and the church was newly paved and pewed in 1831. It occupies a pleasant site on the brow of an acclivity rising abruptly from the margin of the Grwny Vechan, or Lesser Grwny river; and the churchyard is ornamented with some fine old yew trees, which are perhaps coeval with the tower of the church. There is no parsonage-house. Mrs. Mary Herbert, widow of the late Rev. John Herbert, rector of this parish, in 1728, bequeathed a tenement called Hên-bant-Vâch, partly for the education of poor girls, and partly for the relief of poor persons not receiving parochial assistance, two-thirds of the produce of which she appropriated to this parish, and the remainder to that of Partrishew: the estate is now let at the yearly rent of £26; the girls are instructed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and are taught plain needlework, but there is no school-house in connexion with the charity. Mr. Howell Harry, in 1727, bequeathed a sum of money, of which the interest, amounting to £2. 10. per annum, is annually distributed among the poor not receiving parochial relief, according to the will of the testator. Dr. Francis Godwin, son of Thomas Godwin, Bishop of Bath and Wells, was rector of this parish for several years: in 1660 he published his well-known work called "De Præsulibus Angliæ Commentarius," which so much recommended him to the notice of Queen Elizabeth that she promoted him to the see of Llandaf, with which he held this rectory in commendam, but resigned it upon his translation to the see of Hereford, in 1617: he was author of several other works, and died in 1633. The late Rev. Henry Thomas Payne, A.M., archdeacon of Carmarthen, a native of the neighbouring parish of Llangattock, was also rector of this parish for upwards of thirty years: he died on Easter-Sunday of the present year (1832), and was interred in a vault in the churchyard of this parish, where the remains of his lamented wife had previously been deposited, in April 1828: under a neat pointed arch, supported by a triple clustered column, is an inscription with a few poetical lines to the memory of this lady, by the deceased divine, who simply directed his own name, age, and day of decease to be added. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £57.

LLANBEDR (LLAN-BEDR-Y-CENNIN), a parish in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. N. W.) from Llanrwst, on the road to Aberconway, comprising the township of Arddr, which maintains its own poor under a recent arrangement, and containing 476½ inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Conway, which forms its eastern boundary, and in a mountainous district overlooking the fertile Vale of Llanrwst, and abounding with richly varied, and in some parts with picturesque, scenery. Copper-ore, pyrites, and blende, have been found in small quantities, and mines of these are now being worked, but upon a very limited scale. The river Conway affords every facility of conveyance for the produce of the mines, and every opportunity of intercourse with the neighbouring districts. A fair is held on October 3rd and 4th. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6. 19. 4½., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, from which circumstance the parish derives its name, is a small but neat edifice, pleasantly situated on an eminence, and comprises a nave, chancel, and south transept or chapel. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The amount of several charitable donations and bequests by various benefactors has been invested in the purchase of land producing a rental of £64. 19., which is annually distributed among the poor in money and clothing during the winter. On the summit of a lofty hill, one mile east-south-east of the church, is Pen y Gaer, a British camp of great strength, comprehending a spacious area defended by ramparts of stones: the foundations of several circular buildings lie scattered about it, and the fosses by which it was surrounded are still visible: in the immediate neighbourhood of this camp are numerous upright stones, perhaps, as Camden observes, placed there to serve as chevaux de frise to defend the approaches to the camp. At Tal y Cavn, an isolated township of this parish, entirely surrounded by portions of that of Caerhên, is an important ferry across the Conway, communicating with Eglwys-Bâch, in Denbighshire, and the only one between the bridges of Llanrwst and Aberconway. Near the approach to this ferry is a small artificial mound of earth, on which once stood a castle, or tower, to protect the passage of the river, but not a vestige of this building can now be seen. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £232. 5.

LLANBEDR (LLAN-BEDR-DYFRYN-CLWYD), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. E.) from Ruthin, on the road to Chester, containing 527 inhabitants. This parish is about three miles in length, and two in breadth: its surface is partly hilly and partly flat, but no part of it is subject to inundation: the soil of the higher grounds is light and sandy, but of the lower more loamy. The village occupies a pleasant situation; and the environs, in which are some handsome seats, partake of the scenery which characterizes the beautiful Vale of Clwyd: the seats are, the elegant mansion of Llanbedr Hall, the residence of Joseph Ablett, Esq., romantically situated at the foot of the hills; and Berth, the seat of Edward Lloyd, Esq. Many attempts have been made, and considerable sums of money expended, in the expectation of finding coal in this parish, but they have been unavailing; the miners having mistakenly regarded the bituminous siliceous shale, with which the soil abounds, as indicative of coal, in the fruitless search for which small portions of manganese have been found, but so much mixed with pyrites of iron as to be of little value. The living is a rectory, rated in the king's books at £13. 1. 8., and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, a small neat edifice in the later style of English architecture, is delightfully situated on a gentle eminence within the park of Llanbedr, and forms a pleasing and picturesque object, as seen through the embowering woods by which it is surrounded. There is a place of worship in the parish for Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school is supported by subscription, in which thirty-six children receive gratuitous instruction. The interest of several charitable bequests, amounting in the aggregate to £765, is annually distributed among the poor at Christmas. On the summit of Moel Venlli, one of the Clwydian mountains, which is one thousand seven hundred and twenty-two feet in height, is an extensive British camp, comprising an area of sixty-three acres, surrounded by a double vallum and intrenchment, and additionally defended on the eastern or English side by a triple fosse: the ascent to this station, which is so strongly guarded on every side as anciently to have rendered it impregnable, is by a circuitous path round the western side of the mountain: a portion of the inner gate is still remaining. This fortified camp appears to have been occupied by the Romans after their conquest of this part of the principality: several military weapons used by that people have been discovered at various times; and, in 1816, more than one thousand five hundred Roman coins, principally denarii, were found nearly in the centre of the camp, of which several are preserved at Llanbedr Hall. Moel Gaer, a small hill under Moel Venlli, is also strongly fortified with a single dyke, which entirely surrounds its summit: this appears to have been an outwork to the camp or principal station of Venlli. Immediately above Moel Gaer is Moel Vamma, another of the Clwydian mountains, and the loftiest in that magnificent chain: it is one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two feet in height, and on its summit the gentlemen of Denbighshire and Flintshire have erected, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III., a lofty structure of stone, consisting of a square central tower six yards in length on each side, and thirty-nine feet high, flanked at each angle with a square tower of the same dimensions and elevation: from the central tower, and resting partly on the angular towers, rises a square tower of larger dimensions, to the height of forty feet, surmounted by an obelisk thirty-six feet high. The base of this structure, commonly called the Jubilee Column, occupies an area eighteen yards square: the angular towers are solid, but the central tower on the basement is perforated with an arch, and it was intended to construct a staircase leading from this archway to the larger tower above. The building is one hundred and fifteen feet in height, and, from its commanding situation, is a prominent and very imposing object in the views from all the high grounds in the neighbouring counties: it is seen from Chester, Liverpool, and other distant places, and forms a conspicuous landmark for vessels navigating the Irish sea. The side of the mountain towards Flintshire is remarkable for its volcanic appearance. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £365. 5.

LLANBEDR (LLAN-BEDR), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. S. E.) from Harlech, on the road to Barmouth, containing 403 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Artro, which has its source near Cwm Bychan, a spot remarkable for the wildness and sublimity of its scenery, and for the stately magnificence of the rocks and precipices by which it is encircled. At the mouth of this river, according to some accounts, was anciently situated a weir, granted by Gwyddno Garanir, a petty prince of Cantre'r Gwaelod, to his son Elphin, by whom was discovered, in a coracle hanging from one of the poles of the weir, the infant Taliesin, who afterwards became the celebrated British bard of that name, and who had been exposed in that situation soon after his birth. Elphin, taking compassion on the infant, had him carefully brought up and properly educated; and among the compositions of the bard is an ode to his preserver, of which an elegant translation was published in 1780. The approach to Cwm Bychan is through a richly wooded glen watered by the river Artro: the view in ascending this picturesque vale comprehends a rock of conical form, embosomed in a beautiful grove, beyond which rises in majestic elevation a series of rugged and sterile mountains, which form the back ground. After passing through the woods, and ascending Dinas Porchellyn, the view expands into a wider field, of which the horizon is bounded by rude masses of barren rocks and lofty mountains. The sterility of these crags is relieved by some stately oaks, which have taken deep root in the fissures, and of which some are from eight to nine feet in girth. Near these is a rapid torrent, beyond which the view embraces a small mill of romantic appearance, and an ancient arch flung from rock to rock over the river, of which the water is darkened by the foliage of trees. At a little distance beyond this point, after following a winding and nearly precipitous ascent formed in the rocks, Cwm Bychan appears in sight, deeply embosomed in rocks of magnificent grandeur, and enlivened with the waters of its beautiful lake, above which is the sequestered house of the Lloyds, whose ancestors have been possessors of these wilds since the year 1100, and of whom David Llwyd, a celebrated warrior, and a firm adherent of the Earl of Richmond, was present at the battle of Bosworth Field. At no great distance is the fortified pass called Drws Ardudwy, which is described in the article on Llanddwywau, and which, as well as this place, was most probably occupied by the sons of Cadwgan, in their contests with the sons of Uchtryd ab Edwyn, whom they succeeded in expelling from the country. Among the mountains which surround Cwm Bychan is Carreg y Saeth, on the summit of which are a maen hîr and a carnedd. The parish is extensive, being seven miles in length and four in breadth, and having a mountainous and, in some parts, uncultivated surface. An act of parliament was obtained, in 1810, for enclosing the waste lands in this and the adjoining parish, under the provisions of which nine hundred and forty acres were enclosed within the limits of the former. The manufacture of flannel is carried on upon a moderate scale; and in the parish is found manganese, the procuring of which also affords employment to a portion of the inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llandanwg, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is an ancient structure. According to an absurd local tradition it was originally intended to erect it at a place about forty yards to the right of the road, where there are four or five broad stones, eight feet high, standing upright; but the workmen found that what they executed by day was removed at night, and therefore commenced the building on its present site. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, was founded by Mrs. Mary Parry, of Ruabon, in the county of Denbigh, daughter of the late Rev. J. Hughes, rector of this parish, who, in 1817, bequeathed £1000 for its support. Mr. Theodore Roberts left £20, and there are some smaller charitable donations and bequests, the interest of which is annually distributed among the poor. In one of the rocks here several Roman coins are said to have been found. Maes y Garnedd, in this parish, was the birthplace of the regicide Colonel Jones. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £102. 10.

LLANBEDR-GÔCH (LLAN-BEDR-GÔCH), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (W. N. W.) from Beaumaris, containing 437 inhabitants. In old writings this place is called Llanbedr Mathavarn Eithav: it is advantageously situated on the Irish sea, which constitutes its northern boundary, and forms within the parish a safe and commodious bay, or harbour, called Traeth Gôch, or Red Wharf bay, in which large sloops may ride in perfect security during the severest gales. The lands, with the exception only of such as are appropriated to mining purposes, are enclosed and cultivated, and the soil is generally fertile. The parish abounds with limestone of very superior quality, of which quarries are worked upon a large scale, affording constant employment to more than two hundred men, exclusively of a considerable number employed in conveying it to its several places of destination. From these quarries, of which the principal is Castell Mawr, conveniently situated near Red Wharf bay, many thousand tons of limestone are annually procured and shipped at that small port for various parts of England, Wales, and Ireland. Marble is also found in the parish, and several good slabs of black and grey marble have been raised; but, though susceptible of a high polish, it has not been found to retain it for any length of time, and consequently is not in very great request. Considerable improvements have been made in the port of Traeth Gôch, under the auspices of the Anglesey Railway Company, who, in the 52nd of George III., obtained an act of parliament, enabling them to raise certain sums, in shares of £150 each, for making and maintaining a railway from Penrhyn-Mawr, in the parish of Llanvihangel-Ysceiviog, to Red Wharf in this parish, and for making a dock and other necessary works for the convenience of shipping coal and other produce from that district. This railway, which is seven miles in length, and rises and falls in its course from fourteen to thirty-eight feet above and below the level of high water, commences at the Penrhyn-Mawr coal-works, and pursues a north-easterly course, crossing the road between Holyhead and Bangor, to Red Wharf bay, where it has a branch which is continued for a short distance northward, in a direction parallel with the shore. The expense of carrying this useful undertaking into execution was estimated at £9802. 8. 2., for defraying which the Earl of Uxbridge and another landed proprietor in the neighbourhood subscribed each £5000. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanddvyman, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a small but beautiful cruciform structure, with a handsome east window, situated on a rocky eminence in a distant and exposed part of the parish. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school has been erected, which is supported by subscription, and in which seventy-six children of the parishes of Llanbedr-Gôch, Llanddvyman, Llanvair-Mathavarneithav, and Pentraeth, receive gratuitous instruction. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £154. 6.

LLANBEDR - PAINSCASTLE (LLAN - BEDR - PAIN'S-CASTLE), a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by W.) from Hay, containing 356 inhabitants. This parish derives the distinguishing adjunct to its name from a fortress called Pain's Castle, anciently situated within its limits, and said to have been built by a Norman baron named De Paine, who obtained possession of the hundred of Lower Elvael about the time that Bernard Newmarch wrested the principality of Brycheiniog from Bleddyn ab Maenarch, whom he defeated and slew. It occupied the summit of a steep eminence, on which a strong rampart or military station had previously been constructed by the Welsh, called Caer yn Elvael, which name was, on the erection of the castle, changed for Pain's Castle, or Elvael Castle. A village was also built by De Paine at the foot of the eminence on which the castle stood, which was inhabited by the dependants and vassals of the feudal baron, and which subsequently rose into considerable importance, and received the grant of a market. On the death of De Paine, this castle, which, on account of its importance, had given name to the hundred, passed, with the territories belonging to it, to the Mortimers, and from them to William De Breos, or De Bruce. About the end of the twelfth century it was taken from this powerful Norman baron by Rhys ab Gruffydd, soon after his capture of Radnor castle. Of this strong fortress there are now no remains, except the moat which surrounded the site; and the town of Paincastle, participating in its fate, has dwindled into an insignificant village. The parish, comprising about four thousand acres, is separated from that of Llanddewi-Vâch by the small river Bachwy, which falls into the Wye above Boughrood, nearly opposite to the influx of the Clettwr, on the Brecknockshire side. It contains a fine sheet of water, about a mile in circumference, called Boughlyn Pool. The lands are in some parts hilly, in others flat, but no where subject to inundation; and the soil, though gravelly, is by no means unfertile. Fairs for horses, sheep, and horned cattle, are held annually on May 12th, September 22nd, and December 15th, in the township of Paincastle, the market at which, however, has been for some time discontinued: the petty sessions for the hundred are occasionally held here. This parish, with that of Boughrood, constitutes the prebend of Llanbedr-Paincastle, or Boughrood, in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at only 13s. 4d., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary: about fifty acres of glebe land belonging to it are situated in the adjacent parish of Llandeilo-Graban. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, from which circumstance the name of the place is derived, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, but presenting no remarkable architectural features. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £258. 9.

LLANBEDROG (LLAN-BEDROG), a parish in the hundred of GAFLOGION, Lleyn division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S.W.) from Pwllheli, containing 459 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the north-western shore of Cardigan bay, near St. Tudwal's Roads in St. George's channel. It has the advantage of a small but secure bay, affording good anchorage for vessels, and maintains a direct communication with Carnarvon, South Wales, Liverpool, and Dublin. The village, which is small, is pleasantly situated in a beautifully picturesque valley, embosomed in mountains, on one of which, partly in the adjoining parish of Llangian, was a well called Fynnon Dduw, or "God's Well," about three yards square, enclosed with a wall from four to five feet high, the waters of which were formerly much esteemed for their efficacy in rheumatic complaints; and adjoining to it was another, about one yard square, from which the invalids used to drink the water. Around this well it was customary for the people of the neighbouring country to assemble for the celebration of rustic sports, but it has now for many years been neglected. Wern-Vawr, the only seat of any importance in this parish, is a spacious and ancient mansion, the property of Colonel Wardle. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Llanvihangel-Bâchelleth and Llangian annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £25. 11. 5½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Pedroc, son of Clement Prince of Cornwall, by whom it is supposed to have been founded in the seventh century, is a small but neat edifice, and was thoroughly repaired in 1827, at an expense of £130: in some of the windows are fragments of ancient stained glass. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £199.

LLANBERIS (LLAN-BERIS), a parish in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 9½ miles (E.S.E.) from Carnarvon, on the road to Capel-Curig, containing 725 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Peris, a British, or, according to some accounts, a Roman saint, who is said to have been a cardinal of Rome, and to have resided in this sequestered spot with Padarn, an anchorite who had a cell, or small chapel, in a meadow between the site of Dôlbadarn castle and that of the present Dôlbadarn Inn. Dr. Pughe, in his well-known Cambrian Biography, states that St. Peris was a native of Wales, and calls him the son of Helig ab Glanog, and also says that he was both a saint and a cardinal, and lived about the sixth century. In this parish is situated Dôlbadarn castle, anciently the principal defence of this part of Wales. It is supposed to be one of the oldest mural fortresses in the principality, and to have been originally founded by Padarn Beisrydd, son of Idwal, to defend the passage through the Snowdonian mountains. This castle appears also to have been used as a state prison; Owain Gôch, brother of Llewelyn, the last native prince of Wales, who had conspired with his brother Davydd to dethrone this prince, having been confined in it for more than twenty-three years. It is supposed to be the fortress anciently called the "castle of Bere," which was provided by Davydd ab Gruffydd, after the unfortunate death of his brother Llewelyn, with a strong garrison for its defence against the English forces, commanded by Edward I. in person; and which is described by historians as being situated in Snowdon, in a morass, through which a single causeway formed the only access to it, and which could be approached only through narrow and rugged defiles. But so sunk in despair were the Welsh by the death of their late prince, that even this castle was surrendered to the king, after it had been for some time closely invested; the weak defence of its garrison being the last opposition made to the victorious Edward in his conquest of Wales.

The parish, which is of very great extent, is situated in the heart of a wildly romantic district, comprehending several of the loftiest mountains in the principality, and abounding with mineral treasures, and with scenery of the boldest character. Among the mountains of this district, and within the parish, are the Elidyr, the Gluders, Moel Eilio, Carnedd Igyn, and, towering above all, the gigantic Snowdon, of which, however, only one-half is within this parish. Moel Eilio is two thousand three hundred and seventy-seven feet in height; Carnedd Igyn, so called from a carnedd of loose stones placed on its summit by a person of that name, rises to a height of two thousand nine hundred and seventy-five feet above the level of the sea; and the highest summit of Snowdon has an elevation of three thousand five hundred and seventy-one feet above the same level. The village, which consists only of three or four houses and a spacious and comfortable inn, called the Dôlbadarn Inn, for the accommodation of the visitors who in the summer season resort to this place, in their excursions to Snowdon, is beautifully situated on the river Seiont, which flows into the lake of Llŷn Peris, a little below the church, and, after traversing both this and the lower lake, falls into the Menai below the ancient Segontium, at the present town of Carnarvon. Through it is brought the new and important line of road from Carnarvon, through the romantic pass and valley of Dyfryn Membyr, to join the great Irish road at Capel-Curig. The narrow Vale of Llanberis, extending five miles in length, and bounded on each side by lofty mountains, whose summits are commonly enveloped in clouds, comprehends a rich variety of picturesque and romantic scenery, and contains within its narrow limits a striking combination of features unrivalled in grandeur and sublimity. Though obscured by the over-shadowing mountains which form its boundaries on either side, it abounds with luxuriant meadows affording rich pasturage, and comprises a small proportion of arable land, adapted to the cultivation of oats, which is the only grain raised in the parish. It is intersected by the new line of road above-mentioned, and its surface is agreeably diversified by the two beautiful lakes of Llŷn Peris and Llŷn Padarn: the former, which is called the upper lake, is one mile in length and about a quarter of a mile broad, and, though by much the smaller of the two, is greatly superior in the beauty of its form and the scenery which immediately surrounds it: the latter, which is called the lower lake, in Welsh Llŷn Isâv, is nearly three miles in length, and about half a mile broad, and is separated from the former by a narrow isthmus two hundred yards in breadth. On the summit of a high rock rising from the isthmus and overlooking Llŷn Peris, are the remains of Dôlbadarn castle, consisting of some portions of walls, and one solitary tower, and forming a prominent and interesting feature in the scenery of the vale. About a quarter of a mile south-east of the Dôlbadarn Inn, and not far from the public road, is the noble cataract called Ceunant Mawr, formed by an impetuous mountain torrent precipitated with violence over two vast masses of rock, and falling into two tremendous chasms beneath. Within this parish, besides Llŷn Peris and Llŷn Padarn, already noticed, are four other lakes, viz., Llŷn y Cwm, Llŷn-Cwm-Dwythwch, Llŷn Dû yr Arddu, and Llŷn-Cwm-Fynnon, which, however, are of much smaller size, and some of them are situated high up the sides of the mountains. In Fynnon Vrêch, a smaller pool, about a mile east of the village, in the hollow of Cwm Glâs, is found, as in Llŷn y Cwm, a great variety of aquatic plants, among which are the Lobelia Dort- manna, Subularia Aquatica, Isoetis-Lacustris, and Juncus-Triglumis: the Hieracium Alpinum, Rubus Saxatilis, Solidago Cambrica, and other rare plants, are also to be found in this alpine region, which is a favourite resort of botanists. Llŷn-Cwm-Dwythwch abounds with trout of very superior quality, resembling salmon both in colour and flavour.

Since the opening of the new line of road from Carnarvon to Capel-Curig, Llanberis has become the principal resort of parties visiting Snowdon, to which mountain the ascent is easier from this village than from any other place in the district, and may be accomplished on horseback, almost to the summit. For this purpose, guides are constantly in attendance during the summer season; and ponies may be obtained, which are accustomed to these arduous and precipitous roads, on which they travel with perfect ease and security. In addition to the spacious and comfortable inn of Dôlbadarn, a new and more capacious house of entertainment is now being erected in a more splendid style, for the accommodation of the increased number of visitors whom the new line of road has induced to select this as the principal place from which to make their mountainous excursions, and commence their ascent to Snowdon. The approach to this mountain from the pass of Llanberis is singularly striking: its higher summits become gradually concealed by intervening heights, consisting of lofty and rugged masses of rock, which, like secondary mountains, rise from its base, forming a grand series of natural outworks and majestic barriers, to defend its steep acclivities, and of precipitous ridges of sharp pointed rocks, opposing a succession of formidable ramparts to guard the ascent to its summit. By these the mountain is concealed from the view of persons approaching it, till, on their arrival at Bwlch yr Eisteddva, it bursts at once upon the sight, in all the fulness of overwhelming grandeur. Just above this point is the Gorphwysva, or "resting-place," at the extremity of the pass, which is the highest ascent on the new line of road, and from it is seen the pass of Llanberis beneath, called Bwlch y Gwyddil. On the left is Crib Côch, "the red ridge," or third summit of Snowdon, beyond which appears part of the second summit, called Crib y Distyll: on the same side, but lower down, is a succession of rocks of inferior height, forming the grand western buttress by which the mountain appears to be supported; and below these are seen the two lakes of Llanberis, and the tower of Dôlbadarn castle, occupying the rocky summit of the narrow isthmus by which they are divided. On the right are the precipitous acclivities of Gluder-Vawr, skirted in many places with vast ranges of columnar rocks of basaltic formation, thrown together in the greatest confusion, and some having a slight degree of curvature: one cluster of these basaltic columns is detached from the rest, and occupies an isolated part of the mountain, in which it maintains a perfectly upright position. The lower ground in this pass is thickly strewn with vast fragments of rock, of various forms and sizes, which add materially to the grandeur of the scene: some of them are sixty feet in length, and of proportionate bulk, and the great number of huge masses which lie scattered in all directions, and in the wildest irregularity and disorder, give a high degree of beauty to the view, by their forcible display of light and shade. From this point, no higher ground intervening between Snowdon and the Menai, the view in that direction is perfectly open, and the Isle of Anglesey becomes conspicuous in the horizon. At a small distance along this path, which winds under some very lofty and awfully impending rocks, the whole of Crib Côch appears in view: its summit, which seems to be almost inaccessible, is covered with the Festuca Vivipara, a viviparous alpine grass, which bears clusters of seedlings on very slender stems, and which, waving in the wind, apparently without any support, gives a singular appearance to the rocks, which seem to be in motion.

The highest summit of Snowdon is called yr Wyddva, or "the conspicuous," and rises almost to a point, affording space only for a small enclosure of loose stones, where the traveller may take refreshment, while resting from the toil of his arduous ascent, and within which a pole, consisting of four thick planks inserted in a mound of stone, was erected by order of Government, in the year 1827. From this point Snowdon appears to be supported by four distinct and immense piles of rocks, forming vast buttresses, with four tremendous chasms between them, in all of which, except one, are lakes to which various names have been given from the apparent colour of their waters: of these, the most conspicuous from this point is Fynnon Lâs, or "the green well." Beyond is a continued succession of chasms, of which the sides are nearly perpendicular, forming one of the most magnificent amphitheatres in nature. On Gluder-Vawr is a quarry, from which are dug hones of a very superior quality, great quantities being annually sent to London. This mountain is noted for rare plants, among which are the Saxifraga Nivalis, the Bulbocodium of Ray, or the Anthericum Serotinum of later botanists, and the Lichen Islandicus. The view from this mountain is truly sublime, comprehending the most extensive and magnificent range of mountain scenery perhaps to be found in the island. On the right of Cwm Idwal, noted for the murder of a young prince of that name, son of Owain Gwynedd, by Dunawt, son of Nevydd Hardd, to whom his father had entrusted him to be brought up according to the custom of the country, is a vast split rock, called Twll-Dû, or "the Devil's Kitchen:" the fissure forms a frightful chasm, about one hundred and fifty yards in length, one hundred in depth, and only six in width; and opening perpendicularly to the mountain, the waters of the lake of Llŷn y Cwm are seen rushing through it with impetuosity. Fossils and minerals of various descriptions are found in abundance in this mountainous tract: among these the most valuable are the beautiful Snowdon crystals, transparent as the diamond; and on Glydr-Vawr are found some of brilliant colours, like the ruby and the amethyst: they are a species of the marcasite, and in the latter mountain there are evident indications of a large deposit of copper-ore. These mountains scarcely produce any grain, but they afford good pasturage in some parts for cattle and sheep during the summer. Goats, of which large flocks were formerly kept upon them for the purposes of the dairy, and for the sake of their long hair, which was manufactured into wigs, are now seldom seen. Foxes are found here in considerable numbers, and in the time of Leland there were large herds of wild red deer. The royal forest of Snowdon, erected by Edward I., on his entire subjugation of the Welsh, was, in the reign of Elizabeth, under the superintendence of Dudley, Earl of Leicester, who was appointed chief ranger, and who endeavoured to extend its boundaries, which were very indefinitely marked, into the counties of Anglesey and Merioneth, in which he was prevented solely by the firmness and perseverance of Sir Richard Bulkeley: it was finally disafforested about the year 1624, in the latter part of the reign of James I., to the great satisfaction of the neighbouring farmers, whose crops suffered greatly from the deer, and to that of the inhabitants of this part of the principality, who were grievously oppressed by the vexatious laws which were enacted for its government.

Copper-ore abounds in the parish, and two copper-mines are at present worked in it: the principal of these is situated on the southern margin of the upper lake, near its higher extremity, and the other in Clogwyn Côch, or "the red rock," about half-way up Snowdon, at the upper extremity of the hollow called Waŷn Cwm Brwynog, and near the small lake Llŷn Dû yr Arddu. The former of these mines, commonly called Llŷn Peris mine, has been regularly worked for nearly a century, and the original vein of ore may be considered as almost exhausted: attached to it is a stamping-mill for pulverizing the fragments of rock in which the ore is imbedded, preparatory to its being separated by washing: the ore is sent down the lakes in boats, and conveyed by land from their lower extremity to Carnarvon, where it is shipped coastwise. The mine at Clogwyn Côch is comparatively of modern date, having been worked only for a few years. The ore of these mines is a sulphate, and is found in a matrix of quartz, imbedded in hard rocks of whinstone and hornstone schistus. Llanberis has also extensive quarries of slate, of a beautiful light blue colour, which is very much esteemed, and is in great demand for various purposes: these quarries were formerly worked only on a very limited scale, but in 1824 they were very much enlarged, and several new ones opened, and at present they afford employment to more than three hundred men. The quantity of slates quarried in them, and in those of the adjoining parish of Llandeiniolen, exceeds twenty thousand tons annually, upon the average, and are of all the various sizes described in the article on the county of CARNARVON. The produce of the mines is conveyed to the small port of Dinorwic, by means of a rail-road, constructed in 1824, from the mines in this parish to that place, a distance of seven miles, at the expense of the mining companies; and by means of this, and also of the sledge road to the copper mines, the heights of Snowdon, have been rendered more easily accessible than they formerly were. Fairs are held on September 18th and 27th.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 9., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Peris, and situated in a deeply sequestered glen, about a quarter of a mile above Llŷn Peris, is a small, low, cruciform structure, principally in the later style of English architecture, with some portions of a much earlier date, probably of the seventh century, which are parts of the original edifice: the more modern part is supposed to have been erected in the reign of Henry VI.: the whole forms a neat and venerable structure, in perfect harmony with the retirement of its situation and the picturesque scenery by which it is surrounded: two small chapels open into the chancel, one on each side, in each of which and also in the chancel is a good east window. In Nant Isâv, or the "lower vale," there is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. There are no charitable institutions in the parish: a farm called Tŷ Dû, which was bequeathed by Dean Goodman as part of the endowment of Christ's Hospital, at Ruthin, is situated here; and a slate quarry has recently been opened upon it, which promises a very considerable addition to the funds of that useful establishment. Remains of camps and other defensive works are numerous in the mountainous region of Snowdon, and vestiges of several are seen within the limits of the parish. In Cwm Glâs is a cromlech. Near the church is the well of St. Peris, enclosed with a wall, formerly famed for its miraculous efficacy in the cure of diseases, and which, in Mr. Pennant's time, was still celebrated for the divinations of a sybil, according to the appearance or non-appearance of a fish lurking in some of its holes. Moel y Cynghorion, or "the Hill of Council," on the southern confines of this parish, is supposed to derive its name from a council held upon it by the Welsh chieftains, when about to surrender to the victorious Edward. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £152. 11.

LLANBEULAN (LLAN-BEULAN), a parish partly in the hundred of LLYVON, partly in that of MALLTRAETH, and partly in that of TŴRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Llangewni, containing 375 inhabitants. The living is a rectory, to which are annexed the perpetual curacies of Ceirchiog, Llanerchymedd, Llanvaelog, Llêchylched, and Tal y Llŷn, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £22. 3. 11½., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Peulan, who lived in the beginning of the sixth century, was originally founded in 630: the present edifice is a small cruciform structure, situated in a little barren valley, near the new line of road to Holyhead, and the south transept bears evidence of very great antiquity: it has some windows in the later English style, of good design, especially the east window of the chancel, which is a very superior composition. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. David Jones, in 1726, bequeathed £10, the interest arising from which he directed to be annually given to two of the oldest inhabitants of the parish, who should be considered as deserving objects of charity. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £197. 13.

LLANBISTER, a parish in the hundred of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (W.) from Knighton, containing 1508 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Ithon, and extends nearly fifteen miles in length, with an average breadth of two miles. The surface is in some parts almost mountainous, and the surrounding scenery is in general of a pleasing character. From the higher grounds are some fine and extensive prospects; and the village, as it is approached from the south-west, assumes, from its situation on a gradual ascent, with timber of luxuriant growth in the back ground, a beautifully picturesque appearance. The lands are partially enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the inhabitants are generally employed in agriculture. The turnpike road from BUILT in Brecknockshire to Newtown, in the county of Montgomery, passes through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 11. 5½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Kynlog, is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, well pewed and paved, with a tower, which, according to tradition, having been partly destroyed by lightning, about a century ago, is now reduced to one-half of its original elevation. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A Sunday school, which is supported by subscription, is held occasionally for the gratuitous instruction of poor children; and a small charitable bequest of £2 per annum, secured upon an estate called the Vron, in this parish, is annually distributed, according to the will of the donor, among the poor of this and the adjacent parishes of Llanano, Llanbadarn-Vynydd, Llandewi-Ystradenny, and Abbey Cwm Hîr. Within the parish are several mineral springs: the water of two or three of these is black and strongly impregnated with sulphur, and is considered efficacious in the cure of cutaneous diseases. The others, which are disregarded for medicinal uses, are of a reddish copper colour, and if copper be immersed in them, it will, in the course of an hour or two, become of a whitish colour, while silver, in like manner, will be made yellow. A red and a black spring rise within ten yards of each other, in the same meadow; and near the church is a celebrated spring, called "Pistyll Gynllo." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £495. 5.

LLANBLETHIAN (LLAN-BLEIDDIAN), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, adjoining the town of Cowbridge, and containing 670 inhabitants. After the defeat of Iestyn ab Gwrgan, the last native Prince of Glamorgan, this part of his dominions was given by Fitz-Hamon, the Norman victor, to Sir Robert St. Quentin, who erected the castle of Llanblethian, or St. Quentin: the castle and manor subsequently formed part of the dower of the widow of Hugh Spencer, the younger, on her marriage with Guy de Brien. The parish, which is pleasantly situated on limestone substrata, is intersected by the river Thaw, which falls into the Bristol channel at the distance of six miles, where it forms the small port of Aberthaw, celebrated for the superior quality of its lime. The lands, which are in general fertile, are, with a small exception, enclosed and in a state of excellent cultivation. The village is enlivened by several elegant cottages, the residences of highly respectable families; and the dwellings of the poor have an unusual appearance of neatness and comfort. The scenery immediately around it is of varied and pleasing character, and the ancient bridge over the river Thaw, which flows through it, adds greatly to the picturesque effect of the scene. To the north-east of the village, on the summit of a hill round the foot of which the river flows, are the remains of the ancient castle of St. Quentin: they consist principally of mouldering ruins, of which the only entire feature is a gateway mantled with ivy, and sheltered from the violence of the winds by a few trees: the Marquis of Bute now holds the constabulary of this castle, together with the lordship of the borough of Cowbridge: the estate is the property of John Thomas, Esq., of Caer-Cady House, near Cowbridge. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Cowbridge annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £10. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. The church, dedicated to St. Bleddian, the Welsh name for Lupus, who accompanied Germanus in his mission to Britain, to suppress the Pelagian heresy, is a conspicuous object in the surrounding scenery, being situated on the brow of an abrupt eminence. There are several places of worship for dissenters. Sir Leoline Jenkins bequeathed £20 for clothing poor aged persons every fourth year: various other benefactions have been invested in the purchase of land, the produce of which, with other small bequests in money, amounting in the aggregate to £4. 3. per annum, is distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £329. 12.

LLANBOIDY (LLAN - BOIDY), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by W.) from St. Clear's. comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, and containing 1820 inhabitants, of which number, 1123 are in the Upper, and 697 in the Lower, division. This parish, situated on the turnpike road leading from Narberth to Newcastle-Emlyn, extends nearly seven miles from north to south, and three in a transverse direction. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, is pleasingly varied; and from the higher grounds are obtained some extensive and interesting views. Among the gentlemen's seats in the neighbourhood, Maes Gwynne, the elegant modern mansion of Walter R. H. Powell, Esq., is the most conspicuous for the style of its architecture. The parish contains iron-ore, which is found in considerable quantity; and the springs in various parts of it are strongly impregnated with that mineral. A fair is held annually in the village on September 18th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. In the hamlet of Ruggin, in this parish, is a chapel dedicated to St. David, called Eglwys-Vair-Lan-Tâf, pleasantly situated on the banks of the Tâf, and on the border of Pembrokeshire. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Frederick Bludworth, Esq., who is impropiator of eleven-fourteenths of the tithes of the hamlet, of which the remainder belongs to the incumbent. There is a place of worship for Independents. A National school, in connexion with the parent society in London, is supported by subscription, for the gratuitous instruction of the poor. Richard Lewis, in 1715, bequeathed £50 for the instruction of four poor boys; and the Rev. Walter Rice Howell, of Maes Gwynne, bequeathed £20 for the erection of almshouses in the parish. At Bronyskawen, in this parish, there are some faint remains of a spacious camp, near the entrance of which, according to Camden, were found, by some boys, two leaden boxes rudely formed, and each perforated with a hole nearly one inch in diameter, containing two hundred silver coins of the Roman Empire, some of which were the most ancient ever found in the island: of thirty, which were shewn to Mr. Llwyd, the celebrated Welsh antiquary, the latest was one of Domitian in his fifteenth Consulate, A. D. 91. At one extremity of the parish, in the grounds belonging to Dôl-Wilym, is a perfect cromlech, of which the table stone, supported on four perpendicular stones, is about ten yards in circumference and one yard in thickness: it is situated near the summit of a lofty eminence, overlooking one of the most luxuriant vales in the whole course of the river Tâf. Near the village of Llanboidy is a large tumulus, flat on the summit, as if originally surmounted by some building: and on the opposite side of the river, and about a quarter of a mile higher up the stream, are the vestiges of a small encampment, probably intended to defend the passage of the valley. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £594. 18.

LLANBRÛNMAIR (LLAN-BRÛN-MAIR), a parish in the hundred of MACHYNLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (E.) from Machynlleth, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, and containing 2040 inhabitants, of which number, 1067 are in the Upper, and 973 in the Lower, division. This parish extends more than eleven miles in length, and seven in breadth, and comprehends a large portion of mountainous land, affording good pasturage during the summer for sheep and young cattle, and considerable tracts of meadow and arable land, which have been brought into a good state of cultivation. The inhabitants obtain their letters from the Wynnstay Arms, a posting-house eleven miles from Machynlleth, on the road to Newtown, and about a mile and a half to the north-east of the village, which is pleasantly situated on an eminence commanding extensive prospects over the surrounding country, of which the scenery is richly and beautifully diversified. About four miles to the south-east of the village, in the township of Pennant, are two fine waterfalls near each other, of which the principal, called Frwd Vawr, is very grand, especially after heavy rains, the water having a perpendicular descent of more than one hundred and thirty feet. In the township of Tŷrmyneich, near Talerddig, is another waterfall, called Nant ysgolion; and at Glŷn Yal, in the same neighbourhood, is a stratum of hard rock, which has been hollowed into the form of an arch by the waters of a brook, and in a late formation of a new road cut through the rock. The road from Machynlleth to Carno, through this parish, is highly picturesque in many parts; and, from the higher grounds, the principal mountains in North Wales, and the beautiful Vales of LlanbrÛnmair, Pennant, and Carno, are seen to great advantage. In the township of Pennant there are lead mines; and flannel is manufactured in the parish, which forms the western extremity of the district in Montgomeryshire in which this trade is carried on. The principal fuel of the inhabitants is peat, which is procured within the limits of the parish. Fairs for horses, cattle, and sheep, are annually held on the Friday before the 10th of March, May 31st, September 16th, and November 25th. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph: the former, which is a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £4. 14. 9½.; and the latter, which is discharged, at £4. 8. 1½.; both are in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient structure: the interior is ornamented with some beautiful specimens of ancient carving in oak; and in the churchyard are some yew trees of fine growth and of great age. At Talerddig was formerly a chapel of ease, but it has gone wholly to decay, and no remains of it can now be traced. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. Morgan Lloyd, Esq., in 1702, bequeathed in trust to the vicar and overseers of this parish the yearly produce of a tenement in the parish of Trèveglwys, to be distributed according to their discretion, for the benefit of the parish of Llanbryn-mair: these trustees have invariably endowed a parochial school with one-half of the rents, and distributed the remainder among the poor. The Independents have erected various buildings in different parts of this extensive parish, which are appropriated to the use of Sunday schools. On Newydd Mynyddog hill, in the township of Tirymyneich, are two Druidical circles, formed of large upright stones placed at unequal distances from each other: the larger of these circles is twenty-seven, and the other twenty-four yards in diameter; and on some higher ground in the immediate vicinity is a circle of smaller stones, nine yards in diameter, which, from its commanding situation, appears to have been an exploratory station. At Tavalwern Mill, in the township of Tavalwern, is a small tumulus. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £1118. 7.

LLANCADWALADR (LLAN-CADWALADR), a parish in the Cynlleth and Mochnant divisions of the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 9 miles (W. by N.) from Oswestry, containing 205 inhabitants. This place was formerly a chapelry in the parish of Llanrhaidr yn Mochnant, but was separated from it by act of parliament, and formed into a parish of itself. The village is situated in a small valley surrounded by barren mountains of dreary aspect, and is not distinguished by any peculiar features. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is dedicated to St. Cadwaladr, from which circumstance the parish derives its name. Mrs. Mary Maurice, about the year 1720, bequeathed £30 for poor housekeepers not receiving parochial relief; and in 1733, Mr. Thomas Humphreys bequeathed £50 to the poor of this parish: of this latter sum £40 has been lost. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £126. 3.

LLANCARVAN (LLAN-CARVAN), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E.) from Cowbridge, comprising the Eastern and Western divisions, and containing 734 inhabitants, of which number, 411 are in the Eastern, and 323 in the Western, division. In this parish was established the first choir of saints before the institution of monasteries by St. Germanus, who came to England to suppress the doctrines of Pelagius. Here he placed certain religious men for the instruction of the people in the Christian religion. The first principal was St. Dubrig, or Dubricius, who was afterwards raised to the see of Llandaf, of which he was the first bishop. He was succeeded at Llan-carvan by St. Cadoc, or Cattwg, in honour of whom several churches were subsequently erected throughout the principality. To this saint

Hungy, a British chief, gave lands for the benefit of the institution, which rose on the ruins of the old British choir: it flourished under the ancient Latinized name of Carbani Vallis, and the abbot, who was considered to be one of the principal ecclesiastics in the diocese, assisted at a council held at Llandaf, in 560, which passed sentence of excommunication upon Meurig, King of Morgannwg, or Glamorgan. The village is situated in a retired dell, which presents no particular features of interest: the substratum of the parish is limestone, of which considerable quantities are quarried to be burned for manure. Within the parish are several farms, forming an extra-parochial district, called Llanoethin, where were formerly some vestiges of an ancient chapel: this district comprises the farms of Caer-Maen, Llanbithon, and Velin Vâch; and those of Carn Llwyd, Llanbythery, Llancadle, and Treguf, which are each subject to a modus. A fair is held on the Wednesday before Easter. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the Crown. The Dean and Chapter of Gloucester are impropiators of the great tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Cattwg, an ancient and spacious structure, now in a dilapidated condition, is said to have been built in the twelfth century by Walter de Mapes, chaplain to Henry I.: the altar-piece, which is elaborately embellished, and a portion of the ancient stone screen still remaining, convey some idea of its former grandeur. At present it consists of two aisles: in the north chancel is a remarkably fine window, measuring eleven feet by twelve, the mullions and tracery of which were destroyed during the civil commotions of the seventeenth century, by a fanatic named Bush. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Mrs. Mary Loughor, in 1745, bequeathed £50, the interest of which sum is annually divided among the poor at Christmas. In the parish are some remains of an ancient intrenchment, called the Castle Ditches; also a mineral spring, called Llan-carvan Well, the water of which is said to be efficacious in the cure of scorbutic and cutaneous diseases. Caradoc of Llan-carvan, the historian of Wales from the abdication of Cadwaladr to his own times, and cotemporary with Geoffrey of Monmouth, was a native of this parish: he wrote his work in Latin, and it was afterwards translated into English by Humphrey Llwyd, who accounts for the different periods to which the history is continued in different copies (in some of which it is brought down to within two years of the death of the last Llewelyn), by attributing to the monks of the abbey, in which they were deposited, an annual addition to the original, by way of continuation. The English version, with a continuation to the reign of Elizabeth, was published in 1585, by Dr. David Powel, and is considered as the standard history of Cambria. Walter de Mapes, son of Blondel de Mapes, who accompanied Fitz-Hamon into Glamorganshire, and obtained for his services the lands of Gweinydd ab Seisylt, lord of Llan-carvan, a writer of some celebrity in the twelfth century, was born in this parish: he built the church and a mansion for himself, and also the village of Walterston, a hamlet in this parish: he married the only daughter of Gweinydd, and, with unusual liberality, restored to their original native proprietors part of the estates which he inherited from his father. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £389.

LLANCYNVELYN (LLAN-GYNVELYN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of GENEU'R-GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N.E. by N.) from Aberystwith, on the road to Machynlleth, containing 826 inhabitants. This parish, which abounds in mineral wealth, is situated on the river Dyvi, which is here navigable, and affords a facility for the exportation of lead-ore and bark, which are shipped from this place in great quantities, while timber, coal, and limestone, are imported for the supply of the neighbouring district. Mines of lead and copper are at present in operation, but to a very inconsiderable extent. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Chichester family, of the county of Devon. The church, dedicated to St. Cynvelyn, a very ancient structure, and in a very dilapidated condition, was originally erected in the sixth century, and is about to be rebuilt by voluntary subscription. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Mr. Thomas Owen, in 1731, bequeathed £10, the interest of which is distributed annually among the poor, according to the will of the testator. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £112. 15.

LLANDAF, an ancient and decayed city, and a parish, in the hundred of KIBBOR, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (N.W.) from Cardiff, and 161 (W.) from London, containing 1299 inhabitants. The name of this place is a contraction of the Welsh words Llan ar Dâf, signifying "the church on the Tâf," a branch of which river flows under the walls of the churchyard. It is uncertain at what period it first became the site of human habitations, or the seat of a religious congregation. Some writers assert, but on doubtful authority, that a church has existed here since the year 186. According to an ancient Welsh manuscript, the first church at this place was built by Tewdric ab Teithvalch, commonly called St. Tewdric the Martyr, grandfather of the renowned King Arthur, about the year 450. The first bishop of Llandaf mentioned in authentic history is Dubricius, a native of the country included in the modern Pembrokeshire, and called by the Welsh Dyfrig Beneurog, "Dubricius the Golden-headed." To this holy office he was consecrated, in the beginning of the sixth century, by Germanus, Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus, Bishop of Troyes, who had been sent into Britain to uproot the Pelagian heresy, in which labour they were greatly assisted by Dubricius. The first endowment of the see was made during the episcopacy of this prelate, to whom certain lands were given by Meuric, son of Tewdric, and his successor in the sovereignty of Gwent, in a general council of his nation, and with the consent of the nobility, clergy, and laity. Dubricius, after presiding for a short time at Llandaf, was advanced to the metropolitan see of Caerlleon, afterwards removed to St. David's, and was succeeded in the episcopate by the famous St. Teilo, or Teilaw, descended from the Cuneddian line of princes. With the aid of Dubricius, St. Teilo established a college at Llandaf, called after his name Bangor Teilo: he was slain by a nobleman in his own cathedral of Llandaf, which church was afterwards frequently called after his name Llan Deilaw. It is stated in Cressy's Church History that many miracles were wrought by this saint, both in his lifetime and after his death; but the author recites only one, which he gives on the authority of Bishop Godwin, to the effect that, after his death, the inhabitants of three several places earnestly contended for the honour of his interment; those of Pennalun, where his ancestors had been buried; those of Llandilo-Vawr, where, according to one account, he died; and those of Llandaf, among whom he had been bishop: when at length no agreement could be effected among them, there presently appeared three bodies of St. Teilo, exactly resembling each other, one of which was taken by the people of each of the above-named places, and thus the dispute ended; but Bishop Godwin adds, for the honour of his own church, that, by frequent miracles performed at his tomb, it appeared that the inhabitants of Llandaf possessed the true body. Dubricius, the first bishop, lived to a very advanced age, and dying in 522, at Ynys Enlli, or Bardsey Island, in North Wales, his remains were thence removed to Llandaf, and interred before the high altar of the cathedral church, where a monument was erected to his memory. During the prelacy of Oudoceus, the successor of St. Teilo, Meurig ab Tewdric, King of Gwent, in a synod held at Llandaf, was excommunicated for the perfidious murder of Cunedda: his dominions were also laid under interdict for two years, after the expiration of which he was allowed to make his peace with the church by the customary mode of increasing its endowments. During the presidency of these three bishops the endowments had gradually accumulated, so as to render this see one of the richest in Christendom. Bishop Aidan, the second successor of Oudoceus, was killed in 720 by the Saxons, who at this period made great ravages in South Wales. Marchluith, or Marchlwys, the twenty-fourth bishop of this diocese, over which he presided in the reign of Hywel Dda, was chosen, amongst others, by this monarch, to compile the code of laws for the enactment of which this reign is so distinguished in the Welsh annals.

According to Caradoc of Llancarvan, from the death of Pater or Paternus, Marchluith's immediate successor, in 961, to the consecration of Gucan, Gogwan, or Gwrgan, the twenty-sixth bishop, in 982, Roderic, son of Morgan Hên, King of Glamorgan, was bishop of this diocese; but having been raised to the see contrary to the wishes of the pope, the latter, in his anger, issued a bull forbidding all marriages in the diocese without his special license: this injunction, however, it was impossible for the priests to obey, the people compelling them to perform the marriage ceremony without the pontiff's sanction. In 987, the cathedral church was burned by a large party of marauding Danes, who made extensive ravages in the adjacent country and along the neighbouring coasts. Bledri, the successor of Gwrgan, who was consecrated in 993, and died in 1022, was celebrated as the most eminent scholar of his time, on which account he obtained the name of "Bledri the Wise:" he instituted parochial schools in every church of his diocese, in which the priests were directed to instruct the people. Every encouragement was likewise given to these schools by his successor Joseph, who enjoined the clergy to teach the people gratuitously to read the sacred scriptures, and made some strict regulations for the better observance of the Sunday and the church holidays. During the episcopacy of this prelate, who died in 1046, Rhydderch ab Iestyn, Prince of Glamorgan, granted many privileges to the church of Llandaf, and confirmed to it all its former possessions. After the decease of Joseph's successor Herewald, the see remained vacant for about four years, until the consecration to it, in August 1108, of Urban, Archdeacon of Llandaf, who found the cathedral church in great dilapidation, it having frequently been despoiled by the Saxons and other invaders who had infested the coast, and by the Normans, whose subjugation of the native population of Glamorgan had now become permanent; the revenue of the diocese had likewise been greatly diminished, from the unsettled state of the country, and the negligence of those to whose care they had been entrusted. On representing these circumstances to Pope Calixtus II., at the council of Rheims, in 1119, Urban procured from that pontiff letters to the king of England, the archbishop of Canterbury, and the clergy and principal persons in the diocese of Llandaf, exhorting them to afford him their assistance in making the necessary repairs. Having for this purpose raised a large sum of money, he pulled down the old cathedral, dedicated to St Peter, a small edifice only twenty-eight feet in length, fifteen in width, and twenty in height, and, in April 1120, began the erection of the magnificent edifice, a great part of which, though in ruins, is still standing, and which he dedicated to St. Peter, and the first three bishops of the diocese, namely St. Dubricius, St. Teilo, and St. Oudoceus: the name of St. Teilo, however, is alone applied to it by the Welsh historians, in whose writings is found occasional mention of Eglwys Teilo "the church of St. Teilo;" Plwyv Teilo, "the parish or community of St. Teilo," &c. After the completion of this edifice, which was three hundred feet in length, eighty in breadth, and thirty in height, built of hewn stone, and ornamented with two lofty towers at the western front, and a splendid chapel, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, at the eastern end, Urban erected houses for the residence of himself, the canons, and other members of the establishment. He next undertook the task of recovering some of the possessions of his see, which had been usurped by the bishops of St. David's and Hereford, and attached to their respective prelacies; and this compelled him to undertake a journey to Rome, in the prosecution of which he died, in 1133.

He was succeeded, after an interval of six years, by Uchtryd, whose nephew Galfrid, or Geoffrey, who had presided over a college at Llandaf, and acted as domestic chaplain to William Earl of Gloucester and Lord of Glamorgan, was next consecrated to this see. Llandaf was visited, in 1188, by Archbishop Baldwin and Giraldus Cambrensis, when preaching the crusades in Wales, at which time William de Salso Marisco, or Saltmarsh, was bishop. After the death of this prelate, in 1191, Giraldus Cambrensis was himself elected to this see; but refused the proffered dignity, which was accepted by Henry, prior of Abergavenny, who gave certain portions of the property of the cathedral for the support of fourteen prebendaries, constituting the chapter, who had previously shared with the bishop in the revenue of the see, and appropriated to himself and his successors the remainder, forming the possessions which the prelates still enjoy. The ancient unity of possession of the bishop with the chapter, of which he thus constituted a member, caused the abolition, at a very early period, of the office of dean in this cathedral, a dignity which this circumstance rendered useless, the bishops themselves acting in that capacity, and in their absence appointing a representative in the person of the archdeacon: the names of only two deans are found upon record; the first, a priest named Joseph, who succeeded to the episcopate in 1022; and the other, an ecclesiastic named Elni, or Esni, who held this office in 1120. The seventh successor of Bishop Henry, William de Breos, prebendary of Llandaf, who died in March 1287, was buried in the cathedral church, at its north-eastern extremity: within the walls of this edifice were also interred William's second successor, John de Monmouth; his sixth successor, John Pascall; and his eighth successor, Edmund Brumfield. The cathedral, together with many other ecclesiastical structures in the principality, sustained great injury from the forces of the insurgent leader Owain Glyndwr, who is also said to have destroyed the neighbouring castellated mansion of the bishop. John Marshall, who was consecrated to this see in 1478, greatly beautified the cathedral church, in which, on his death in 1496, he was buried, on the northern side of the choir. Anthony Kitchen, who held the bishoprick during the successive reigns of Henry VIII. and his three children, greatly impoverished its revenue by lavish grants. William Morgan, his fourth successor, who was consecrated in 1595, and translated to St. Asaph in 1601, is eminent as the learned translator of the Old Testament into the Welsh language. His immediate successor was Francis Godwin, subdean of Exeter, and son of Thomas Godwin, Bishop of Bath and Wells: this learned prelate was author of a valuable catalogue of the bishops of England, and was afterwards translated to the see of Hereford. After the death of Morgan Owen, then bishop, in 1644-5, this see remained vacant for about sixteen years, until the Restoration: during this interval, lands belonging to it of the value of no less than £3830. 18. 1. were alienated by the parliament. Richard Watson, Regius professor of divinity in the University of Cambridge, who was promoted to the see in 1782, was equally distinguished by the extent and profundity of his erudition, and the Christian liberality of his spirit: he is more particularly known as the author of "Two Apologies for Christianity," and a variety of excellent sermons and religious tracts. Attached to this diocese were anciently the two archdeaconries of Monmouth and Glamorgan; but the former soon merged into the latter, and the two, thus united, have since been called the archdeaconry of Llandaf.

The city, now reduced to a mere village, occupies a pleasing and retired situation on the western bank of the river Tâf, on the road from Cardiff to Llantrissant: it stands on elevated ground, gently sloping on all sides, except towards the river, where the descent is more precipitous; and in this bottom stands the cathedral, partially embosomed among trees, with the river murmuring beneath its walls. It consists of little more than two short streets of cottages, not lighted or paved, terminating in a square, into which the great gateway of the old palace formerly opened, and where there are still several genteel houses : the bishop has no residence in the diocese. The Glamorganshire canal passes through the parish, and on its banks, at the hamlet of Gabalva, there is a wharf. There is no market ; but two fairs are held annually, one on the 9th of February, called St. Teilo's fair, and the other on Whit-Monday, a very large fair for cattle ; and at Ely Bridge, a populous village in this parish, additional fairs are held on July 22nd and December 11th. During the recent debates in the House of Commons, on the subject of amending the representation of the people, the first bill of reform proposed to make Llandaf contributory to Cardiff ; but that arrangement was subsequently altered, and it now forms no part of the act. The petty sessions for the hundred are held here. The parish is composed of five hamlets which are united for all purposes, namely, Llandaf, containing about five hundred and sixty-one acres ; Canton, five hundred and fourteen ; Ely, four hundred and seventy-four ; Fairwater, three hundred and twenty-seven ; and Gabalva, five hundred and ten ; making in all two thousand three hundred and eighty-six acres.

The diocese of Llandaf appears originally to have included the whole of the ancient principality of Siluria, or Gwent ; and at present its jurisdiction extends over the entire counties of Glamorgan and Monmouth, with the exception of the westernmost part of the former, comprising twenty-one parishes, which forms the deanery of Gower, in the diocese of St. David's, and seven parishes in the latter, three of which are also in the diocese of St. David's, and the rest in that of Hereford, the total number of churches and chapels within its limits being about two hundred and forty. The chapter of the cathedral church consists of fourteen members, viz., the bishop, who has a stall and authority as dean, the archdeacon, and twelve prebendaries : the stall of the bishop, as chief of the fourteen members, is situated on the right hand side of the entrance into the choir : the archdeacon exercises the same authority as subdean in other cathedrals, and as such has a stall on the left hand side of the entrance, opposite to the bishop's. To one of the prebends, called from this circumstance Prebenda Thesaurarii, is attached the office of Treasurer ; to another, called Prebenda Precentoris, belongs that of Precentor ; and to a third, called Prebenda Cancellarii, that of Chancellor : the prebend to which the treasurer'ship is attached was annexed to the bishoprick, in lieu of mortuaries, pursuant to an act passed in the 12th of Queen Anne's reign. The archdeacon has no visitatorial powers, the whole diocese being subject to an annual visitation of the chancellor ; neither does he exercise any other archidiaconal jurisdiction, the only court empowered to grant probates of wills and letters of administration being the consistorial court of the bishop. Besides the above-named dignitaries, there are also two priest-vicars, a registrar, and inferior officers. The priest-vicars alternately officiate in the cathedral, as the parochial church, and at Whitchurch, an adjoining parish united to that of Llandaf. The great tithes of both these parishes are the property of the chapter, and the senior and the junior vicars each receive an annual stipend in lieu of the small tithes.

The cathedral, which also serves as the parish church, and is dedicated, as above-mentioned, to St. Peter and the three first bishops of the diocese, presents a remarkably incongruous appearance ; the ancient structure, erected early in the twelfth century, and subsequently repaired and enlarged in the early and later English styles, having fallen into decay, was again repaired and altered in the Grecian style of architecture, forming nearly a new edifice within the old walls, which constitute a considerable portion of it, about the year 1751. The façade of the modern church intersects the nave of the ancient edifice, the ruined western portion of which consequently forms a kind of vestibule to the former, and is justly admired as presenting a magnificent specimen of the early English style : on one side is a highly enriched Norman entrance, and on the other a plainer doorway of similar architecture. The west front is ornamented with a series of lancet windows of different sizes, delicately executed and tastefully arranged, and on the northern side has a noble tower in the later style of English architecture, built by Jasper Duke of Bedford, in 1485, which is in good preservation, except that it is no longer surmounted by the pinnacles by which it was originally adorned, and which were damaged, in 1703, by a violent storm that threw down a corresponding tower on the southern side of this front. Two sides of the remaining tower rest on the walls of the church ; while the other two are raised on light arches which spring from a single pillar within. Immediately over the grand entrance is the figure of a bishop, with a pastoral staff in one hand, and the other slightly raised. Above a series of trefoiled arches over the lancet-shaped windows is another figure, in a sitting posture, holding a book in one hand : the whole is surmounted by a cross. Between the western portal of this front and the façade of the present cathedral are the ruins of the greater part of the nave and aisles of the ancient structure, three elegant Gothic arches which separated the former from the latter still standing on each side : the columns are tapered and clustered, and their capitals varied and very neatly sculptured, the ribs of the arches terminating in prettily carved heads. The present cathedral comprises part of the nave, together with the choir, and the greater part of the north and south aisles of the ancient edifice : the expense of these modernizations and alterations amounted to no less than £7000 : even the altar was enclosed by a Grecian portico, which, however, was removed, in 1831, by order of the present chapter. At the eastern end is the ancient and handsome chapel of St. Mary, in which divine service is occasionally performed in the Welsh language ; a circumstance which has caused it to be commonly called the Welsh chapel : two services in English are regularly performed, with no variation from the ceremony observed in ordinary parish churches : the entire length of this chapel inside is fifty-seven feet and a half ; its breadth, twenty-four and a half ; and its height, about thirty-six : opposite to it, behind the choir, is a Norman arch of the ancient edifice. Adjoining to the southern side of the cathedral is the chapter-house, a square building, enclosing an apartment of the same form, the roof of which is supported by arches springing in different directions from a pillar in the centre: this apartment measures about thirty-six feet along each side; but the business of the chapter is now transacted in a small building at the north-west corner of the churchyard. Besides many of the bishops who have successively filled this see, several persons of distinction, formerly resident in the neighbourhood, have been interred in the cathedral; but of the monumental memorials few, owing to the extent of the repairs and alterations which this edifice has undergone, now remain; and these have for the most part been removed from their original positions and greatly dilapidated. At the eastern end of the south aisle is one bearing the sculptured effigy in marble of a lady, supposed to be the wife of John Lord Audley, who is represented in a long robe reaching to her feet; and behind are the figures of two monks holding an escutcheon. In the same aisle is also a monument consisting of the figure of a skeleton, of large proportions, in a shroud, placed under a Gothic niche; another, the recumbent figure of a knight in armour; a third, a rich painted and gilded tomb, supporting a male and a female figure in alabaster, the former clothed in armour, and the latter in long loose robes, with ruffles, and a rich and singular head-dress; a fourth, the effigies of two bishops rudely sculptured; and a fifth, also constituting the tomb of a prelate. In the north aisle is the effigy of a female wrapped in a loose robe, and displaying in her form and countenance striking marks of sickness and decay. At the upper end of this aisle was the chapel of the Matthew family, monuments in alabaster to the memory of two of the members of which are still preserved here; and in the chapter-house are the disunited remains of an elegant and costly tomb of alabaster, representing a knight and his lady richly habited. Among numerous other sepulchral memorials of less note are two attributed respectively to St. Dubricius and St. Teilo. In the cathedral is preserved a small library, consisting chiefly of the works of some of the ancient fathers, founded, soon after the Restoration, by Bishop Davies, in place of one which had been destroyed in the recent civil commotions.

Within the parish is a place of worship for Baptists, situated at the village of Ely. An excellent National school, in which upwards of one hundred and twenty children are instructed, is supported chiefly by the annual subscriptions of the Bishop and Chapter, aided by contributions from the neighbouring gentry, and annual donations from the bishops of Durham and Winchester, who formerly presided over this see. Iltyd Nicholl, Gent., by will dated March 21st, 1716, bequeathed two cottages in Llandaf, and an acre and a half of freehold land within the parish, in trust to the vicars, churchwardens, and overseers, directing the income to be divided between two poor widows resident therein. The episcopal palace, having been destroyed by Owain Glyndwr, was never restored, and from that period the bishops have had no residence here: there yet remain some ruins of their castellated mansion, situated a little to the south-east of the cathedral, and consisting of the principal entrance gateway and the outer walls:

these are now the property of the heirs of the late Sir Samuel Romilly, who possessed a considerable estate in this neighbourhood. Mention is made of a college here, which is stated to have been founded by St. Teilo, and called after him Bangor Teilo, over which Galfrid, thirty-second bishop of this diocese, presided prior to his consecration, but nothing further is known of its history. Leland also saw some remains of "a Pile or Maner Place decayed at Eglins Newith, in the Paroch of Landaf." The principal modern mansions in the parish are, Llandaf Court, the property and residence of Walter Coffin, Esq., formerly belonging to the family of Matthew; Llandaf House, the residence of A. Homfray, Esq.; and Gabalva, formerly part of the extensive possessions of the Herberts of the White Friars, Cardiff, but now of John Moggridge, Esq. Near Llandaf bridge are found various kinds of marble, beautifully variegated with yellow and light liver colours, or with four colours, resembling the brocatello of lapidaries. Llandaf confers the titles of baron, viscount, and earl, in the peerage of Ireland, on the family of Matthew. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £532. 9.

LLANDANWG (LLAN-DANWG), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, including the small corporate and market town of Harlech, and containing 658 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Arthro, within a short distance of its influx into St. George's channel, and is about five miles in length and four in breadth. Its surface is wild and cheerless, consisting chiefly of rugged rocks and sterile hills; and the surrounding scenery is dreary and uninviting. An act of parliament for enclosing the waste lands was obtained in 1806, under the provisions of which two thousand six hundred and thirty acres were enclosed, of which a considerable portion has been brought under cultivation. The living is a rectory, with Llanbedr annexed, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7. 13. 1½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Tanwg, is a small edifice, in the early style of English architecture, very inconveniently situated on a small isthmus at the mouth of the river Arthro, and so close to the sea that in stormy weather the waves inundate the churchyard. A parochial school, founded and endowed with £10 per annum by the Rev. John Ellis, is kept at Harlech for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, there being no village bearing the same name as the parish. The interest and produce of several small charitable donations and bequests of money and land is annually distributed among the poor. On the mountains in this parish are numerous foundations and remains of the rude dwellings of wood-rangers, erected for the purpose of accommodating the hunters, and called by the Welsh Gyttiawr Gwyddelod. From the coast, a few miles to the south of Harlech, a narrow ridge of sand and gravel, called Sarn Badrig, "Patrick's Causeway," or Sarn Bad-rhwyg, "the Ship-breaking Causeway," extends a distance of twenty-two miles seaward, in a curvilinear direction. The whole of this shoal is dry at low water of spring tides, and is always marked in storms by terrific breakers. According to a tradition of unknown antiquity, this bank anciently defended from the encroachments of the sea an inhabited district called Cantrer Gwaelod, or "the Low-land Hundred," which was at last overwhelmed, about the year 500, through the negligence of a drunkard in omitting to close a sluice. According to another tradition of more modern origin, Sarn Badrig was miraculously formed to facilitate the passage of St. Patrick between Great Britain and Ireland. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £132. 10.

LLANDAROG (LLAN-DDAROG), a parish in the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (E. by S.) from Carmarthen, containing 1037 inhabitants. The village occupies a bleak and unsheltered situation on the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Neath, and commands an extensive prospect, embracing on the north a view of Middleton Hall and Nelson's Tower. About half a mile distant, on the road to Llangendeirn, is Lletherllestry, the residence of I. L. Puxley, Esq. The parish abounds with coal, of which mines are worked upon an extensive scale, and above the strata of coal passes a continuous ridge of limestone, which is burnt in considerable quantities into manure for the supply of the neighbourhood. Fairs are held here on the Monday after May 20th and on September 27th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Twrog, is a small edifice, internally well arranged, and appropriately fitted up for the accommodation of the parishioners. Llandarog constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. There were formerly two chapels of ease in this parish, of which there are still some slight remains: of these, one called St. Bernard's has been in ruins for nearly two centuries. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £282. 17.

LLANDAWKE (LLAN-DAWK), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (W. by N.) from Laugharne, containing 19 inhabitants. This parish consists only of two farms. The living is a rectory, with that of Pendine annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 10., and in the patronage of William Powell, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Margaret Marlos, is not distinguished by any architectural features of importance. There is no recent return of the expenditure for the support of the poor; but in 1818 a return was made, stating that there were no rates levied, the whole parish being then in the occupation of one individual, who bore all the expense.

LLANDDANIEL-VAB (LLAN-DDEINIOL-VAB), a parish in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Bangor, containing 372 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the great Holyhead road, comprises a large tract of land, which is generally enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. It is a place of considerable antiquity, as appears from the date of the erection of its parish church, which was founded in the early part of the seventh century, by a son of the first bishop of Bangor. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llanidan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Daniel Vab, is a very ancient and dilapidated structure, originally erected in the year 616, and exhibiting some good specimens of the architecture of a very remote period. One-third of the great tithes is appropriated to the vicar of Llanidan. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest of various charitable benefactions in money, amounting in the aggregate to more than £130, is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. Near Bodlew, in this parish, is a deeply excavated and irregularly elliptical area, forty-three yards in length, and twenty-seven in width across the centre, with an entrance at the smaller end. Near the centre of this enclosure are the remains of an ancient small building, called Capel Cadwaladr, supposed to have been erected by the last king of all Britain of that name, as an occasional place of worship; but for what other purpose the area may have been excavated cannot now be ascertained, as there is no record of its history extant, nor description of any similar place in the kingdom. It is by some writers called Hên Fonwent, and is supposed to have been the oldest, if not the first, place of Christian worship established in the island. The progress of cultivation has nearly obliterated many of the vestiges of antiquity which existed in this parish: there are, notwithstanding, some traces of large arneddau at Bryn Keli, where two upright stones are still remaining, with some few others scattered around them; and in several of the adjacent fields are some upright stones of large dimensions, apparently the remains of cromlechs. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £205. 12.

LLANDDEINIOL (LLAN-DDEINIOL), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. by W.) from Aberystwith, containing 254 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Daniel, is situated on the shore of Cardigan bay, and on the turnpike road from Aberystwith to Cardigan. From a small brook near it, which runs into the river Gwyre, it was anciently called Carog, under which appellation it formerly constituted a prebend in the collegiate church of Llandewy-Brevi, rated in the king's books at £4. The surrounding scenery is not characterized by any peculiarity of features, though from the higher grounds an extensive view is obtained over the bay of Cardigan and the country adjacent. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the family of Price of Knighton. The church, which is pleasantly situated on the brow of a hill, is a small ancient edifice, consisting only of a nave, divided by a double screen into two parts, the eastern of which forms a chancel: the font, which is octangular, is supported on a circular shaft, and placed in the north-western angle of the nave. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £54.2.

that of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Bala, containing 956 inhabitants. It contains nearly five thousand seven hundred acres of enclosed land, and two thousand three hundred acres of common mountain land, the greater part of the whole being hilly and steep. The village is pleasantly situated on the south road from Bala to Corwen, near the river Dee, the banks of which, throughout the whole extent of the parish, are beautifully picturesque and romantic: the parish is likewise traversed by the northern road between the above-mentioned towns, and is adorned by several gentlemen's seats. Nearly opposite to the church is the bridge, a neat structure of four arches, within a short distance of which the vale, abounding with richly varied scenery, begins to contract, and at Calettwr, where there is a beautiful waterfall, terminates in a finely wooded eminence, above which the vast chain of the Arenig mountains bounds the view. The prospect from the higher grounds is extensive and magnificent, comprehending the ranges of the Arenig and Berwyn mountains, Cader Idris, the Arans, and several other lofty hills; the vale of Penllŷn, Bala lake, and other interesting objects. The pass from the bridge of Llanddervel across the Berwyn mountains into Montgomeryshire is also characterized by features of striking and romantic beauty. The township of Llaeth-cwm, in this parish, is locally situated in that of Llanvawr: the prevailing soil of the whole is of a gravelly and loamy texture. The manufacture of flannel, and the knitting of stockings, afford employment to a portion of the inhabitants. Fairs are annually held here on the 17th of August and 16th of October, principally for cattle and horses. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £13. 12. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop: the great tithes of the township of Nant Freuer, in this parish, are appropriated to the rectory and vicarage of Llanvawr, the small tithes only belonging to the rector of Llanddervel. The church, situated on a small eminence on the northern side of the Dee, and dedicated to St. Dervel Gadarn, or Dervel the Strong, who lived at the close of the sixth century, and was one of the abbots of the monastery of Bardsey Island, is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, separated by the remains of a finely carved screen, formerly surmounted by a rood-loft, which has been removed to ornament the front of the gallery at the west end. Over the screen was anciently a figure of St. Dervel, carved in wood, which was removed to London in 1538, and used as part of the fuel which consumed Friar Forest, who was burned in Smithfield for denying the king's supremacy; and thus was fulfilled a vulgar prophecy that this wooden image should "set a whole forest on fire:" the carved figure of a red stag is still preserved as a relic of the image of the saint, with which it was in some manner conjoined. In the east window of the chancel, which is very large and of fine proportions, are some remains of ancient stained glass: in the churchyard are two yew trees of remarkably fine growth. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists, to which are attached Sunday schools. A National school, in which one hundred children are gratuitously instructed, was erected in 1829, and is supported by subscription. Mr. John Williams, in 1746, bequeathed £60 for the benefit of the poor. In the township of Dôldrewin are several Druidical circles on the higher grounds; and in the vale is a farm-house, on the bank of the Dee, called Dôlygadva, or "the meadow of the encampment." Near the mountain of Mynyllod are numerous British monuments, called Pen y Garth, comprising various stone cells: within the parish, on a hill called Cevn Caereuni, is also a strong military intrenchment, named Y Gaer, or "the Fortress;" and in the grounds of Palê are the remains of a Druidical altar and a kistvaen. In making the road through the grounds of Vronheullog, in 1814, a celt and part of another instrument of war were found. On the hill called Cevn Caereuni is a lake named Llyn Caereuni, which is nearly half a mile long, somewhat more than a quarter of a mile broad, and contains an abundance of pike and eels. Edward Jones, an eminent bard, a skilful player on the harp, and author of several poetic compositions in Welsh, was a native of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £407. 12.

LLANDETTY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES.—See LLANTHETTY.

LLANDEDEWI, or LLANDEWY, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (W. by S.) from Swansea, containing 150 inhabitants. A castle is said to have been anciently erected here, the reputed site of which is now occupied by a farm-house, in which some of the walls of the ancient building are reported to be incorporated: there are, however, no records either of the origin or history of the fortress. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 3. 4., endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's, who is also impropiator of the tithes. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a small edifice. The parishioners of Knelston perform their various religious duties and ceremonies at this church, their own being in a state of dilapidation; and the vicar receives a small additional stipend from the chapter of St. David's, as a compensation for the additional duty. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £29. 18.

LLANDEDEWI-ABERGWESSIN (LLAN-DDEWI-ABER-GWESYN), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 13½ miles (N. N. E.) from Llandovery, containing 146 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises one of the wildest and least cultivated tracts in the county, derives its name from the dedication of its church, and from the little river Gwessin, near the confluence of which with the Irvon the village is situated. Lead-ore has been found within its limits, but is not now worked. The roads are utterly impassable for carriages, and unsafe even for common carts. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Llangammarch, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church is dedicated to St. David: there is neither parsonage-house nor glebe land attached to the living. There is a place of worship for Independents. Llwynderw, or "the oak grove," the seat of the family of Jones, which is a handsome edifice, is the only gentleman's residence in the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £87. 14.

LLANDDEWI 'R CWM (LLAN-DDEWI Y CWM), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Builth, containing 230 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which signifies "the church of St. David in the Vale," is pleasantly situated on the river Dihonw, near its junction with the Wye, and comprehends much rich and beautiful scenery, more especially on the banks of the river Dihonw, which washes the bases of several steep and lofty rocks, partially clothed with wood. In the lower parts of it are some beautiful knolls, covered with noble trees, which form very picturesque objects on the road to Builth; and within its boundaries are other luxuriant groves, in which the axe has already made and is still making great havoc. The village occupies a beautiful eminence, at the foot of which flows the river, which is here but narrow: on its banks near the church is some beautifully romantic scenery, as also in a deep glen through which flows the small brook called Bwlch. The lands are chiefly arable; the soil is generally clayey; and the substratum consists of clay slate. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Builth, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty. The church, dedicated to St. David, is situated on the eastern side of the old high road from Builth to Brecknock, but possesses no features of architectural interest. There is neither parsonage-house nor glebe land attached to the living. Mrs. Sybil Vaughan, of Aberdihonw, in 1681, bequeathed the rent of a tenement in this parish, called Tir yr Wyll, now producing £5 per annum, to be distributed annually on All Saints' day among the poor of the parish, which is now given only to such as do not receive parochial aid: the same benefactress also left ten shillings per annum for a sermon; and there is a rent-charge of twenty shillings, left by Mrs. Anne Prosser, for distribution among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £184. 15.

LLANDDEWI-VÂCH (LLAN-DDEWI-VÂCH), a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by W.) from Hay, containing 136 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which signifies "the lesser church of St. David," is skirted on the north and west by the small river Bâchw, by which it is separated from the adjacent parish of Llanbedr-Painscastle. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llowes, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's: the tithes are appropriated to the archdeacon of Brecknock, who is patron of the united benefice. The church, dedicated to St. David, is situated close to a wood called Allt Ddew, but is not distinguished by any remarkable architectural features. A Sunday school is supported by subscription. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £101. 2.

LLANDDOGET (LLAN-DDOGED), a parish in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, lying near the eastern bank of the river Conway,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (N. by E.) from Llanrwst, containing 287 inhabitants. This parish is comparatively small, but contains the two elegant seats of Belmont, the residence of the Rev. J. Nanney Wynne; and Plâs Madoc, that of William Lloyd Jones, Esq., commanding a fine view over the fertile Vale of Llanrwst. Courts leet and baron are held annually in April, by the steward of the Bishop of Bangor, at which place the usual business is transacted. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £5. 13.  $1\frac{1}{2}$ , endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Dogvan, is a large edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and a south aisle, the last of more modern date than the rest, and said to have been erected since the Reformation, at the expense of one of the proprietors of the adjoining manor of Maenan: it contains some good monuments to the memory of deceased members of that family, among which is one to Sir Thomas Kyffin, attorney-general in the reigns of Queen Anne, George I. and George II., who died on the 20th of June, 1745: on the floor are some slabs to different members of the family of Wynne, of Maenan abbey: the parsonage-house was built in a neat style in 1812. A National school was erected in 1827, by voluntary contributions, aided by a grant of £50 from the National Society, which is open to poor children of this and the adjoining parishes: it is supported by subscription, and is capable of admitting one hundred and twenty children, but there are at present only forty-five upon the books. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £118. 11.

LLANDDONA (LLAN-DDONA), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W.) from Beaumaris, containing 442 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Dona, who flourished about the commencement of the eighth century, and is situated in the eastern part of the Isle of Anglesey, upon a peninsular projection which separates the bay of Beaumaris from the Irish sea. It comprises but a moderate portion of enclosed arable and pasture land, which is in a good state of cultivation, and an extensive common, which, from the rocky nature of the soil, affords but indifferent pasturage for cattle. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of features, is pleasing; and the numerous farm-houses scattered over the parish give it an air of cheerfulness not generally found in this part of the principality. A considerable herring-fishery is carried on during the season at Red Wharf bay. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Lord Boston. The church is a very ancient structure, supposed to have been erected about the year 610, and is situated very near the coast of Red Wharf bay. Several small charitable donations and bequests have been left by different benefactors to the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £172. 17.

LLANDDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES.—See NEWCHURCH.

LLANDDWYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES.—See NEWBOROUGH.

LLANDDWYWAU (LLAN-DDWYWE), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. N. W.) from Barmouth, on the road to Harlech, comprising the townships of Is y Craig and Uwch y Craig, each of which separately maintains its poor, and containing 307 inhabitants.

This parish is situated on the shore of the great bay of Cardigan: the district, including and immediately surrounding it is called Ardudwy, from which the hundred takes its name, and abounds with numerous Druidical remains and relics of British antiquity. The mountains in the neighbourhood are of rugged and precipitous character, forming a natural bulwark for the defence of this part of the country, into which the entrance is through a narrow defile of difficult access, which might be secured by a very small body of men against thousands of assailing foes. The narrowest part of this rocky pass is called Drws Ardudwy, "the doorway to Ardudwy;" and the road through it consists in part of frequent flights of numerous steps cut in the rock, of hazardous and difficult ascent, and in some places descends precipitous declivities of frightful aspect and slippery passage, over which, in many parts, impend huge masses of rock, menacing the traveller's progress almost at every step. From the numerous encampments and fortifications of which there are extensive remains on various parts of the neighbouring mountains, it is evident that this pass has been regarded as one of the most important posts in this part of the principality; and from the vast numbers of tumuli, carneddau, kistvaens, and other monuments of deceased warriors, it is more than probable that these mountains have been the scene of many important conflicts in the earlier periods of British history. In this parish are three small lakes, Llŷn Irddin, Llŷn Dulyn, and Llŷn Bodlyn. A small canal has recently been formed from it, nearly parallel with, and at only a short distance from, the coast, to the creek near Llandanwg church, into which it conveys the waters of two streams. Within the limits of the parish stands the mansion of Corsygedol, the ancient seat of the Vaughans, and now the property and residence of Mostyn Lloyd Mostyn, Esq.: a long avenue of stately trees leads to the house, which is deeply embowered in extensive woods, exhibiting in a very striking manner the influence of the strong westerly winds to which they are exposed, and by which the tops of the trees are shorn to one uniform level: the boughs are also so intricately interwoven as to form a close and almost impenetrable curtain. In the grounds are four silver fir trees, the largest in North Wales, which are much admired for the beauty of their growth: the library contains some curious ancient manuscripts. The waste lands of this parish, including more than four thousand five hundred and eighty acres, of which one-half is at present uncultivated, were enclosed by act of parliament in 1810. The village is pleasantly situated on the shore of Cardigan bay: webs are manufactured to a small extent. Fairs are held on April 18th, August 12th, and November 9th.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanenddwyn, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor. The church is dedicated to St. Dwywan, son of Hywel ab Emyr Llydaw, and brother of Dervel Gadarn, or Dervel the Strong, who flourished about the sixth century: it is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, and has on the north-east a sepulchral chapel, separated from the aisle by a screen, and belonging to the proprietors of Corsygedol: the walls are ornamented with several monuments to the memory of the Vaughans, the former possessors of that estate, who were descendants of Osborn

Fitz-Gerald, called by the Welsh Osborn Wyddel, or the Irishman, who came into Wales in the time of Llewelyn the Great, by whom he was much esteemed. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Miss Ellen Humphreys, daughter of the Rev. E. Humphreys, rector of this parish, bequeathed, in 1801, the sum of £200 for the instruction of poor children of the parishes of Llanddwywau and Llanenddwyn, the interest of which is appropriated to the maintenance of a parochial school, chiefly supported by subscription, in which children of both parishes are gratuitously instructed. The Rev. Mr. Jones bequeathed £100 to the minister and churchwardens in trust for the benefit of the poor; Mrs. Jane Wynne, in 1725, also bequeathed £40 for the same purpose; and there are several other charitable donations and bequests, of which the interest is annually distributed among the poor. Near Llŷn Irddin are several Druidical remains, now very much diminished by the removal of the stones composing them, to furnish materials for the walls of enclosures. The principal of these was a circle of loose stones, about fifty-six feet in diameter, the area included within which was divided into four nearly equal parts by upright columns placed in pairs. About thirty yards from this was a similar one of smaller dimensions; and about half a mile to the south, on the side of a hill, are two carneddau of vast size, a cromlech, a maen hir, or columnar stone, and a kistvaen; the largest of the carneddau is fifty-five feet long and twelve high. On the summit of a hill to the west of these is the strong post called Castell Dinas Corddin, surrounded by a deep intrenchment, and having an advanced work on one side of it. On the summit of another hill is Castell Craig y Dinas, surrounded by a vast rampart of stones, through which is an oblique entrance with a facing of stone on each side, and defended by two other ramparts of stone. These fortifications appear to have been erected to defend the above-noticed pass through the mountains, for which purpose they are judiciously situated on the summit and declivities of a hill commanding the entrance. On the summit of two smaller eminences, near each other, are two large carneddau, within one of which are the remains of a kistvaen. Near a tenement called Bryn y Voel are the remains of a cromlech, sixteen feet four inches in length, and seven feet four inches broad, of which the upper stone is twenty inches in thickness: there is another in a field near Corsygedol. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £102. 16.

LLANDDYVNAN (LLAN-DDYVNAN), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from Beaumaris, containing 678 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the turnpike road from Beaumaris to Llanerchymedd and Amlwch, is, with the exception of a small part, enclosed and well cultivated: it formerly contained an extensive common, which was enclosed some years ago, and several houses erected upon it. The scenery is pleasingly diversified and enriched with wood, and in the neighbourhood are obtained some good prospects. The adjacent seat of Plâs Llanddvnan is a spacious and handsome mansion, beautifully situated, and environed with extensive woods, in which is some of the largest and most valuable timber in the island. The pa-rich abounds with limestone of very excellent quality, of which large quantities are shipped to the government harbours, quays, and other public works in Ireland, and also to Liverpool, for various purposes. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Llanbedr-Gôch, Llanvair-Mathavarneithâv, and Pentraeth annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £38. 6. 8., and held in commendam since the year 1701, by the Bishop of Bangor, who appoints a stipendiary curate. The church, dedicated to St. Dyvnan, who came from Rome about the year 180, to assist in converting the Britons to Christianity, was originally founded in the year 590; and the present structure, which is spacious and well built, appears to have been originally of much greater extent: in digging in the churchyard, foundations of ancient buildings have at various times been discovered, at a considerable distance from the site of the present edifice. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest of several small charitable donations and bequests is annually distributed among the poor, at Christmas, pursuant to the directions of the several benefactors. Not far from the church are some remains of a well-constructed Roman road, fourteen feet wide, running in a west-north-western direction towards Holyhead: it is supposed to have been a continuation of the road leading from the shore in the parish of Penmôn, and may be traced at intervals entirely across this parish, and again near Plâs Tregaian, in that adjoining. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £306. 3.

LLANDEBIE (LLAN-DYBIEU), a parish in the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Llandilo-Vawr, on the road to Swansea, containing 2248 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tibieu, is pleasantly situated on the river Loughor, and is nearly six miles in length and about four in breadth. The lands, of which the soil is fertile, are in general in a good state of cultivation, a small portion only being waste, and this consisting chiefly of that part of the mountain of Mynydd-Mawr which is within the parish. The surrounding scenery is pleasing and highly varied, and within the parish are several handsome seats, the residences of opulent families. Dyfryn, the seat of William Lewis, Esq., is a genteel residence, the grounds of which are tastefully laid out, and comprise much beautiful scenery; Blyne, that of Mr. Protheroe, is a handsome old mansion; and Glyn-hîr, the seat of Mrs. Dubuisson, is beautifully situated in grounds comprehending much varied scenery, and ornamented with a picturesque cascade, the water of which falls from a height of more than thirty feet. The mountainous district abounds with coal and limestone, which are obtained in great quantities for the supply of the neighbouring districts, and the procuring of which affords employment to a large proportion of the poorer inhabitants. Fairs are held on the Wednesday at Whitsuntide, July 16th, and December 26th; and at Cross Inn, a considerable village on the borders of this parish and that of Bettws, another is held on March 23rd and 24th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is a neat plain structure, with a lofty square embattled tower. There are in the parish two places of worship for Independents, two for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, and one each for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists. Sunday schools, in connexion with the established church and with the several dissenting congregations, are supported by subscription. A rent-charge of £2. 10., bequeathed by Mrs. Mary Price, is annually distributed among the poor at Christmas. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £474. 7.

LLANDECWYN (LLAN-DECWYN), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N.E.) from Harlech, on the road to Festiniog, containing 462 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of the church to St. Tecwyn: it is pleasantly situated in a part of the county abounding with lakes, of which Lllyn Tecwyn Uchâ, Lllyn Tecwyn Isâ, Lllyn Eiddew Bach, Lllyn Dû, and Lllyn y Dywarchen, are all within the parish. The lands, consisting of about four thousand acres, of which the greater portion is hilly, with a variety of soils, are for the greater part enclosed and in a good state of cultivation; but there are considerable tracts of common. The appearance of the country is finely diversified, and the lakes materially contribute to the picturesque beauty of the scenery. Maes y Neuadd, in this parish, is an ancient seat of the family of Nanney. There is a lead mine in the parish, near the road from Tan y Bwlch to Trêmadoc. The parish consists of one entire township and part of another, the rest of which is included in that of Llanvihangel y Traethau. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Llanvihangel y Traethau annexed, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Treasurer of Bangor Cathedral, to whose office is attached the rectory, rated in the king's books at £16. 14. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ . The church is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, and is pleasantly situated on an eminence commanding an extensive view of the surrounding country. The Rev. John Jones, D.D., in 1719, bequeathed £50, the interest of which, according to the will of the testator, is applied to the instruction of ten poor children of this and the adjoining parish of Llanvihangel y Traethau. Mr. Richard Edwards, about the year 1764, bequeathed £40; and in 1769, Mr. Henry Poole bequeathed £5, the interest of which sums is annually distributed among the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £134. 7.

LLANDEGAI (LLAN-DEGAI), a parish in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-UCHÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (E.) from Bangor, on the Holyhead road, containing 2600 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tegai, a divine of the fifth century, who came over from Armorica with Cadvan, to revive the Christian faith in Britain, then in a declining state, is situated on the river Ogwen, and extends for more than fifteen miles in length, from the shore of the Menai strait far into the mountainous regions of Snowdon, comprehending a widely extended district, abounding with almost every species of mineral treasure. The only historical event peculiarly relating to it is the battle which was fought within its limits, in 1648, between the royalists, under Sir John Owen, and the parliamentary forces under Colonels Carter and Twisleton: the former, whose number was by much the smaller, had raised the siege of Carnarvon to meet the latter, who were advancing to its relief: a furious encounter ensued on the banks of the Ogwen, near the church of Llandegai, in which Sir John was defeated and made prisoner: this was the last battle fought in the principality. Among the mountains within the parish are the Gluder-Vawr, Gluder-Vâch, Carnedd-Llewelyn, Carnedd-Davydd, Y Garn, Carnedd y Filiast, Lidir-Vawr, and several others. On the summit of Carnedd-Llewelyn is a large heap of stones, said to be the grave of one of the princes of the royal family of North Wales, from which the mountain took its name; and on the top of Carnedd-Davydd are some loose stones, supposed to have formed the last retreat of Davydd, brother to Llewelyn, the last native prince of Wales, before he was taken prisoner by Edward I. The former of these mountains rises to the height of three thousand four hundred and sixty-nine feet above the level of the sea in Carnarvon bay, and the latter has an elevation of three thousand four hundred and twenty-seven feet above the same level. The scenery of the neighbourhood is beautifully picturesque and impressively grand, comprehending on one side a vast amphitheatre of mountains, and on the other a fine view of the Menai strait. Penrhyn Castle, the residence of G. H. Dawkins Pennant, Esq., is beautifully situated between the rivers Ogwen and Cegin, which flow through its extensive demesne, and commands an unbounded prospect over the Menai strait, the bay of Beaumaris, and the Isle of Anglesey. This mansion was originally a royal palace, and the residence of Roderic Molwynog, who began his reign about the year 720; and subsequently of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, and other princes of North Wales, after being once destroyed, in 987, by Meredydd ab Owen, who in that year invaded North Wales, and slew Cadwallon ab Ievav, the reigning prince. In the reign of Elizabeth it was occupied by the celebrated Piers Gruffydd, who, at his own expense, fitted out a ship of war, and, sailing from Beaumaris, joined the fleet under Sir Francis Drake, in its South American expeditions, and afterwards aided in the defeat of the Spanish Armada. In 1622, it became the property of the Lord Keeper Williams, and passed from him into the possession of his nephew, from whom the present proprietor is descended. The castle, which is situated in the centre of an extensive park, surrounded by a wall thirteen feet high and seven miles in circuit, is being rebuilt in the ancient style of architecture: the whole of the exterior is of Mona marble, and displays a magnificent range of building, crowned with lofty towers, of which five are circular: the keep, and another of the principal towers, are square, with light and beautiful angular turrets, and the whole, when completed, will form one of the most spacious and elegant structures in the principality. The internal decorations correspond in every respect with the magnificence of the exterior, the mantel-pieces and other ornaments being of the same marble, which is susceptible of a high degree of polish; and the furniture has been chosen with an especial regard to appropriateness of character. There are several lodges forming entrances into the park, all elegant in their design, and lofty in their elevation: the principal lodge, which is near the junction of the London and Liverpool roads, is a stately and beautiful specimen of the architecture of the whole.

Copper-ore is found in most of the mountains in this district; and iron of excellent quality, lead, zinc, manganese, molubdena, and pyrites, in greater or less abundance throughout the parish. Beautifully transparent crystals, both white and of a red colour, are found on the Glydr-Vâch: these vary in their form, some having five, and others six, eight, and ten faces: they are of the largest kind, and sometimes single crystals have been found, weighing more than six lb. But the most important and distinguishing feature in the mineralogy of this parish, and the principal source of its wealth, are the slate quarries of Dôlawen, or Braich y Cavn, which were originally opened on a very large scale by the late Lord Penrhyn, in 1782, and which, by a regular series of progressive improvements, have now become the most extensive and the most valuable in the island. Prior to the year 1785, the annual export of slates from these quarries did not exceed one thousand tons; and, owing to the ruggedness of the road, they were conveyed from the quarries to the creek of Aber-Cegin, since called Port Penrhyn, close to the city of Bangor, in panniers on the backs of horses. This amount, however, was shortly increased by the facilities afforded by a good road formed from the quarries to the same port by Lord Penrhyn, who likewise continued the same line of communication from the quarries a further distance of nine miles, through Nantfrancon and the romantic interior of Snowdon, to Capel-Curig, the whole tract being his own property. It is probable that his lordship, from the commencement of his improvement of these roads, had in view the substitution of this nearer route for the Irish mails, to be brought through Shrewsbury, for the old one through Chester and Aberconway, a change which has since taken place, the former joining the latter near the church of this parish, after running a course of twenty miles through the most mountainous and rugged parts of North Wales: by this means the distance between Pentrevoelas and Bangor is shortened upwards of ten miles. The demand for the slates of these quarries at the same time increasing in an enormous degree, caused his lordship to construct an iron railway from Dôlawen to Port Penrhyn, a distance of six miles, and to increase the number of men employed in the quarries at the former place from sixty to between four and five hundred. In 1794, the annual exportation of slates from these quarries amounted to fifteen thousand tons; but in the following year, the imposition of the tax on slates carried coastwise reduced it to eight thousand, and the number of men employed in quarrying and carrying them in proportion: in a few years, however, it amounted to twenty thousand tons, the duties having been taken off. These quarries are on the north side of the Lidir-Vâch, in the vale of Nantfrancon, and afford employment to one thousand four hundred men, who, upon an average, raise in them from five to six hundred tons of slate per diem. On the adjoining river a large mill was erected, in 1801, for sawing the blocks of slate into slabs for mantel-pieces, tombstones, and other purposes, and for dividing them into laminæ for roofing, for the American, as well as the British and Irish, markets. The roofing slates are of all the various sizes described in the article on the county of Carnarvon. Lord Penrhyn also established, near Bangor, a manufactory in which the finest slates are planed and framed for writing, of various sizes, and to the number of ten thousand dozens annually: these are exported to London and various other British ports, and some of them, without frames, to different parts of the Continent. The schist of the Dôlawen quarries is also converted into casing for the outside of buildings, as a defence against the weather, which, by being painted and sanded, have the appearance of freestone; dados and plinths for stables and passages; dairy-tables; side-boards; pannels for doors, shutters, &c.; inkstands, washball-stands, &c. It is wholly exported from Port Penrhyn, where a commodious wharf, projected by the late Lord Penrhyn, and subsequently enlarged and completed by the present proprietor, has been constructed, with extensive quays, accessible at every state of the tide, and spacious warehouses, provided with every requisite accommodation. Port Penrhyn was originally only an insignificant inlet, formed by the mouth of the small river Cegin, but these and other improvements have rendered it a commodious harbour, capable of admitting vessels of three hundred tons' burden. About two hundred men are employed at the port, making the total number connected with the slate-works about one thousand seven hundred. Ochre is dug out of a mine near the slate quarries, and, having been separated from the sand with which it is intermixed, by grinding and successive filtrations, is collected in a sediment, and dried by the sun and air in summer, and upon kilns in winter. The general colour of this earth is yellow, but others of various hues, with which, in their natural state, the Snowdonian shepherds mark their sheep, are ground in the same manufactory, also for the use of painters. Quartz and chert, from neighbouring quarries of these materials at the base of Carnedd-Llewelyn, together with flint, brought in ballast by ships which convey slates hence to London and Ireland, were formerly ground for the use of the English porcelain and delft ware potteries, at a mill erected on the stream of the Ogwen, in this parish, by the late Lord Penrhyn. An ore of manganese was also prepared here for the purposes of bleaching, and an ore of zinc as a substitute for white lead in the composition of paints.

The living is a perpetual curacy, with those of Capel-Curig and St. Anne annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church is a small ancient cruciform structure, with a low square central tower, containing six bells, the gift of the late Lady Penrhyn: the interior is elegantly fitted up, and contains some ancient sepulchral memorials, among which is a mural monument to the memory of Archbishop John Williams, with his effigy in an episcopal habit, kneeling at an altar; an altar-tomb with two recumbent figures, probably of the ancient family inhabiting Penrhyn castle; and a splendid monument to the late Lord and Lady Penrhyn, exquisitely sculptured by Westmacott, and universally admired. The church is beautifully situated on an eminence overlooking the river Ogwen, and commanding an extensive and richly varied prospect; and forms a picturesque and interesting object in the scenery of the grounds of Penrhyn castle, within which it is situated. A chapel, dedicated to St. Anne, was erected near the slate quarries, by the late Lord Penrhyn, at an expense of £2000, for the accommodation of persons engaged in those works: it was consecrated in 1813, and endowed in 1815 by Lady Penrhyn: it is a neat, well-built edifice, and is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine worship. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £2200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of G. H. Dawkins Pennant, Esq. The chapel of Capel-Curig is noticed under its appropriate head. There are within the parish two places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one each for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. Two free schools, one for boys and the other for girls, were established in this parish by the late Lady Penrhyn, who, however, made no provision towards their permanent endowment; they are, nevertheless, liberally supported by the present proprietor of Penrhyn castle, and are open to all the children of the parish. Several charitable donations and bequests by various benefactors, together with munificent additions from the family at the castle, are annually distributed among the most necessitous of the poor at Christmas. Archbishop Williams, whose monument in the church has been noticed above, was a resident at Penrhyn castle during the reign of James I., who, in 1610, made him dean of Salisbury, and, in 1620, dean of Westminster: in the following year he was appointed Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, in which office he succeeded the illustrious Lord Bacon, and in less than a month was promoted to the see of Lincoln. On the accession of Charles I. he was dismissed, through the influence of Buckingham: he was moreover censured by the Court of Star-Chamber, and imprisoned from 1637 till 1640, but soon after his release he was promoted to the archiepiscopal see of York. He was subsequently, with several other bishops, impeached of high treason, and imprisoned for a year and a half, but was ultimately released on bail, on the express condition of not entering his diocese during the disturbances which then prevailed in the city of York: disobeying the injunction, however, he was enthroned in the cathedral, but was immediately driven away by the Hothams, and retired into his native country, where he ended his life on the anniversary of his birth, March 25th, 1650: he died at Glodd-aith, the seat of Sir Roger Mostyn, an eminent loyalist, having completed his sixty-eighth year. The drinking horn of Piers Gruffydd, a large bugle, formed from the horn of an ox, enriched with chased silver, and suspended by a silver chain, is still preserved in Penrhyn castle: at one end are the initials P. G., together with R. G. K., those of his father and mother, Rhys and Katherine Gruffydd. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £529. 10.

LLANDEGLA (LLAN-DEGLA), a parish in the hundred of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E.) from Ruthin, containing 378 inhabitants. This parish takes its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tecla, under whose supposed auspices the waters of an adjoining spring were anciently in high repute for the miraculous cure of the falling sickness. The patient afflicted with this disease, which was called the "Clwyv Tecla," after washing in the well, making an offering of fourpence, and performing certain ceremonies, which, to inspire the greater awe, were never commenced till after sunset, passed the night in the chancel of the church, and at day-break, after renewing his offering, went away under the belief of being healed. The village is pleasantly situated on the river Alyn: fairs, chiefly for the sale of black cattle, are held annually on March 10th, May 6th, June 23d, August 4th, and October 26th. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £8. 12. 3½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is a small rude edifice, presenting no remarkable architectural feature. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. This parish possesses one moiety of an endowment in the parish of Llanarmon, by Mrs. Margaret Vaughan, of Bôdidris, who bequeathed an estate in the parish of Llanellidan, now producing about £30 per annum, for the education and apprenticing of ten poor boys of the parishes of Llanarmon and Llandegla. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £129. 1.

LLANDEGLAY (LLAN-DEGLA), a parish, partly within the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, and partly in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 1½ mile (E. S. E.) from Pen y Bont, containing 355 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tecla, is intersected by the turnpike road from Hereford, through Knighton, New Radnor, and Rhaiadr, to Aberystwith, and comprises a tract of about four thousand acres, of which a considerable portion is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature: some part of the surface is flat, and the rest very hilly: the parish is watered only by two streams, called respectively the Meithil and the Logun: the soil is generally fertile: some part of it is gravelly, but the greater portion is heavy and wet. Veins of lead-ore are supposed to exist, but they are not worked at present. This place constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 5. 5., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a low tower having a shelving roof: the original character of the building has been much disfigured by the insertion of modern windows, in a style totally differing from that of the prevailing architecture. There is a place of worship for the Society of Friends. A parochial day school, endowed by an unknown benefactor with the rent of a farm, in this parish, called Portys y Gerthy, now producing £20 per annum, affords gratuitous instruction in reading and writing to the poor children of the parish. Ann Griffiths, by will, in 1721, bequeathed £120, and Evan Griffiths, by deed in the same year, gave £40, both which sums have been invested in the purchase of a small farm, called Ty'n y waen, in this parish, the rental of which, amounting to £18, is annually distributed, in equal proportions, among the poor of the parishes of Colva, Llandeglay, and Llanvihangel Nant Melan, agreeably to the directions of the donors. Here are two mineral springs, one of which is a strong chalybeate, and the other impregnated with sulphur: both are in high estimation for their medicinal virtues. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £195. 10.

LLANDEGVAN (LLAN-DEGVAN), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Beaumaris, containing, exclusively of the borough of Beaumaris, which is within its limits, 738 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tegvan, comprises an extensive tract on the western shore of the Menai. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., a detachment of the parliamentary forces, under the command of General Mytton, disembarked at Garth Ferry, in this parish, in 1648, and hence proceeded to the reduction of Beaumaris. This is now the principal ferry across the Menai strait, by which the distance from Beaumaris to Bangor is reduced to three miles. The new line of road from the Menai bridge to Beaumaris is continued for nearly three miles through the parish, in a direction parallel with the strait, and throughout the whole of its course presents a succession of finely varied and highly picturesque scenery. The village, which is about two miles inland, is beautifully situated in a pleasant and fertile district; though from its proximity to Beaumaris, and its situation on the shore of the Menai, it possesses every facility of commercial intercourse, yet this place carries on neither trade nor manufacture of any kind. The living is a discharged rectory, with Beaumaris annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £19. 11. 8., and in the patronage of Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart. The church is of very ancient date, having been originally founded by St. Tegvan, its tutelar saint, prior to the year 450, in which he died. The present church, erected by the munificence of Viscount Bulkeley, in 1811, is a spacious and handsome cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower crowned with pinnacles: the interior, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north and south transepts, is appropriately fitted up; and the chancel is ornamented with a handsome east window of good design. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. John Jones, Dean of Bangor, in 1719, bequeathed to the rector the sum of £50, in trust, to appropriate the interest to the payment of a schoolmaster to teach ten poor children to read and write. A National school having since been established at Bangor, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, those of this parish on the foundation of Dean Jones are now instructed in it. Lady Bulkeley, in 1823, bequeathed £1000 also to the rector, in trust, to appropriate the interest to the relief of the most necessitous of the poor: the whole of this sum has been vested in government securities, and the income arising from them is annually distributed according to the will of the testatrix: there are also some smaller charitable donations and bequests for the relief of the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £254. 1.

LLANDEGWING (LLAN-DEGONWY), a parish, partly in the hundred of GAFLOGION, but chiefly in that of COMMITMAEN, Lley Division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 9 miles (W.S.W.) from Pwllheli, containing 148 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very small extent, is pleasantly situated on the shore of Cardigan bay: the lands, which are principally enclosed, are fertile, and in a state of good cultivation. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llaniestyn, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Tegonwy, is a small edifice, and is kept in excellent repair. The sum of £2. 10. per annum, arising from money secured on the Carnarvon turnpike trust, given by an unknown benefactor, is annually divided among the poor at Christmas; and there are also some other trifling charitable donations and bequests. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £94. 11.

LLANDEILO, or LLANDILO-TÂLYBONT, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $8\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.W. by N.) from Swansea, containing 1253 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated on the river Loughor, which here forms a boundary between the counties of Carmarthen and Glamorgan, and on the turnpike road through Pontardulas to Swansea. The river, which at high tides is navigable to the church, affords a facility for the importation of limestone, which is brought in small craft, and burnt as a manure for the supply of the neighbourhood. This parish is comprised within the coal basin of South Wales, but the mines are worked only for the supply of the inhabitants. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 14. 7., and in the patronage of John Edwards Vaughan, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Teilo, from which circumstance the parish takes its name. There are places of worship for Independents and Welsh Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. At the distance of about two hundred yards from the river Loughor is a tumulus, called by the inhabitants Banc Llwyn y Domen: it is surrounded by a trench, and is supposed to have been thrown up for the purpose of defending the passage of the river. At Court y Carw, to which a small manor is attached, was anciently a small monastery, dependent on the abbey of Cadoxton near Neath: till within the last century, the site was appropriated as a burial-place for unbaptized infants. According to the late Mr. Edward Williams, the eminent antiquary, of Flemingston near Cowbridge, commonly known as the Bard of Glamorganshire, this was the birthplace of St. Patrick, the apostle and patron saint of Ireland; but from its proximity to Loughor, from which it is distant only one mile and a half, Mr. Owen Pugh and other writers refer his nativity to that borough. At Glynloughor, a hamlet within the parish, was born Ieuan Lawdden, the most celebrated poet of his time: he was for many years curate of Machynlleth, in the county of Montgomery; towards the close of his life he retired to his native village, where he died and was buried, but no monument has been erected to his memory. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £442. 17.

LLANDEILO-GRABAN (LLAN-DEILO-GRABAN), a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S.E. by S.) from Builth, containing 272 inhabitants. This parish extends along the banks of the river Wye, and is situated in the centre of a mountainous district. There are not only no public roads leading to it, but even the private roads by which it is traversed are almost impassable in some places. The surface is chiefly mountainous, but the lower lands are principally enclosed and in a tolerable state of cultivation: the soil is for the most part gravelly: the lower grounds produce comparatively good crops, and the bottoms, which are well drained, afford good pasturage. The parish is separated from that of Llanstephan by a stream called the Bâchwyl, which here forms a beautiful cascade, round which is some strikingly magnificent scenery. Its surface is bold and striking, but, in common with that of the adjacent country, is destitute of picturesque beauty, owing to the nakedness of the mountains: from some of the higher hills, however, the prospects are extensive and magnificent beyond description. On the side towards Brecknockshire nearly the whole of the mountains in that county are conspicuous in one grand continuous chain, extending more than thirty miles; and part of the mountains in the counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen are seen from some of the other heights. Near the line of demarcation between this parish and that of Llanstephan is a beech tree of remarkable growth, allowed to be the loftiest in the county, and forming a singular and striking object from many points of view, both in this county and in that of Brecknock. The parish contains no village: it constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Llandeilo-Graban. The church, dedicated to St. Teilo, is a plain neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a low tower, covered with a shelving roof. There is a place of worship for Primitive Methodists. David Bedws, in 1726, bequeathed to the poor of this parish £100 in money, which, being vested in land, produces £6 per annum: William George, in 1686, bequeathed £40; and Thomas George gave certain portions of land at present worth £40 per annum; but at the time of proving the will of the last-named donor, a compromise took place between the heir and the parish, by which the latter, to save litigation, granted a lease of the lands to the former at £10 per annum: a doubt, however, is still entertained of the legality of the transaction. There is also a small donation in land by an unknown benefactor. The produce of these several benefactions is appropriated to the relief of decayed housekeepers. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £273.

LLAN-DEINIOLLEN, or LLANDDENIOLLEN (LLAN-DDEINIOLLEN), a parish in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.E. by E.) from Carnarvon, on the road to Bangor, containing 2610 inhabitants. This parish, which is divided into an Upper and a Lower portion, extends seven miles in length, and about three in breadth, and is separated from the parish of Llanberis by the lake called Llyn Padarn and the river Seiont, which form its boundaries on the south: it is traversed by the road from Carnarvon to Bangor. The mountains of Elidyr Vawr and Carnedd Viliast, both rich in mineral wealth, form its eastern boundaries; and the secondary hills of Moel Lucci towards the north, and Moel Rhiwen to the south, are within its limits. Near the latter of these hills a battle is said to have been fought at some remote period, and on the side of the hill are numerous hillocks, which are supposed to be the graves of the warriors who fell on that occasion. This place appears to have been known to the Romans: within half a mile south-eastward from the church are the remains of an extensive camp, from which a Roman road leading to the ancient Segontium, another in the direction of Bangor, and a third pointing to the mountains, may be distinctly traced. The surrounding scenery, though of a bold and striking character in the mountainous district, is generally throughout the parish uninteresting and unpleasing: scarcely a tree is to be seen on any of the farms; the farm-houses are in general of a very mean description; and the fences of loose stones have a cold and cheerless appearance. The lands are thickly strewed with stones; and large fragments of rock, scattered almost in every direction, greatly impede the process of cultivation. The soil is generally poor, cold, and unproductive; the arable parts being sown chiefly with barley and oats, and, in some few places, with a small quantity of wheat: large tracts of land are fit only for the purpose of planting, the soil being such as to promise no indemnification for the expense of bringing them into cultivation; and, from the great want of timber prevailing throughout this extensive parish, the application of them to that use would be productive of the most essential benefit. The waste lands were enclosed under an act of parliament obtained in 1806, explained and amended by another obtained in 1808. In the upper part of the parish are some of the most extensive slate quarries in the principality, principally the property of T. Assheton Smith, Esq.: of these the most noted are Allt-Dû and Clogwyn y Gigvran, which were opened in 1787, and at first afforded employment to about sixty men. In 1820, Mr. Smith had three hundred men at work in them, and at present (1831) there are about six hundred constantly employed: about seventy tons of slate are raised daily, some of which is sawn into slabs for mantel-pieces, tombstones, and other purposes, by machinery impelled by water. The whole is conveyed to the coast by a rail-road, seven miles in length, which was laid down in 1824, and extends from the quarries through the parish of Bangor to the Menai strait at Port Dinorweg, formerly called Aber y Pwll, where vessels of as much as two hundred tons' burden can enter at high water, and whence it is shipped coastwise to various parts of the kingdom.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £13. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Deiniol-

len, said to have been the son of Deiniol, who founded a college at Bangor, and to have flourished early in the seventh century, is a spacious ancient structure, kept in good repair: in the churchyard are several yew trees, of luxuriant growth, one of which measures twenty-eight feet four inches in girth. There are two places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one each for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The Roman camp above mentioned, which was probably an outpost to the station Segontium, near the present Carnarvon, comprises an extensive area on the summit of a lofty eminence, defended by a rampart of small stones, backed by a stronger one, with two wide and deep ditches: this post, formerly called Dinas Dinorweg, is at present designated Pen Dinas; and in the neighbourhood are the remains of several camps and fortresses of British origin. At no great distance from Llyn Padarn are the remains of Llŷs Dinorweg, an ancient palace, and formerly the residence of Prince Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, which, together with the manor of that name, was bestowed by Edward I. on Griffith Lloyd, Esq., of Trêgarnedd, in Anglesey, who was knighted by that monarch at Rhuddlan castle, in the county of Flint, on conveying to him the intelligence of the birth of his son Edward, in the castle of Carnarvon, and who afterwards, rebelling against that sovereign, was taken prisoner in an unsuccessful attempt to surprise Mold castle, and soon afterwards executed. The manor subsequently became the property of Sir William Williams, of Vaenol, Bart., who left it by will to Sir Boucher Wrey for life, with remainder to King William, who granted it to an ancestor of T. Assheton Smith, Esq., the present proprietor. The mansion is now in ruins; and near it a stone, resembling a Roman millary, was discovered about thirty years ago, bearing the inscription IMP. Q. DECIO. The river Cegin has its source in a strongly chalybeate spring, about two miles south of the church, called Fynnon Cegin Arthur, or the "Well of Arthur's Kitchen," and, after flowing through this and the adjoining parish of Llandegai, falls into the Menai strait at Port Penrhyn. At Rhŷd-Vawr, about a mile to the south of the church, is Fynnon Deiniolen, or "St. Deiniolen's Well," the water of which was formerly in high esteem for its efficacy in the cure of rheumatic and scorbutic diseases. Near Penllŷn, in this parish, lived the celebrated Margaret Uch Evan, denominated by Mr. Pennant the Queen of the Lakes. This extraordinary woman, who lived to be more than ninety years of age, had a boat upon the lakes, and was employed in bringing down the copper-ore from the mines in the neighbourhood: she is reported to have been the greatest hunter, shooter, and fisher of her day; an excellent musician, playing well upon the harp and violin; at the age of seventy, the best wrestler in the country; a good blacksmith, shoemaker, boat-builder, and harp-maker; excelling, indeed, in almost every mechanical art, and was long the wonder and admiration of the surrounding country. Allt Wenn, in this parish, presents an interesting field for the researches of the botanist, producing a variety of scarce plants, such as the Rubus saxatilis, &c. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £275. 18.

LLANDELOY (LLAN-DYLWYV), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH

WALES, 7 miles (E. by N.) from St. David's, containing 217 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated in the north-western part of the county. The living is a discharged vicarage, annexed to that of Llanhowel, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Teillaw, is not remarkable for any interesting architectural features. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £65. 18.

LLANDEUSANT, or LLANDEUSAINT (LLAN Y DDEUSAINT), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W. by N.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 407 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable extent, is situated near the river Alaw, and partakes generally of the scenery common to this part of the principality, but is not distinguished by any peculiar features: the village is small, but pleasantly situated. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Llanbabo and Llanvair-yng-hornwy annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £20. 16. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Marcellus and Marcellinus, is a small but venerable edifice, in the early style of English architecture, with a good lancet-shaped window of three lights at the east end, of which the gable is externally surmounted with an antique cross. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Two poor men of this parish are eligible, by the will of Mr. David Hughes, to apartments in the hospital, or almshouses, founded by that benefactor at Beaumaris, in the year 1609; and the produce of several small charitable donations and bequests in land and money is annually divided among the poor of the parish, in conformity with the will of the benefactors. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £163. 2.

LLANDEVAILOG-TRE'R-GRAIG (LLANDEVAILOG-TRËV-Y-GRAIG), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (E. by N.) from Brecknock, containing (exclusively of the township of Llanyern, the population of which is included in the return for that of the adjoining parish of Llangorse) 47 inhabitants. It is of small extent, comprising only about five hundred acres, of which nearly one-half constitutes a single farm, and the rest is divided among three others, the greater portions of which are included within the adjacent parishes, to the poor's rate of which they are assessed, although the houses are in Llandevaillog parish, which, however, contains not a single labourer's cottage; so that at least one-half of the cost of the maintenance of the poor of Tre'r Graig, who now consist of seventy claimants, scattered through the adjoining parishes, falls on the first-named farm. The village, which is small, is pleasantly situated, near the road from Brecknock through Llanvihangel Talyllyn to Talgarth, on the western bank of the small river Llynvi, which falls into the Wye near Gläsbury, and by which this parish, bordering upon the hundred of Talgarth, is separated from that of Llangorse. The Brecknock and

Hay railway passes along the eastern margin of the Llynvi, within one hundred yards of the church. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanvillo, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Tyvae-log, was erected in 1710, at the sole expense of the Rev. Gregory Parry, A.M., who resided at that time in the adjoining mansion: it is a small neat structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, and is appropriately fitted up for the use of the parishioners: at the western extremity of the roof is a shed containing two small bells. There is no separate register kept for this parish, the births and burials being entered in that of Llanvillo.

LLANDEVAILOG-VÂCH (LLAN-DEVAELOG-VÂCH), a parish in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 2¼ miles (N. by W.) from Brecknock, composed of the Upper and Lower divisions, the former of which constitutes the chapelry of Llanvihangel-Vechan, and containing 359 inhabitants, of which number, 188 are in the Upper, and 171 in the Lower, division. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, and is distinguished by its adjunct from Llandevaillog-Tre'r-Graig, in the same county, is pleasantly situated on the river Honddû, and on the old turnpike road from Brecknock to Builth. It comprehends about three thousand acres, forming a fine tract of country, partly mountainous, the rest hilly and in some places richly wooded, the scenery of which is pleasingly diversified, combining features of picturesque beauty and romantic grandeur; and from the higher grounds are obtained interesting and extensive views of the surrounding country, in which the Black Mountains of Talgarth, and the Brecknockshire Beacons in the distance, form prominent and distinguishing characteristics: the soil consists chiefly of loam, with some clay. The village, which, though small, is highly prepossessing in appearance, is delightfully situated on the western bank of the river Honddû, which washes the eastern wall of the churchyard, in its course through the parish to join the river Usk at Brecknock. In the vicinity are some handsome villas and pleasing residences, of which the principal within the parish is Glän Honddû, the property of John Jones, Esq., an elegant villa, beautifully situated on a gentle acclivity, under an elevated ridge, the summit of which is crowned with timber of stately growth, and commanding a pleasing view of the fertile and beautiful Vale of Honddû. At a little distance from Glän Honddû, to the north, and nearly adjacent to the church, is Llandevaillog House, the residence of the Rev. William Jones, a mansion pleasantly situated in grounds tastefully laid out, at the back of which is a large tumulus, perfectly level on the summit, and which probably forms the sepulchre of some native British chieftain of remote antiquity, or was formerly surmounted by a military work, to defend the passage of the river Honddû, over which at this place is a substantial stone bridge of one arch. One of the most delightful scenes in the Vale of Honddû is viewed in the approach to Llandevaillog church: opposite to the wooded heights under which stands Glän Honddû several woody knolls decline in verdant meadows towards the margin of the river, which is partially seen emerging from a thick grove, which here covers its steep banks; the tower of the church is seen just rising above the dark foliage of the venerable yews by which it is surrounded, with Llandevaillog House nearly adjacent; while in the back ground the landscape appears to be entirely enclosed by successive ranges of distant hills.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £13, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The advowson was formerly vested in the lords of Brecknock, but, upon the attainder of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, escheated to the crown. The church, dedicated to St. Tyvaelog, a dark, damp, and greatly dilapidated edifice, was taken down and rebuilt, in the year 1831, of stone raised on the glebe land, and given for that purpose by the rector. The building, which is characterized by neatness and simplicity of style, was erected at an expense of little more than £200, raised by subscription, aided by a grant of £60 from the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels, in consideration of which fifty-five sittings are declared free and unappropriated. It consists of a nave and chancel, having a boarded floor, raised on dwarf walls, and fitted up with every regard to neatness and comfort: there is also a neat Gothic porch; the old tower, which is a heavy and rude edifice, of much more recent date than the ancient church, is still remaining in its original state; and most of the ancient monuments have been preserved in their former situations. In the chancel are several sepulchral memorials of the seventeenth century, to the memory of the Powells of Castle Madoc; on the north wall is a shield of armorial bearings of sixteen quarterings, of the family of Prytherch, now extinct; and on the west wall is an elegant tablet of white marble, richly sculptured, to the memory of the late Pennoyre Watkins, Esq. The churchyard, from its beautiful situation on the west bank of the river, between which and the turnpike road it is situated, and from its being ornamented with some fine aged yew trees, has a strikingly picturesque appearance. It contains a very extensive mausoleum, surrounded by a high wall, belonging to the family of Watkins of Pennoyre, in which the coffins are all placed upon iron tressels above the ground. On the west side of the wall of this mausoleum, near the entrance, is an ancient carved stone, about two yards in height, and varying from half a yard to a foot in breadth: it is divided into four compartments, the uppermost of which contains a rude cross, encircled with scrolls; the second the rudely carved figure of a man with a battle-ax in the right hand, and a dagger in the left; the third an inscription which has not yet been decyphered; and the lowest is ornamented with scrolls similar to those in the first compartment. This stone, by others, however, thought to have been raised to the memory of Brochmail Yscythrog, is conjectured by Mr. Jones, the late historian of the county, to commemorate Rhain, the eldest legitimate son of Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog, who, according to an old manuscript, died some time in the fifth century, and was buried at this place; and perhaps the tumulus above noticed was raised over his remains: another stone, perhaps of Roman workmanship, which bore the inscription CAVC, and has been noticed by all antiquaries since the time of Camden, was preserved here until the recent re-erection of the church, when it was accidentally destroyed. The chapel of Llanvihangel-Vechan is situated about three miles to the north of the church, on the road to Builth. There are places of worship for Independents in the Higher division, and for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists in the Lower division, of the parish. Miss Sarah Prytherch, who died in 1793, charged an estate called Peytin Glâs with the annual payment of £10 to the poor of this parish. A road from the Roman station near Brecknock to that of Loventium, in the Vale of Teivy, called by the natives Sarn Helen, or Sarn Leon, is supposed to have entered this parish near a village called Sarnau, about a quarter of a mile westward from the church. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor in the Lower division is £94. 1., and in the Upper, £109. 13.

LLANDEVALLEY, a parish in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N.E.) from Brecknock, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, as also the hamlet of Troesgoed, and containing 838 inhabitants, of which number, 398 are in the Upper, and 440 in the Lower, division. This parish comprehends a rich and fertile tract of country, consisting principally of arable lands, of which the soil is very productive. The village is pleasantly situated about a mile to the north-west of the turnpike road leading from London to Brecknock through Hay, and consists of a few neat and comfortable dwellings, the inhabitants of which are principally employed in agriculture. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Crickadarn united, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late Pennoyre Watkins, Esq., to be given to the nearest relation of the testator in holy orders. By the will of the Rev. David Williams, of Stapleford, in the county of Hertford, dated January 16th, 1712, it is endowed with the rectorial tithes of Llandevalley, Crickadarn, and part of Bronllys, subject, however, to the payment of certain charities charged thereon, and of an annual stipend of £25 to the officiating curate of Crickadarn. The church, dedicated, according to some accounts, to St. Teilaw, and according to others to St. Matthew, is an ancient structure, with a tower at the western end, containing five bells, and was formerly one of the finest in the county: the body of the edifice consists of a nave, nearly seventy feet in length, with a narrow aisle on the south, and a chancel about twenty-five feet long: the aisle is separated from the nave by four pointed arches resting on octangular pillars: the roof, which is of oak, is finely arched, and supported by transverse ribs springing from corbels: the chancel is separated from the nave by the ancient rood-loft, which is still in tolerable preservation. The windows are in the later style of English architecture: in the east window is some stained glass, presenting chiefly heads with stars and other devices; and in one of the windows on the south side are two half-length figures of bishops, with their mitres and crosiers, one of whom is represented in the act of giving a benediction. In the south aisle is a finely painted window, representing the Crucifixion, in which the figures are well proportioned, especially those of the Virgin and Mary Magdalene; and in another window of this aisle are half-length figures intended to represent the Father and the Saviour, inscribed over which, in old English characters, are the two first sentences of the Apostle's Creed. Adjoining the churchyard is a large parsonage-house, erected in 1718, to which are annexed about fifty acres of glebe land. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists: the former is endowed with the sum of £100 under the will of the late William Parry, Gent., of Llŷswen, which directs the interest to be applied towards the support of the minister officiating there, who consequently receives from this bequest £4 per annum. In a room under the tower of the church is held a day school, supported partly by subscription, and partly by the friends of the children: about £13 per annum is raised by the former means, and thirteen children are instructed for this sum: the average number in attendance throughout the year is from forty to fifty. One of the charitable bequests of the Rev. David Williams, charged on the tithes of the three parishes above-mentioned, is forty shillings per annum, to be distributed among the poorest housekeepers, day-labourers, and widows of Llandeulley, one-half on St. Thomas's day, and the other half on Good Friday, and double this sum in default of payment on the days specified. Mr. William Lewis, of Caer Gitto, in this parish, gave, in 1740, the sum of £16, directing the interest to be annually distributed among the poor at Christmas. Mrs. Elizabeth Williams, of Llandeilo-Graban, in 1748, bequeathed ten shillings per annum for a sermon to be preached by the minister on Good Friday, and £5 per annum to be distributed immediately after divine service, on the same day, in half-crowns, to forty poor parishioners, with the payment of which sums she charged an estate in this parish, now belonging to Thomas Williams, of Velin Newydd, Esq. On the farm of Pwllcwrw, situated upon an eminence within the parish, are vestiges of a small British encampment; and in a lane near the northern extremity of the parish, called Heol Einon, or Pen Heol Einon, is a stone about four feet high, supposed to be a sepulchral memorial. In this parish is a mineral spring, the properties of which are similar to that of Llanwrtyd: the water is strongly impregnated with sulphur, with a small portion of marine salt, and also partakes in a considerable degree of a chalybeate nature: it is highly recommended in scorbutic and cutaneous diseases. Trebarried, formerly the seat of William ab Harry Vaughan, by whom it was built, about the middle of the seventeenth century, partly with the materials of a more ancient mansion, has been for many years abandoned by the family, and is now a farm-house. In this parish was anciently settled a family of Norman extraction, named Bois, who had within its limits a castellated mansion, called Trebois, of which nothing now remains but the moat by which it was surrounded: of this family was David Bois, prior of the Carmelite friars at Gloucester, and author of several Latin works on religious and ecclesiastical subjects. The average annual expenditure of the whole of the parish, for the support of the poor, amounts to £511. 4., of which sum, £250. 17. is raised by the Lower, and £230. 12. by the Upper, division, the remainder being assessed on the township of Troesgoed.

taining 1278 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the navigable river Tywi, by which it is bounded on the west, and contains a large tract of fertile land, the whole of which, with a very trifling exception, is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is richly varied, and that portion of the parish which is situated between the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Kidwelly, which passes through the village, and the river Tywi, is not inferior, for the variety and beauty of its scenery, to any district in this part of the principality. There is an ancient weir for taking salmon and sewin, attached to the Plâs Gwyn estate. Several good family houses are situated within the limits of the parish, but most of them have been deserted by their proprietors, and converted into farm-houses. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late John Meller, Esq. There are places of worship for Independents, Wesleyan and Welsh Methodists, and Unitarians. The Welsh Methodists assemble for divine worship in an ancient edifice, formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church, but which, having long fallen into disuse, has been recently repaired for the purpose to which it is at present appropriated. A school, in which forty children are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription, aided by an endowment of £1 per annum, bequeathed in 1777, for the instruction of two poor children, by Harry Mansell, of this parish, who also left a rent-charge of £2 to be distributed in bread to the poor; and by one of ten shillings, the interest of £10 in money bequeathed for the like purpose, by David Griffith John. A farm-house near the church is supposed to have been anciently a monastery, of which the only memorial is preserved in the appellation "Nant Llan," by which it is designated. On a tenement called Pistyll, in the lordship of Cloigin, is a spring of limpid water, which was formerly in great repute for its efficacy in curing diseases of the eye; and in the same lordship was anciently an extra-parochial chapel, in which no other service was performed than the solemnization of marriages; but no vestige of it is at present discernible, except the foundations, the materials having been removed at various times for private uses. Some traces of an ancient causeway, now a bridle-way to Carmarthen, are visible just above the river. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £413.

LLANDEVEYSON (LLAN-DYVEISANT), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, comprising part of the market and post town of Llandilo-Vawr, on the eastern boundary of it, and containing 230 inhabitants. It is situated on the river Towy: the lands, which are tolerably fertile, are, with the exception of a very small portion, enclosed and in a good state of cultivation; the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified; and the distant views present numerous objects of interest and features of picturesque and romantic beauty. Newton Park, the property of Lord Dynevor, which comprehends within its limits, besides his lordship's modern residence, the site and venerable ruins of Dynevor castle, the ancient residence of the princes of the house of Dynevor, from whom the present noble proprietor is lineally descended, and of which a more detailed account is given in the article on Llandilo-Vawr, comprises a very considerable portion of the parish. The present mansion, formerly called Newton House, and now Dynevor Castle, is a plain substantial quadrangular structure, crowned at each of the angles with a cupola. The grounds, which are very extensive, are finely laid out, and comprise some noble heights to the west of the town; the plantations are of stately and luxuriant growth; and the park comprehends a richer assemblage of picturesque beauty than is perhaps to be found within the same circuit in almost any other part of the principality. Among the most prominently interesting objects in the grounds, which are seen to great advantage from the opposite side of the river, are the parish church of Ilandeveyson, and the ruins of the ancient castle of Dynevor, the towers of which, rising above the luxuriant foliage of the trees by which they are partly concealed, and preserving even in their ruins an air of venerable majesty, form a strikingly romantic feature in the scenery. The living is a donative, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The church is a small edifice, situated within the limits of Newton Park, and is supposed to have been built on the site of a Roman temple, upon the foundation of which its northern angle is said to rest. In levelling the churchyard, some years since, the walls of this Roman edifice were discovered; and, within three hundred yards of the spot, a pot of Roman coins was subsequently found. The ebbing and flowing well noticed by Giraldus Cambrensis, as having some dependence on the fluctuation of the tides, and the stream issuing from which is called Nant y Rheibio, "the bewitched brook," is, in the opinion of the most competent judges, nothing more than a natural syphon, the operation of which is easily deducible from the principles of hydrostatics. The annual average expenditure for the support of the poor is £39. 6.

LLANDEWI - YSTRADENNY (LLAN-DDEWI-YSTRADENAU), a parish partly in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, and partly in that of KNIGHTON, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N.) from Pen y Bont, containing 653 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, and its position in a winding vale, is situated on the river Ithon, and intersected by the turnpike road leading from Builth, in Brecknockshire, to Newtown, in the county of Montgomery. It comprehends an extensive tract of land, of which by far the greater portion is enclosed and cultivated: the surface is boldly undulated, but the soil is in general productive. The scenery among the hills is extremely magnificent, and the view from that on which the parsonage-house stands is strikingly grand and beautifully picturesque. From this point the distant mountains are seen in three or four distinct ranges, varying in elevation and differing in aspect, finely grouped in almost every variety of form, and so numerous, that it is impossible with any degree of correctness to allocate them to their respective counties. The village comprises only a few houses, occupying a pleasant situation: the inhabitants obtain their letters from a receiving-house at Pen y Bont. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Llanbister in the Collegiate Church of Brecknock, although Lord Kensington has of late presented, as lessee of the great tithes under the prebendary. The church, dedicated to St. David, has been lately rebuilt: it is a small but neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, the latter of which has a handsome east window of good design: the churchyard is surrounded by some ash trees of majestic growth and very imposing appearance. The produce of some small charitable donations is annually given to the poor. On the summit of one of the mountains within the parish, impending over the Vale of Ithon, are the remains of a strong intrenchment, called the Gaer, supposed to have been one of the fortified posts alternately occupied, in the twelfth century, by Cadwallon and Mortimer, during the continued and arduous conflicts which took place between them. It is elliptical in form, being inaccessible on the side towards the vale, and on every other side defended by two parallel intrenchments. On the opposite hill is an extensive tumulus of earth, surrounded by a moat, called Bedd Ygre, "the grave of Ygre," supposed to have been raised in memory of some ancient British chieftain who fell near the spot and was interred there. About two miles from this place formerly stood an ancient fortification, called Castell Cymaron, occupying the summit of an eminence, and supposed to have been originally built by the Anglo-Normans, to protect the territories of which they had violently possessed themselves in this part of the principality, and soon afterwards destroyed by the Welsh, in their continued efforts to repel their aggressions and recover possession of their territories. It was subsequently rebuilt by Hugh Earl of Chester, who, in 1142, obtained possession of the whole of the district of Maelienydd, in which it was included, and was constantly an object of contention between the Anglo-Normans and the Welsh, in the frequent conflicts which arose from the repeated efforts of the former to extend their encroachments, and of the latter to repel them. This castle at length fell into the hands of the Mortimers, about the year 1360, and remained for ages in the possession of their descendants. Its site, and the moat by which it was surrounded, may still be distinctly traced; but of the building itself not the slightest vestige is discernible. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £316. 9.

LLANDEWI-VELVREY (LLAN-DDEWI-VELVRE), a parish principally in the hundred of NARBERTH, but partly in that of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E.N.E.) from Narberth, containing 710 inhabitants. This place is situated in a rich and fertile vale, watered by the river Taf, which separates the parish from that of Llangan, in the county of Carmarthen. The lands are wholly enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil is eminently fertile. The neighbourhood abounds with pleasing and interesting scenery, and is enlivened with several gentlemen's seats, of which the principal are Trewern, the residence of John Thomas Benyon, Esq.; and Hênllan, the seat of John Lewis, Esq. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's: the former, which is a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Principal and Tutors of St. David's College, Lampeter: the vicarage, which is discharged, is rated at £7.9.4½, and in the patronage of the Crown: the tithes of the entire parish are equally divided between the rector and the vicar. The church, dedicated to St. David, is remarkable for the simplicity of its architecture, and displays evident features of a very remote antiquity: an elegant mural tablet of white marble, to the memory of the late David Lewis, Esq., of Hênllan, and his youngest daughter, has lately been put up in the chancel by his widow. The vicarage-house has been nearly rebuilt on an enlarged scale by the present incumbent, under the provisions of an act of parliament, commonly called Gilbert's Act. A school-house, built at the expense of the parish in 1828, is at present occupied by one of Mrs. Bevan's circulating charity schools. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £331. 3.

LLANDEWY-ABERARTH(LLAN-DDEWI-ABER-ARTH), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 13 miles (N. W. by N.) from Lampeter, containing 976 inhabitants. The name of this parish, which comprises about three thousand acres, is derived from the dedication of its church, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation near the mouth of the small river Arth, which here discharges its waters into the bay of Cardigan. This parish is also watered by the Aëron, and from the vale through which this river winds the greater part of its surface presents a hilly aspect. The surrounding scenery, though bold and varied, is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature: the higher grounds command extensive views across the open bay, and some pleasing prospects over the adjacent country. The village, which is intersected by the turnpike road leading from Cardigan to Aberystwith, is remarkably neat and well built; and in the neighbourhood are some pleasing seats, of which the principal in the parish is Tŷ-Glyn, that of the family of Jones, situated about two miles from the village. A tract called Morva Mawr, or "the Great Marsh," and the meadows on the banks of the Aëron, which are liable to inundation, have a fine, deep, loamy soil; that of the more elevated tracts is lighter: but the whole is productive of superior grain of every kind; the only uncultivated portion of the parish is about fifty acres of woodland. This place constitutes a prebend in the cathedral church of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a very ancient structure, forty-four feet in length, thirty in breadth, and thirty-eight in height, with a tower sixty feet in height. A chapel, dedicated to St. Alban, was erected in 1809, for the accommodation of the family residing at Tŷ-Glyn, by the late Rev. Alban Thomas Jones Gwynne, who endowed it with a small farm called Rhôs Taverne, in the parish of Llandyssil, now producing £24 per annum: the living, which is further endowed with £800 royal bounty, is a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of the Proprietor of the Tŷ-Glyn estate. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A Welsh charity school is supported partly by subscription, and partly by an endowment of £7 per annum, of which sum, £5 were given by Henry Jones, of Tŷ-Glyn, Esq., and the remainder by the late Rev. Alban Thomas Jones Gwynne, his successor in that estate. Near the sea-shore are some vestiges of an ancient circular encampment, called Castell Cadwgan, supposed by some antiquaries to have been thrown up by that chieftain about the year 1148; but its defences are now almost levelled. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £177. 18.

LLANDEWY-BREVI (LLAN-DDEWI-BREVI), a parish comprising the townships of Dothie-Camddwr, Dothie-Pyscottwr, Godwidd, and Prisk with Carvan, in the upper division of the hundred of PENARTH; the chapelries of Blaen-Penal and Gartheli, and the townships of Cugian, Gwynvil, and Llanio, in the lower division of the same hundred; and the chapelry of Bettws-Leike, in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES; 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from Lampeter, and containing 2461 inhabitants: each of the chapelries and townships is separately assessed for the maintenance of its own poor. This parish, which is intersected by the river Teivy, and by the turnpike road from Lampeter to Trêgaron, appears, from some discoveries recently made on a farm called Llanio, to have contained a Roman station of some importance, supposed to have been occupied by a cohort of the second legion of Augustus. According to an inscription upon one of the stones still remaining, this cohort assisted in building the walls of the place, which most antiquaries agree in supposing to have been the Loventium of the Roman Itineraries. The parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. David, was distinguished at a very early period as the place where a memorable convocation of the fathers of the Christian church was held, for the suppression of the Pelagian heresy, which early in the sixth century was spreading rapidly through the principality. At this synod, which was held in 519, and of which many marvellous particulars have been related by Giraldus Cambrensis, St. David presided, to whom St. Dubricius, at that time archbishop of Caerlleon, who was present at the meeting, resigned his archiepiscopal see and retired to Bardsey Isle, where he spent the remainder of his days in solitude and devotion. In 1073, a sanguinary battle was fought here between the forces of Gronw and Llewelyn, sons of Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, who had excited an insurrection to avenge the murder of their grandfather, the late Prince of Powys, and the troops of Rhŷs ab Owain and Rhydderch ab Caradoc, princes of South Wales, in which the former were victorious, and Rhydderch was slain. In making their attack upon the princes of South Wales, the sons of Bleddyn crossed the river Camddwr by a ford still called Rhŷd y Meirch, or "the ford of the Cavalry;" and on the western bank of that river are the remains of a military work, called Castell, which was constructed by Rhŷs ab Owain on this occasion. A college was founded here in 1187, by Thomas Beck, Bishop of St. David's, in honour of the patron saint of his cathedral, who had so ably con-futed the Pelagian heresy at this place, in the year 519, also recommending it to the patronage of King Edward the Confessor, for a precentor and twelve prebendaries, which he amply endowed, and which continued to flourish till the dissolution, when its revenue was estimated at £40. A society formed of late years, for the promotion of Christian knowledge and Church union, in the diocese of St. David's, contemplated the foundation of a college at this place, for the education of young men intended for the ministry in the Church of England. For this purpose they had procured stone and timber for the erection of suitable buildings; but the plan was afterwards altered, and the object of the society was ultimately carried into effect at Lampeter. This parish comprises the upper part of the Vale of Teivy, the banks of which river are ornamented with some pleasingly varied scenery; but on the north and east it is environed by hills of bleak and desolate appearance, and the surrounding country, consisting of high and barren mountains, wears a dreary aspect. The village, situated about a mile from the Teivy, consists only of a few detached cottages, and is watered near its entrance by a small brook, called in Leland's time the Brevy. Fairs are annually held here on May 7th, July 24th, October 9th, and November 13th.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of the Earl of Lisburne and R. Price, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. David, and erected on an eminence said to be the spot on which that saint stood, while preaching against the Pelagian heresy, was built by Thomas Beck, Bishop of St. David's, as the collegiate church of the establishment which that prelate founded here in 1187. It is a spacious and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a massive square tower, and was originally cruciform, but the north transept has been for many years a ruin, and the whole edifice has suffered materially from dilapidation. In it is preserved a very large horn, called by the inhabitants of the place "Mat-Korn ŷch Davydd," which is said to have been in the possession of the parishioners since the time of that saint. On a stone over the entrance to the chancel is a Latin inscription, which is noticed by Edward Lhuyd, in a communication to Bishop Gibson, and is as follows: HIC IACET IDNERT FILIVS I. . . . QVI OCCISVS FVIT PROPTER P. . . . SANCTI. Near the west end of the church is a curious old monument, called by the natives of the place "David's Staff," on which he is said to have leaned whilst preaching in the synod. It is an upright stone, seven feet high, and about ten inches broad, bearing a mutilated inscription, which is now illegible. A similar stone, four feet five inches high, and one foot eight inches broad, inscribed only with a cross, serves as a gate-post at the western entrance into the churchyard; and at the eastern entrance is a third, three feet ten inches in height, and one foot two inches in breadth, with an illegible inscription: all these monuments are supposed to have been raised in the early part of the sixth century. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists at Blaen Penal. At Llanio, in this parish, are three ancient inscribed stones, now built up in the walls of two cottages, which probably belonged to the ancient stations at this place: one of these bears an inscription, in rude characters, which has been read Caii Artii Manibus (or memoriae) Ennius Primus; another, "Overioni;" and the third, which now serves as a seat in the porch of one of the cottages, has the inscription "Cohors Secundae Augusta. Fecit Quinque passus." To the south-east of the farm-house is a piece of ground called Caer Castell, in which may still be traced the foundations of ancient buildings. At this place have been found, at various times, Roman coins, bricks, culinary utensils, and other relics of Roman antiquity, which strongly corroborate the opinion of its having been occupied as a Roman station. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £524. 9.

LLANDILO (LLAN-DEILO), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (N.) from Narberth, containing 117 inhabitants. This parish, which is not of very great extent, is pleasantly situated in the eastern part of the county, bordering on Carmarthenshire. It derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Teilo, one of the most eminent saints of British antiquity, who flourished in the latter part of the fifth, and the beginning of the sixth, century. The surface is boldly undulated, and in some parts rises into abrupt eminences, among which are some of the highest summits of the Percelly range of mountains. The lands are but partially enclosed and cultivated; and the soil is various, being in some parts fertile, and in others thin and poor. Slate of good quality is found in abundance within the parish: some quarries of it are worked with advantage, the produce consisting of roofing slates, which are in high estimation. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Llangolman, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, and endowed with £800 royal bounty. There is a place of worship for Independents. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £17. 10.

LLANDILO-ABERCOWAN (LLAN-DEILO-ABER-CYWYN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W. by W.) from Carmarthen, containing 90 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Teilo, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation on the river Cywyn, near its influx into the Tâf, by the æstuary of which latter river, expanding into Carmarthen bay, it is bounded on the south-west. The turnpike road leading from Carmarthen to St. Clear's passes through the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mrs. Hughes. The church is not remarkable for any architectural details, but is pleasantly situated on the eastern bank of the river Cywyn. Adjoining the churchyard was anciently a hospital, called the Pilgrims' Lodge; but no particulars, either of its foundation or its history, are recorded, and the building has long been appropriated to other uses. John Popkin, in 1713, bequeathed £10 to the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £20. 2.

LLANDILO-'R-VÂN (LLAN-DEILO-VÂN), a parish in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. W. by W.)

from Brecknock, containing 585 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on a tract of high ground above the Vale of Usk, and is intersected by three brooks, namely, the Mawen, or Vawen, the Ethrym, and the Cilieni, the two former of which effect a junction near the church, and about a mile lower down flow into the latter, which preserves its name till it falls into the river Usk at Pont Maes. Its north-western extremity, adjoining the hundred of Builth, was formerly called Tŷr yr Abad, or Monksland, and formed part of the possessions of the abbey of Strata Florida, in the county of Cardigan. Llandilo'r Hall, the property of David Watkin Lloyd, Esq., and Noy-add, that of Edward Jones, of Llandovery, Esq., the only seats in the parish, have ceased to be occupied as family mansions, and are both let to tenants. Though, from its more elevated situation, the lands are less fertile than those in the Vale of Usk, they are by no means unproductive; the greater portion is enclosed and well cultivated; and there are extensive tracts of common land, the right of which, as in most of the hilly districts, is considered by the inhabitants as a valuable and important privilege. The village is within three miles of the high road from Brecknock into Carmarthenshire, through Trêcastle. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Llanvihangel Nant Brân annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late Walter Jeffreys, Esq. During the Commonwealth, this living was endowed with £40 per annum out of the sequestered rectory of Merthyr-Cynog, which, however, ceased at the Restoration. The church, dedicated to St. Teilo, is in good repair, and appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. In the northern part of the parish, which anciently belonged to the abbey of Strata Florida, were found, between twenty and thirty years ago, twenty pieces of silver coin of the reign of Edward I., which were carefully wrapped up, and appeared to have been lost, or concealed in a bog. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £211.11.

LLANDILO-VAWR (LLAN-DEILO-VAWR), a parish comprising the market town and liberties of Llandilo-Vawr, and the hamlets of Maenor-Deilo-vabon, Taliaris, and Tŷr Esgob with Rhôs-maen, in the lower division of the hundred of PERVETH; the hamlets of Cwm Garw Llwyd, Maenor-Deilo Upper, Maenor-Deilo Lower, and Tâch Lleian with Rhiw Lâs, in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO; and the hamlets of Brÿn y Beirdd, Glyn-Aman, Pentrêv Cwn, Trêcastell, and Trêgib, in the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 5149 inhabitants, of which number, 1268 are in the town and liberties of Llandilo-Vawr, 15 miles (E. by N.) from Carmarthen, and 202 (W. by N.) from London. The name of this place is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Teilo, an eminent British saint, who flourished towards the close of the fifth, or early in the sixth, century: after his death, his remains, which had been vehemently contended for by this parish, in which he died, by the inhabitants of Pennalum, where his ancestors had been buried, and by those of Llandaf, where he had been bishop, were finally interred at the last-named place. The town, though now one of the most considerable in South Wales, derived all its former importance and present historical interest from the neighbouring castle of Dinas Vawr, or Dynevor, originally erected as a royal palace, by Roderic the Great, sovereign of all Wales. After the death of Roderic, in 877, his dominions were divided into three separate sovereignties, and the seat of government for that of South Wales was removed, for the sake of greater security, from Carmarthen to Dynevor, which was strongly fortified both by nature and art. This castle, in which, in the tenth century, was deposited a copy of the celebrated code of laws compiled and enacted by Hywel Dda, continued to be the residence of the sovereigns of South Wales, till their government was overthrown by the aggression of the Normans, after their conquest of England. In 1142, Cadell, son of Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, a scion of the ancient royal family of South Wales, laid siege to this castle, then held by the Norman usurpers of the circumjacent soil, took it, and retained it in his possession. About the year 1150, his brothers Rhŷs and Meredydd, returning into their own territories, after a successful predatory incursion into the lands of the English vassals, rebuilt this ancient palace of their ancestors, and rendered it stronger than it had ever before been. Rhŷs having made peace with Henry II., that monarch ceded to him the territory of Cantrêv-Mawr, in which Dynevor castle was situated, and also several other lordships at that time in the possession of the English. These territories not being given up according to treaty, Rhŷs again had recourse to arms, and soon obtained them by force, recovering also the other ancient demesnes of his family; and after continuing for some time to spread devastation through the territories of the English vassals in the counties of Cardigan and Pembroke, he returned to Dynevor, laden with spoil and military honour.

From this time until the death of Henry II. Rhŷs remained in quiet possession of Dynevor castle, where, excepting in the case of a formidable attack which he made on the Marches, after the accession of Richard I., he appears to have lived entirely in peace and retirement. In the year 1204, his grandson, Rhŷs ab Gruffydd, made a successful attempt to recover possession of this fortress, which had been seized by his uncle Maelgwyn; but the latter, with the assistance of his brother, Rhŷs Vychan, regained possession of it, and likewise seized nearly all the other possessions of Rhŷs ab Gruffydd and his brother Owain. Under these circumstances the latter chieftains had recourse for assistance to the English monarch, John, who ordered Lord Foulke to demand of Rhŷs Vychan the castle of Llandovery, with its dependent territory, for the support of the brothers Rhŷs and Owain. This application being refused, the English commander, accompanied by these chieftains and all the forces they could collect in the neighbourhood, advanced towards Dynevor, and, meeting on their march the forces of Rhŷs Vychan, a battle ensued, in which that chieftain was defeated with considerable loss, and compelled to retreat upon Dynevor, the garrison of which he reinforced; and, after burning to the ground the town of Llandilo-Vawr, he retired into the most inaccessible parts of the neighbouring country. Foulke and the native chieftains immediately invested the castle, and so pressed the siege, that the garrison surrendered on the following day, on condition of being allowed to depart with their arms. Soon after, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, in alliance with several of the chieftains of South Wales, dispossessed many of the English vassals of the usurped territories in this part of the principality, and, in the partition of them, assigned Dynevor castle, with nearly the whole of Cantrev-Mawr, to Rhys Vychan, who afterwards died at Llandilo-Vawr, in 1233. His son Rhys, having been deprived of his territories, in 1254, by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, who divided them among other chieftains of South Wales, applied for assistance to Henry III.; and that monarch granted him a powerful force, to aid him in the recovery of such of them as were held by his brother Meredydd. With these auxiliaries Rhys came by sea to Carmarthen, and proceeded thence to Dynevor castle, which he immediately invested; but Meredydd ab Owain and Meredydd ab Rhys, reinforced by a large body of troops, sent by Llewelyn, gave the English battle, and, after one of the most sanguinary conflicts which ever took place in this part of the principality, defeated them, with the loss of more than two thousand of their number. Soon after the accession of Edward I. to the English throne, Payen de Chaworth, who commanded that monarch's forces in South Wales, attacked and laid waste the territories of several of the native chieftains, who, despairing of assistance from Llewelyn, Prince of North Wales, made their submission to the English sovereign, and delivered the castle of Dynevor into the hands of his lieutenant. Edward I., about the time of his final invasion of North Wales, also sent an army into South Wales, under the command of the Earl of Gloucester and Sir Edward Mortimer, who, near Llandilo-Vawr, encountered and totally defeated the Welsh army which had been raised to oppose them, but not without sustaining a considerable loss on their own side, five knights, and William de Valence, cousin of Edward I., being slain: this last victory was one of those which completed the final conquest of Wales. In 1287, Rhys ab Meredydd, who had excited an extensive insurrection in South Wales, suddenly besieged and took the castle of Dynevor; but it was afterwards retaken by the English under the Earl of Cornwall, and subsequently demolished. In the reign of Henry VII., it formed part of the family estates of the celebrated Sir Rhys ab Thomas; but on the unjust attainder of his grandson, Rhys ab Gruffydd, in the reign of Henry VIII., it reverted to the crown. In the following reign, Mary restored a small portion of the estates to his son Gruffydd ab Rhys; and Charles I. restored to Sir Henry Rice all the family estates that then remained in the possession of the crown. George Rice, who died in 1782, was created Baron Dynevor, with remainder to his daughter, whose son, the present Lord Dynevor, is proprietor of the ancient castle and its dependent territory.

The town is beautifully situated on an eminence rising from the right bank of the river Towy, over which is a narrow stone bridge of modern erection, and consists of several irregularly formed streets, containing few houses of ancient date which at all agree, either in size or style of building, with the important rank which the place now holds in the county. Within the last few years considerable improvements have taken place, and greater regularity and a more prepossessing appearance have been given to the buildings which have been recently erected: a new road has also been constructed through the churchyard, instead of the old one, which was so steep in this part of its course as to be almost impassable for carriages; and the approach from the town to the bridge has likewise been materially improved. The inhabitants are plentifully supplied with water; but the streets are neither paved nor lighted. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified with hill and dale, and greatly embellished with flourishing plantations: towards the east the view embraces the lofty Carmarthenshire Beacons, and to the west the wooded heights enclosing the Vale of Towy, through which that river winds its majestic course, in a vale of the most luxuriant beauty. In the vicinity are several elegant seats and pleasing villas, the grounds of which add greatly to the beauty and interesting character of the surrounding country. The parish is upwards of thirteen miles in length, from north to south, and about eight in breadth, from east to west. Both the town and parish are intersected by the roads from London to Carmarthen by Brecknock, and from Swansea to Lampeter. The market, which is well supplied with corn, is on Saturday; and fairs are held on February 20th, Palm Monday, and June 4th. The midsummer quarter sessions for the county, and the county court are held here; the latter is held monthly before the under sheriff. The election of a knight for the shire took place here prior to passing the acts relative to amending the representation of the people, which direct that the county members shall be elected at Carmarthen: this has been made one of the polling-places within the county. The town-hall is a respectable building of modern erection, containing the courts for the sessions, and a grand jury room, with a commodious area underneath, in which the corn market is held.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £16, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Teilo, and situated nearly in the centre of the town, is a large heavy building, consisting only of two aisles, and undistinguished by any peculiar architectural features. In the hamlet of Taliaris is a neat chapel, erected by the late Lord Robert Seymour, and endowed with a house and ten acres of land. Formerly there was a chapel of ease to the mother church, called Capel yr Ywen, now in ruins. Within the limits of the parish are four places of worship for Independents, two for Baptists, two for Wesleyan Methodists, and one each for Calvinistic Methodists and Unitarians: of these, three only are in the town, viz., one for Baptists, one for Wesleyan Methodists, and that for Calvinistic Methodists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is endowed with £5 per annum, given by Mrs. Warner, and £4 per annum by Mr. James; and there are some small bequests for apprenticing children and for distribution among the poor. In the vicinity of the town are many interesting ruins. The remains of Dynevor castle, situated at the southwestern extremity of Newton Park, which is within the parish of Llandeveyson, and contains also the modern mansion of Lord Dynevor, comprise a quadrangular area, about thirty-five yards in length and thirty yards in breadth, which was anciently enclosed with lofty walls of massive thickness, and appears to have been defended at the angles by towers, two of which are still standing, namely, a square one on the north, and a large round tower, overhanging a tremendous precipice on the south-east, overlooking the river Towy. About four miles from the town, and in that part of the parish which is in the hundred of Iscennen, are the remains of Carreg Cennen castle, occupying the summit of an isolated rock, nearly one hundred yards in perpendicular height, at the base of which flows the small river Cennen, from which it derives its name. The erection of this fortress is by some writers ascribed to a chieftain named Goronw, and by others to Urien Reged, the remote ancestor of the house of Dynevor, whose ancient territories extended from the river Neath, in Glamorganshire, to the river Towy in the present county of Carmarthen. The simplicity of its architecture certainly bespeaks its early origin; and there can be little doubt of its having been of ancient British construction, although by some it is supposed to possess no claim to an origin more remote than the reign of Henry I. Recent discoveries have only contributed to involve the question in still greater obscurity; some coins of the Emperor Domitian, which have been found here within the last few years, lead to an opinion of its occupation by the Romans; and a stone hatchet has been found in the immediate vicinity, which is evidently of a date anterior to the use of metal in Britain for the construction of military weapons. The only historical event on record concerning it is its re-capture by Rhŷs Vychan, about the year 1248, or 1254, from the English, to whom it had been given by his mother, from motives of personal dislike, in order to prevent it from falling into his hands. This fortress, from its elevated situation and the loftiness of its buildings, forms an interesting and a conspicuous object from many points of view, especially from the direction of Llandebie, from which village is the finest approach to it. The present remains occupy a quadrilateral area, nearly thirty-five yards in length and twenty-five in breadth, and consist chiefly of two square towers on the northern side, which defend the entrance, a large round tower at the north-western angle, and an octangular tower at the north-eastern, where is the principal entrance. On the eastern side of the quadrangle are the remains of several of the principal apartments, and on the southern side is a range of building, consisting of smaller apartments, which were probably the offices of the castle. There appears to have been another entrance, by a covered way leading along the margin of the precipice on which the castle is built, to a gate on the southern side; and a narrow arched passage on the northern side leads by an easy descent to a gallery excavated in the rock, and apparently designed as a well for supplying the castle with water. This gallery is about fifty yards in length, varying in breadth from three to twelve feet, and in height from four to ten, and is lighted at intervals by apertures cut outward through the rock: at the lower extremity is a basin, about four feet from the level of the floor, capable of holding not more than two gallons, and into which the water trickles from the roof. From the summit of the rock on which the castle stands is an extensive and almost boundless prospect over the wide valleys intervening between the lofty mountains by which the site is surrounded. Near the source of the small river Cennen are numerous excavations, the interior surface of which is covered with fine grass: these are supposed to have been habitations of the aboriginal Britons; and, from the names of two farms to the south of Carreg Cennen, the neighbourhood is thought to have been a residence of the Druids, and a scene of their religious solemnities.

Dynevor castle, the modern residence of Lord Dynevor, forms an important feature in the environs of the town, and is described under the head of Llandeveyson, of which parish the park comprises a principal portion. At a short distance to the east of the town, and beautifully situated near the river Towy, is Trêgib, the residence of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Hughes, and now the property of her grandson, the eldest male representative of the late Captain Hughes, who is a minor. In the hamlet of Taliaris is the seat of the late Lord Robert Seymour, formerly part of the extensive property of the Gwynnes of Glânbrân, of which notice occurs in the article on Taliaris. In this parish are also Manorabon, the residence of D. Pughe, Esq., and, exclusively of such as belong to large estates, a greater number of seats and villas of opulent and respectable families, than in any other parish of the same extent in the principality. About five miles to the south of the town is Fynnon Craig Cefel, a chalybeate spring; and in various parts of the parish are several others of inferior note; but the waters of none of them are now used for medicinal purposes. On the opposite side of the river is a remarkable ebbing and flowing well; and at a short distance to the south of Carreg Cennen castle, at a place called Llanduvaen, on the borders of the Black Mountains, are some natural baths, one of which was formerly greatly resorted to by the natives of South Wales, for the cure of paralytic disorders; but they have now lost nearly all their ancient reputation. In the south-eastern part of the parish is the source of the river Llwehwr, or Loughor, which issues from a limestone rock, in a stream of sufficient force to give motion to the machinery of some extensive iron-works at a small distance, and, near its rise, falls over a ledge of rocks eighteen feet in perpendicular height, forming a fine cascade: close to the spring is a spacious natural cavern, in several places exhibiting a pleasing variety of petrifications and stalactites. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole of this parish amounts to £1319. 4.

LLANDINAM (LLAN-DINAM), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. N. E.) from Llanidloes, on the road from Newtown to Aberystwith, containing 1015 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the south-west by the Llandinam mountain, which forms also a boundary between the counties of Montgomery and Radnor, and, rising to the height of one thousand eight hundred feet above the level of the sea, commands from its summit an extensive view of the surrounding country. The village is beautifully situated on the south-eastern bank of the river Severn, which flows smoothly through a narrow but highly cultivated vale, bounded by hanging woods of luxuriant foliage, which in many places impend over its stream, and through which also the road winds in a direction parallel with its course: the scenery of this small vale is pleasingly picturesque, and in some parts highly romantic; and from the summit of Carnedd hill a fine view is obtained of the Vale of Severn, with the windings of the river, and the beautiful country on each of its banks. All the waste lands have been allotted among the freeholders, under the "Arustley Enclosure Act," obtained in 1816, and have chiefly been enclosed and brought under cultivation. The manufacture of flannel is carried on to a moderate extent, affording employment to a portion of the inhabitants. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7. 3. 1½, and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The rectory, divided into two compositions, and valued in the king's books at £22, was, by act of parliament in the 1st of James II., vested in the Dean and Chapter of Bangor, in trust, to appropriate one-third to the augmentation of the vicarages within the said compositions, and the remainder to the repairs of the cathedral church, and the maintenance of its choir. The church, dedicated to St. Llonio, a saint of the sixth century, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower, and is said to have been partly erected with the materials of the ruined fortifications of Caer-Sws: the western entrance is through a lofty and finely pointed arch under the tower, leading into the nave, and the interior is appropriately ornamented. At Pen Halwg, in the township of Hëngynwith, stood an ancient chapel of ease to the mother church, which was rebuilt in 1826, on the site of the former structure, and is situated six miles distant from the parish church: it is a neat plain edifice of stone, adapted to the accommodation of three hundred persons. There are places of worship for Welsh Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, in which the poor children of the parish are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Within the parish are three British encampments, of which the most perfect is that called the "Moat," about a mile nearly south-east from the Roman station at Caer-Sws, in the parish of Llanwnnog: it comprehends a quadrilateral area of about three acres, having the entrance at the lower extremity, and is defended by a strong intrenchment surrounded with a fosse. Connected with this camp is another of smaller dimensions, similarly fortified, and terminating with a high mound of earth entirely surrounded by a broad and deep moat; and about a quarter of a mile distant, on the summit of an eminence, is another, called Caer-Vechan, which, from its greater elevation, appears to have been an exploratory station. Several silver coins of the reign of Edward III., and of later date, have been found in this parish; and near the bridge over the Severn to Caer-Sws an urn containing ashes was discovered, about thirty years ago. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £1447. 4.

and partly in that of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, comprising the market town of Llandovery, and containing 2465 inhabitants. This parish, which takes its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated near the confluence of the rivers Brân and Gwytherig, which, uniting their streams a little above the town of Llandovery, fall into the river Towy. The surface is for the most part undulating; and, with the exception of the summits of a few of the hills, the lands are generally enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The turnpike road from London to Carmarthen intersects the parish; and from the higher grounds some pleasing views are obtained over the romantic Vale of Brân, and the adjacent country. The environs are enlivened by numerous handsome seats, of which the principal within the parish are, Llwyn Brân, the elegant mansion of Major Rice, situated about two miles and a half from the town, embracing within its grounds a pleasing variety of scenery; and Velindre, the seat of Edward Jones, Esq., of which the grounds are tastefully laid out. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Llanvair ar y brÿn annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Dingat, is an ancient building, consisting of two spacious aisles, with a tower, but presents no interesting architectural details: it was once destroyed by the Norman invaders of this part of Wales. The church of Llanvair ar y brÿn is situated within this parish, about a quarter of a mile from Llandovery, and about a mile distant from its own parish. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, all situated in the town of Llandovery, where there is a school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of this and the adjoining parish of Llanvair ar y brÿn: there are also Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. The spot on which the church of Llanvair ar y brÿn is built is supposed by some to have been the site of a Roman station; and Sir R. Colt Hoare considers that, from the number of Roman roads which terminate here, it must have been a station of importance: the intrenchments are at present very indistinct, but Roman coins, bricks, antique lamps, and other relics have been found within the area. According to tradition, this station was called Trê-Gôch, or the "red city," which appellation the same antiquary deduces from its having been originally built of brick: the present remains are very inconsiderable. In the church of Llandingat the celebrated Rees Prichard, commonly known as the "Vicar of Llandovery," who died in 1644, was buried. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, including those of the town of Llandovery, amounts to £596. 5.

LLANDISILIO (LLAN-DYSILIO), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DEYTHUR, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N. N. E.) from Welshpool, on the road to Oswestry, containing 623 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tysilio, a saint who flourished in the sixth century, is situated on the river Vyrnwy, by which it is separated from the county of Salop, and at no great distance from its influx into the Severn: the Montgomeryshire canal passes through the western part of it. The waste and common lands were enclosed under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained for that purpose in the year 1787. The petty sessions for the hundred are held in the village, on the first Friday in every month. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, and in the patronage of the Bishop, by whom the rectory is held in commendam. The church is a neat edifice, in the early style of English architecture, and contains several good monuments to the memory of deceased members of the family of Lloyd of Domgay. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A Sunday school, in connexion with the established church, in which the children of the parish receive gratuitous instruction, is supported by subscription. David Jones, in 1696, gave some land for the relief of ten poor persons; and Peter Jones also gave a portion of land for the relief of the poor in general: the produce of these benefactions is annually appropriated according to the intention of the donors. Offa's Dyke may be distinctly traced in its progress through this parish, in which also are some obvious remains of an ancient Roman road pointing northwards towards Chester. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £381. 13.

LLANDISSILIO (LLAN-DYSILIO), a parish, partly in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, and partly in that of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. by E.) from Narberth, on the road to Cardigan, containing 1025 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is about five miles in length and four in breadth, and comprises two divisions, which are respectively situated in the counties of Carmarthen and Pembroke, each separately maintaining its own poor: the lands are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil is in general fertile. It constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £12. 9.  $4\frac{1}{2}$ , and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Tysilio, has no architectural claims to notice. In the churchyard, leaning against the south side of the church, is an ancient stone of large dimensions, with the inscription, in rude characters, LVTORICI. FIL. PAVLINI. MARINI LATIO: it was dug from under a heap of rubbish by the present incumbent, in the year 1827, and placed by him in its present situation: a tradition, however, of its existence had been preserved in the parish, which led to its discovery. There is a place of worship for Baptists in that division of the parish which is in the county of Carmarthen, and one for Independents in that which is in the county of Pembroke. Morris Jones, Esq., in 1621, bequeathed a rent-charge of £2, payable out of his farm of Cae Helig, in the parish of Wrexham, county of Denbigh, to be distributed in white bread among the poor of this parish. John Matthias, of Kilvaur, bequeathed £1. 1. per annum for a sermon on the uncertainty of human life, to be preached here annually on the second Sunday in June. Cicely Morris, by deed enrolled in 1776, gave £2. 2. per annum for the instruction of five poor children of this parish, and £2. 2. per annum for apprenticing them to some trade; these sums are chargeable on lands in the parish, and are duly appropriated according to the intention of the benefactress. On the farm of Cäsgrwŷn, in that part of the parish which is in the county of Pembroke, is an ancient encampment, comprising a semicircular area, two hundred and forty yards in circumference, with an entrance fifteen yards in width: the aspect is towards the west, and commands an extensive tract of country: small cannon balls have been turned up by the plough in its vicinity. Another encampment of similar form, and commanding the same tract of country, is seen on a farm called Portispark, in that part of the parish which is in the county of Carmarthen: it is situated on an eminence, and includes an area of which the chord is one hundred and thirty yards in length. On the farm of Llwyn-ybol is a circular encampment, thirty yards in diameter, surrounded by a rampart three feet high: in the centre are two stones, four feet in height, and in a position inclining from the perpendicular. There were formerly about twenty of these, varying in height; and at the distance of two hundred yards to the north-west is a small circle, within which are two erect stones, from four to five feet in height, near which it is supposed was formerly a third stone, so placed as to form an altar. Two avenues of stones, in opposite directions, but both tending to the circular enclosure, may still be traced; and around this relic of British antiquity are scattered numerous barrows, varying in dimensions, in one of which, on its being cut through in forming the present road from Narberth to Cardigan, was found an entire vessel, rudely formed of coarse pottery. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £270. 5., of which sum, £179. 2. is raised on that part which is in the county of Carmarthen, and £91. 3. on that in the county of Pembroke.

LLANDOUGH (LLAN-DÔCH), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{4}$  mile (S.) from Cowbridge, containing 118 inhabitants. This parish is separated from that of St. Hilary by the river Ddaw, which winds through a beautiful little valley, richly wooded, and abounding with pleasing and picturesque scenery. On an eminence above the river, a little to the west of the village, are the remains of Llandoough castle, the castellated mansion successively the residence of the Welsh families of Vychan and Walche, which have been incorporated with a handsome modern mansion, now the residence of Lieutenant-Colonel Morgan. The substratum of the soil is limestone, interspersed with sandstone; and the lands are in general enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The living is a discharged rectory, united to that of St. Mary-church, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 9., and in the patronage of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Dôchdwy, is a small neat structure, and contains some ancient monuments, among which is one to the family of Walche, consisting of recumbent effigies of a male representative of that family and his lady.

A few children are gratuitously instructed, chiefly at the expense of the family of Lieut. - Col. Morgan. To the south-east of the church are the remains of a small British encampment; and, within four hundred yards of it, a great number of human bones has been discovered, supposed to be those of individuals killed in the numerous and sanguinary battles which took place between the natives and the early Norman settlers. The Rev. John Walters, M.A., an eminent Welsh divine and critic, and author of an English and Welsh Dictionary, was for some time rector of this parish: he died in 1794. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £37. 1.

LLANDOUGH-(LLAN-DÔCH), or LLAN-DOCHE-PENARTH, a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Cardiff, containing 119 inhabitants. This place is supposed by some writers to have been the site of an ancient monastery, founded in the fifth century for twelve monks, or canons, and dedicated to the Holy Trinity, by St. Cyngarus, which was afterwards amply endowed by Paulentus, at that time King of Gwent. St. Cyngarus, who is also called Docuinus, and who, according to Bishop Tanner, came into this part of the country about the year 474, has by other writers been identified with the British saint Dôchdwy, who is said to have accompanied Cadvan into Wales in the early part of the sixth century; and the parish church, which is dedicated to that saint, has consequently been regarded as the original church of the monastery. But this conjecture is not supported by any satisfactory authority, nor has it been confirmed by the discovery of any remains of the conventual buildings which may naturally be supposed to have belonged to such an establishment. The village is pleasantly situated on a finely wooded eminence, on the west bank of the Ely, about a mile above its fall into Penarth harbour, overlooking a large level tract, which is intersected by the rivers Ely and Tâf, and commanding an extensive and interesting view of the surrounding country, which abounds with richly varied scenery. The exhalations from the marshes below are unfavourable to the health of the inhabitants, who are consequently subject to attacks of ague. Limestone is the prevailing substratum of the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, with the rectory of Leckwith and the vicarage of Cogan annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. The church, a very ancient structure, is evidently of a period anterior to the introduction of the English style of architecture, though some windows of that character have been inserted: it is neatly fitted up, and kept in good repair. In the churchyard is the shaft of an ancient circular cross, ornamented with scrolls and tracery, but without any legible inscription. A National school, in which from fifty to sixty children are gratuitously instructed, is supported at the joint expense of the Marquis of Bute and the rector of the parish: a neat school-house, with apartments for the mistress, has been erected by subscription, aided by a grant from the parent society in London. Cogan Pill, the ancient family seat of the Herberts, a branch of the family of that name near Swansea, has been converted into a farm-house, the grand hall having been appropriated as a barn: the Herberts of this county were ancestors of the Earls of Pembroke and Warwick. At a short distance from the church, to the south-east, is a small circular mound, commanding the entrances of the rivers Ely and Tâf, and probably an outpost for the defence of those rivers, communicating with those at Whitchurch, Romney Bridge, and Cardiff. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £42. 15.

LLANDOVERY, an incorporated market town, in the parish of LLANDINGAT, hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 27 miles (E. N. E.) from Carmarthen, and 187 (W. by N.) from London, on the road from London through Brecknock to Carmarthen, containing 1766 inhabitants. The present name of this place is an obvious corruption of its ancient Welsh appellation, Llan ym Ddyfri, or Llan ym Ddyvroedd, signifying "the church among the waters," and is derived from the situation of its church on a level promontory between the river Towy and the stream formed by the union of the rivers Brân and Gwydderig, which here falls into the former river. By some writers the town is supposed to have had its origin in the establishment of a Roman station within a quarter of a mile of its present site, an opinion which is strengthened by the discovery of numerous Roman coins, bricks, and fragments of pottery: but it is equally probable that, like many other towns in South Wales, it owes its origin to the erection of its castle, the early history of which is very imperfectly known. Its original foundation, however, may be ascribed to some of the Norman settlers in this part of the principality, to enable them to retain the territories which they had usurped from the native proprietors. The first authentic historical notice concerning it occurs in the reign of Henry I., about the year 1113, when it was occupied by Richard de Pons; and in 1116 it was attacked by Gruffydd ab Rhys, who burned the outer ward, and slew part of the garrison; but he sustained so great a loss in this attempt to reduce it, that he was disabled from pursuing his advantage, and compelled to abandon the siege. In 1158, Rhys ab Gruffydd, one of the most powerful chieftains of South Wales, laid siege to the castle, of which he made himself master; and on the death of Meredydd ab Rhys, in 1201, it was seized by his brother Gruffydd ab Rhys, on whose death in the following year it fell into the hands of his brother Maelgwyn. In 1204, Rhys, son of Gruffydd ab Rhys, attacked the castle of Llandovery, in order to recover it from his uncle Maelgwyn, and succeeded in obtaining possession, but did not long retain it; for Maelgwyn, assisted by Gwenwynwyn, Prince of Powys, soon wrested it from him: Rhys, however, subsequently succeeded in his efforts to recover it. In 1208, Rhys Vychan, brother of Maelgwyn, having entered into hostilities against his nephews Rhys and Owain, obtained from the English monarch a supply of troops, with the aid of which he invested the castle of Llandovery, the garrison of which fortress, having no prospect of relief, surrendered it to him on condition of being allowed to depart with their arms and property. Rhys and his brother Owain, having complained to King John of the violent proceedings of their uncles, that monarch sent to demand the fortress of Llandovery, with the dependent territory, for the support of the young chieftains; but Rhys Vychan, neglecting to comply with this demand, Rhŷs ab Gruffydd, aided by a party of English auxiliaries, recovered possession of it by assault in 1214. It appears, nevertheless, to have been repossessed by Rhŷs Vychan; for, in 1226, it was surrendered by him to his son, by whom he had been taken prisoner, as the price of his liberation from captivity. After the entire subjugation of the principality by Edward I., the castle of Llandovery became vested in the English crown, and was garrisoned by the king; but, during the absence of that monarch in France, an alarming insurrection was excited in South Wales by Rhŷs ab Meredydd, who, for his instrumentality in the subjugation of his country, had been knighted by Edward, and who, among other fortified places in this part of the principality, besieged and reduced this castle. Few particulars are henceforward recorded of it till the time of the parliamentary war, during which it is supposed to have been demolished by Cromwell.

The town is pleasantly situated in the upper part of the Vale of Towy, on the banks of the river Brân, and consists principally of two streets meeting nearly at right angles. Leland describes it, in the reign of Henry VIII., as "poor built, of thatched houses;" but since that period great improvement has taken place, and the houses at present are well built and of respectable appearance. The streets are partially paved, and the entire town, which was lighted for the first time with oil, in the winter of 1831, is abundantly supplied with water, which, passing over a gravelly bottom, is beautifully transparent, and of excellent quality. Balls and concerts take place occasionally at the assembly-rooms at the Castle Inn. About a mile above the town the river Towy is crossed by a handsome stone bridge of one arch, eighty-three feet in the span, built by William Edwards, the ingenious self-taught architect of the celebrated Pont y Prydd; and a handsome iron suspension bridge is now in progress of erection over the same river, about one mile westward from the town, on the road to Llandilo-Vawr, by subscription, the interest to be paid by a toll: the first stone was laid by Col. Gwynne, April 18th, 1832. The appearance of the neighbourhood is enlivened by several gentlemen's seats. A road of modern construction, which leads from Llandovery eastward towards Brecknock, winding through a deep valley round the base of the Black Mountains, exhibits a succession of the most romantic scenery. The trade is very inconsiderable, consisting only of what is necessary for supplying the consumption of the town and its neighbourhood, which latter is inhabited by several families of great respectability. The market, which is well supplied with corn, and with provisions of all kinds, is held on Wednesday and Saturday, the latter being the principal, in a commodious area under the town-hall. The fairs are on the first Wednesday after the 17th of January, March 19th, the Wednesday after Low Sunday; Whit-Tuesday, which is called the Bailiff's fair; July 31st; the Wednesday after the 10th of October; and November 26th, for horses, cattle, and sheep, and the following day for pigs. The inhabitants were first incorporated by Richard I., who made this place a free borough, and invested it with many privileges, which, though confirmed by Henry VIII., who made it a contributory borough to Carmarthen, and afterwards by Elizabeth, have, with the elective franchise, fallen into disuse. By these charters the government was vested in a bailiff, recorder, and burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, two serjeants at mace, and four constables, who still continue to be chosen annually, though they exercise no magisterial functions. The bailiff, who is also coroner within the borough, is elected by the burgesses; the recorder is appointed by the lord of the manor; and the burgesses, who are unlimited in number, are self-elected. The corporation were empowered to hold various courts, which have been discontinued; and the town is entirely under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, who hold petty sessions for the hundred every Saturday, in a room over the lock-up house. Llandovery is one of the polling places, appointed under the late Reform Act, in the election of a member for the county. The town-hall, erected in 1752, at the expense of the corporation, is a commodious building, containing rooms for the transaction of the municipal business, under which is an area for the corn market.

There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The Salem Chapel, belonging to the Independents, is a spacious and handsome structure, capable of containing upwards of two thousand persons. A National school is supported by subscription, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of the parishes of Llandingat and Llanvair ar y brŷn, and their immediate neighbourhood: at present there are seventy children in this school. An infants' school, in which are from forty to fifty children, was established in 1829, and, by permission of the lord-lieutenant of the county, a room, formerly used as a dépôt for arms, has been appropriated to its use. There are Sunday schools, in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations, in which from three to four hundred children are instructed. A tract of woodland, about sixty acres in extent, situated within a mile of the town, in the parish of Llandingat, was left to the poor burgesses of Llandovery, many centuries ago, and is noticed in the charter of Richard I. Some remains of the ancient castle occupy the summit of a rocky eminence on the western bank of the river Brân: they consist of part of the keep and the intrenchments by which the works were surrounded; and the entire fortress, which does not appear to have been of very great extent, seems to have been suited rather for effective defence than domestic comfort. The Rev. Rees Prichard, Vicar of Llandingat, but better known as "the Vicar of Llandovery," was a native of this place. He is celebrated as the writer of a work called Canwyll y Cymry, "the Welshman's Candle," but more generally known under the title of Llyfr y Ficer, or "the Vicar's Book," comprising one hundred and seventy poems on religious subjects, written in the Welsh language with so much simplicity of style as to be perfectly intelligible to the most uncultivated understanding. This highly useful work is generally learned by heart by the Welsh peasantry, and forms a companion to the Bible in almost every cottage in the principality. Mr. Prichard bequeathed a house, and land of the value of £20 per annum, for the foundation of a free school in his native town; but either through neglect, or by a commutation with the Vicar's family for a sum of money, which has been either lost or expended on other objects, the intentions of the testator have not been carried into effect. This venerated man was born in 1575, and, after a long life devoted to the welfare of his parishioners in particular, and the religious improvement of his countrymen in general, died in 1644.

LLANDOW, called by the Welsh LLAN-DŴV, a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Cowbridge, containing 138 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £7. 4. 4½., and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is a very small edifice of considerable antiquity. The parsonage-house is also a very ancient building, apparently coeval with the church: attached to the living are fifty-eight acres of glebe land. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £51. 4.

LLANDOWROR, a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from St. Clear's, on the road from Carmarthen to Haverfordwest, containing 420 inhabitants. This parish appears to derive its name from its situation between the two waters of the rivulet Hîrwaun and the river Tâf, which last abounds with salmon and excellent trout, and is here navigable at high tides for boats. The lands are partly enclosed and cultivated, and a considerable portion is covered with underwood: the surrounding scenery is pleasing, and is characterized by some richly wooded heights, following the courses of these two streams. Within the limits of the parish is one of the finest quarries in the county, producing stone of excellent quality for building, and the working of which affords employment to such of the labouring inhabitants as are not engaged in agriculture. A new line of road, constructed to avoid the steep ascent of Llandowror hill to Tavernspite, on the border of Pembrokeshire, was completed in 1830, and extends from the village of Llandowror until it joins the road to Milford, considerably south of the former; it is intended to continue this line to St. Clear's. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart. The church is dedicated to St. Cringat. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. David Lloyd, of Woodhouse, in the parish of Laugharne, in 1711, bequeathed £40, the interest of which is appropriated to the clothing of poor children; and Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart., allows £5 per annum for the instruction of twelve children of the parish: a school-room has been built by subscription. The Welsh circulating charity schools originated with the Rev. Griffith Jones, who for forty-five years was rector of this parish: he died in 1761, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and was buried in the church, in which a handsome mural tablet was erected to his memory by Mrs. Bridget Bevan, of Laugharne, who had for many years attended his ministry, and after her death, in 1779, was, by her own previous request, interred by his side: this lady bequeathed £10,000 for the permanent support of these schools, which sum, during a course of litigation for twenty years accumulated to £30,000, vested in the three per cents., and at present amounting to £31,486. 12. 2. There are now twenty-nine of these highly useful establishments in South Wales, and nine in North Wales, periodically circulating from one parish to another: they are under the control of a committee of management, and subject to annual visitation: each schoolmaster receives £20 per annum, and the master of the central school at Newport, where the teachers are instructed in the National system, receives a salary of £40 per annum. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £76. 4.

LLANDRILLO (LLAN-DRILLO), a parish in the hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Corwen, containing 806 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is beautifully situated on the banks of the river Dee, and near the rivulet Ceidio, which, after heavy rains, becomes a torrent. It extends more than four miles in length, and three and a half in breadth, through the rich and fertile vale of Edeyrnion, and is bounded on the south by the noble range of the Berwyn mountains, of which the highest point, called Cader Berwyn, is within the parish. About three-fourths of the lands are enclosed, and a great part is in a good state of cultivation. Peat is procured in great quantities for fuel; and on the Berwyn mountain there is a quarry of excellent slate. The village is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road from Corwen to Bala and Dinasmowddwy, and at the entrance of an extensive glen in the vale, terminated by the lofty range of mountains which forms the southern boundary of the parish. The surrounding scenery is finely diversified with features of sublimity and rich luxuriance, and the distant views are grand and extensive. From Cader Verwyn are seen the beautiful vales of Edeyrnion and Penllyn, in all their variety of scenery; and, in the distance, the principal mountains in North Wales, and in the counties of Chester, Salop, Denbigh, Worcester, Stafford, and Lancaster. Fairs are held annually on February 25th, May 3rd, June 29th, August 28th, and November 14th. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph: the rectory, which is a sinecure annexed to the see of St. Asaph, is rated in the king's books at £15. 16. 3.; and the vicarage, which is discharged, at £7. 17. 1.: the latter is in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Trillo, is a small ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a square embattled tower at the western end. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, to all of which Sunday schools are attached; and it is in contemplation to establish a parochial school on the National system, for the gratuitous education of the poor children of the parish. Hugh Jones, in 1738, bequeathed £75, the interest of which is distributed among the poor according to the will of the testator. Bwlch y Maen Gwynedd, a pass in the Berwyn range, is memorable as the place where Roderic the Great appointed a meeting of the Princes of Gwynedd and Powys, in order to adjust any differences and settle any disputes which might arise between those chieftains; and on the same range, and within the limits of the parish, is a large flat stone, probably the table stone of a cromlech, called Bwrdd Arthur, or "Arthur's Table." In a field called Cae'r Bont is a circular intrenchment, surrounded with a fosse and defended by ramparts of considerable strength; and on the summit of a hill immediately above it is a circle of stones, twelve yards in diameter, within which was formerly a circular cell, six feet in diameter: at the distance of one hundred yards are the remains of a large carnedd, eighteen yards in diameter, and about twenty yards from these the remains of two smaller carneddau. On a hill, a little above the village, are vestiges of another intrenchment, and on the hills in various parts of the parish are other remains of British antiquity. Fynnon Maen Milgi, "the spring of the greyhound stone," a remarkably fine stream, issues from the Berwyn mountains; and near the village is a spring, called Fynnon Trillo, to the waters of which miraculous efficacy in the cure of various diseases was anciently attributed, and which are still thought to be highly beneficial in several cases. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £450. 1.

LLANDRILLO YN RHÔS (LLAN-DRILLO-YN-RHÔS), a parish, partly in the hundred of CREUDDYN, county of CARNARVON, but chiefly in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, on the shore of the Irish sea, 5 miles (N.E.) from Aberconway, containing 1133 inhabitants. The village of Llandrillo is composed of three houses only: the townships in that part of the parish which is in Denbighshire are united for the maintenance of their poor; while that of Eirias, which forms the Carnarvonshire portion of it, supports its poor separately. There are four weirs along the shore, where an immense quantity of fish, of various kinds, is taken during the season, particularly mackerel and salmon: one only of these, namely that which formerly belonged to the monks of Aberconway, pays tithe, the capture at every tenth tide being divided between the bishop, as rector, and the vicar, three-fourths to the former, and one-fourth to the latter. A considerable quantity of limestone is shipped hence to Liverpool. The living consists of a sinecure rectory and a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph: the former, rated in the king's books at £27. 1. 3., is held in commendam by the Bishop of St. Asaph, who is also patron of the latter, which is rated at £8. 15. 10. The church, dedicated to St. Trillo, is a large handsome structure, situated on a high rock of limestone, and consists of a nave, chancel, north aisle, and a lofty square modern tower: the east window is in the later style of English architecture, and contains some elegant specimens of ancient stained glass: in one compartment is a fine head of Marchudd, founder of one of the fifteen noble tribes of North Wales, above which are the arms of Ednyved Vychan, counsellor and leader of the armies of Llewelyn the Great, and a successful warrior against the English: in the others are figures in flowing drapery, representing the tribes of Wales. Ednyved Vychan obtained a license from the pope to build a chapel adjoining this church, the only remains of which are part of two old arches in the north wall. There are places of worship for Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists and Presbyterians. A large and handsome building of stone, roofed with slate, was erected in 1819, for a National school, at an expense of nearly £400, which was raised by subscription, aided by a grant of £50 from the National Society: it presents a singular appearance, from its situation in the midst of lofty limestone rocks: the school is supported by voluntary contributions, and at present affords instruction to about one hundred and forty children of both sexes. The poor derive benefit from several small bequests, amounting in the whole to about £17 per annum, which is distributed among them on St. Thomas's day. On the shore, at the distance of a mile to the north-east of the church, stands a very small chapel with a vaulted roof, called St. Trillo's, of singular appearance, being of an oblong form, with a window on each side and at the end, and entered by a small door: it is built over a well. A quarter of a mile southward from the church is a strongly fortified hill, called Bryn Euryn, at the foot of which are the ruins of a large building, called Llŷs Bryn Euryn, erected by Ednyved Vychan, as a residence for himself and his descendants, who procured a license from the pope to build a chapel near it, with permission to give all his tithes and oblations to the officiating chaplain. It was burned down, in 1409, by Owain Glyndwr; but the remains were modernized, and occupied by some female members of that family, named Conway, (the descendants of Sir Tudwr ab Ednyved, who was one of the commissioners for negotiating terms of peace between Edward I. and Llewelyn, and resided here so late as the reign of Charles II.), who contributed largely towards defraying the expense of erecting the tower of the church. In the township of Eirias is the noted well called Fynnon Eilian, which, even in the present age, is annually visited by some hundreds of people, for the reprehensible purpose of invoking curses upon the heads of those who have grievously offended them. The ceremony is performed by the applicant standing upon a certain spot near the well, whilst the owner of it reads a few passages of the sacred scriptures, and then, taking a small quantity of water, gives it to the former to drink, and throws the residue over his head, which is repeated three times, the party continuing to mutter his imprecations in whatever terms his vengeance may dictate. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the entire parish amounts to £555. 8., of which sum, £441. 5. is raised for that portion in the county of Denbigh.

LLANDRINDOD, a parish in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Penybont, containing 182 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to the Holy Trinity, is celebrated for the variety and efficacy of its mineral springs, the virtue of which appears to have been discovered at a very remote period, most probably by the Romans, of whose occupation of this part of the country numerous vestiges are found in the immediate vicinity. The parish is bounded on the west by the river Ithon, a stream noted for its trout and graylings. The surface is generally hilly, with several extensive commons of lower elevation: the soil is for the most part of an inferior quality, and extensive tracts are allowed to remain uncultivated. The horizon is bounded by an entire amphitheatre of hills, the sides of some of which are agreeably diversified by small plantations; and although the prevailing aspect of the country is remarkably wild, it has in its more retired parts numerous specimens of picturesque beauty. The mineral waters to which this place owes its importance appear to have been used from time immemorial by the inhabitants of the immediate neighbourhood; but their efficacy was not generally known till about the close of the seventeenth century, when their reputation being published at a distance, this place first became the resort of strangers. Its rise, notwithstanding, was very slow, and frequently interrupted; and it was not till about the year 1749 that it attained any note as a place of fashionable resort for invalids. About this period, Mr. Grosvenor, of Shrewsbury, took the leases of several houses in this parish, with a considerable tract of land: the houses he converted into a spacious hotel, capable of accommodating several hundred visitors; and among the alterations and additions which he made for this purpose was a suite of rooms for balls, concerts, and billiards, with shops for the supply of the visitors with the various articles of use or luxury for which they might have occasion during their residence at this place. The land he laid out in pleasure grounds, with plantations, shrubberies, and walks, tastefully disposed and ornamented: fishponds were formed in different parts of the grounds, and a portion of the land was appropriated for a race-course. This extensive and complete establishment, which formed one of the most fashionable places of resort in the principality, continued to flourish for nearly fifty years, when, becoming a rendezvous chiefly for fashionable gamblers and libertines, the then proprietor of the estate, from religious motives, caused the place to be taken down, and nothing now remains to remind the visitor of its former splendour but the sites of the fishponds, and a small farm-house erected upon the site of one of the old dining-rooms of "Llandrindod Hall."

Within the last twenty years, however, this place has been gradually recovering from the decay into which it had fallen: the reputation of its waters attracted the attention of numerous visitors; but the want of accommodation continued to be a subject of reiterated complaint, and a great obstacle to its prosperity, until remedied by the exertions of Mr. Owen, the lessee of the wells, and the present proprietor of the Pump-House Inn and Boarding-House, which he has adapted to the comfortable accommodation of from sixty to eighty guests. In addition to these is a respectable boarding establishment, called the Rock House, and in the parish are numerous farm-houses, in which private lodgings may be obtained. There are three different springs, called, respectively, the rock or chalybeate, the saline pump water, and the sulphureous spring: there is also a spring called the eye water, supposed to be efficacious in diseases of the eye. The rock, or chalybeate, water issues from a slaty rock, near the boarding-house to which it gives name: according to an analysis to which it has been subjected, a gallon of this water contains fifty-seven grains of muriate of lime, forty-eight grains and three-fourths of muriate of magnesia, two hundred and thirty-nine grains of muriate of soda, three grains and two-fifths of carbonate of lime, one grain and a third of silex, and nearly six grains and one-fifth of carbonate of iron. The saline spring is situated within the grounds of the pump-house: one gallon of this water contains sixty-seven grains of muriate of lime, twenty-five grains of muriate of magnesia, two hundred and forty-two grains of muriate of soda, five grains and one-fifth of vegetable matter, and three-fifths of a grain of carbonate of magnesia. The sulphureous spring is situated within a hundred yards to the south of the saline spring: one gallon of the water contains fifty-four grains of muriate of lime, thirty-one grains and two-fifths of muriate of magnesia, two hundred and sixteen grains and three-tenths of muriate of soda, and six grains of vegetable matter: this water is best adapted for artificial baths, but, like the saline water, is also taken internally. The waters are recommended to be drunk in the morning, and upon an empty stomach, in moderate quantities, and, when used both internally and externally, have been found very beneficial in numerous chronic cases, among which may be enumerated, rheumatism, gout, inveterate ulcers, and scrofula. The saline and sulphureous springs, which are both situated within the grounds of the Pump-House Inn and Boarding-House, are particularly recommended by the most eminent physicians in London, and their efficacy is thoroughly established in the following disorders; namely, diseased livers, indigestion, gravel, cutaneous distempers, and general debility, whether arising from sedentary habits, or from too free a use of vinous and spirituous liquors. The rock water is only drunk in particular cases, and then after a course of the former. The sulphur water is considered to be the best adapted to external applications, and is therefore sometimes used as a bath. The air is remarkably salubrious, and the sequestered retirement of the situation is highly favourable to the purposes of health: the neighbourhood affords extensive and interesting equestrian excursions, and to sportsmen unlimited range for shooting and fishing; and in the vicinity of the village are numerous pleasant walks. These advantages, uniting with the powerful efficacy of the waters, have rendered this place a favourite resort of invalids; and the many comfortable accommodations which are provided for visitors, and the agreeable society to be found in this interesting but sequestered spot, attract to it during the season a large concourse of visitors. The season commences about the beginning of June, and generally continues till the middle or end of October, and is enlivened by occasional balls, under the arrangement of the parties living at the pump-rooms, and confined to the inmates of their respective houses. The turnpike road from Builth, in the county of Brecknock, to Newtown in that of Montgomery, passes through the parish, along which a coach from Bristol, Swansea, Merthyr-Tydvil, and Brecknock, runs three days in the week to the Pump-House: the inhabitants receive their letters from the post-office at Penybont.

This parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £5. 8. 9., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is a plain ancient edifice, in decent repair, but presenting no architectural details of importance: it is situated at the edge of an extensive common, near the river Ithon. Two benefactions of £10 each, one of which was given to the parish by the Rev. Philip Lewis, and the other by Mr. John William Meredith, are now secured on lands, and the interest is annually divided among decayed farmers of this parish. Within the limits of the parish are several remains of British and Roman antiquity. On the common, just below the church, is a quadrilateral intrenchment, nearly one hundred yards in circuit, defended by a vallum, the angles of which are all rounded off: the remains of the rampart are still visible on the south and west sides. At the eastern extremity of the common, above the village of Howey, are some tolerably perfect remains of an encampment, nearly circular in form, enclosing an area of about fifty yards in diameter, surrounded by an exterior vallum, and having entrances only on the east and west: it occupies the gentle declivity of an undulating surface, and, from its form and contiguity to other Roman works, has been supposed to be the remains of a circus or amphitheatre for the celebration of games; but the area is quite inadequate to that purpose, and its position and construction are ill adapted for the accommodation of spectators. Near it are some very faint traces of another encampment, nearly square, with two of the angles rounded, and having the appearance of projecting bastions. These various remains, which have been described in one of the volumes of the Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries as "Campi Æstivi," are placed at irregular distances along the common, contiguous to the track of an ancient paved road, which is supposed to have been a vicinal way from an encampment on the banks of the Ithon, in the parish of Llanvihangel-Helygen, on a farm called Cwm. The form of the camps is quadrilateral, with the angles rounded off, and each generally contains within the embankment an area twenty-five or thirty yards square: they have entrances on each of the four sides, and adjacent to those into a few of them may be distinguished a slightly elevated spot, supposed by some to have been the station of a centinel; but the valla, which in no instance are more than two feet in height above the ground, are very indistinct. The common on which they are situated is so deeply furrowed in every direction with the turf spade, and marked by embanked enclosures, that, except in some particular places, where the lines of the camps are very strongly defined, it is extremely difficult to ascertain their precise form, or to discover their origin. On the same common are the remains of seven barrows, five of which are near each other, and the other two at a small distance from them: they have been opened, and were found to contain some rudely formed urns, with ashes of human bones. Near the church is an ancient lead mine, which is said to have been originally worked by the Romans: the shaft is three feet square, and is said to be three hundred feet in depth, with a level three-quarters of a mile in length: it has been worked within the last few years, but it is not at present in operation. The foundations of an ancient chapel were discovered in a corn-field a few years since: it was called "Capel Vaelon," but nothing is known of its history. In a field belonging to the farm rented with the pump-rooms, many silver coins of the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. and II., have been dug up. The present venerable incumbent of this parish, now nearly eighty years of age, and equally respected for his talents and his virtues, has served the church of Llandrindod for the long period of fifty-one years, of which he has been in the enjoyment of the benefice upwards of thirty years, and still continues zealously to perform the duties of his sacred office with punctuality. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £83. 16.

LLANDRINIO (LLAN-DRINIO), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of DEYTHUR, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 9 miles (N. E. by N.) from Welshpool, containing 863 inhabitants. This parish is situated at the eastern extremity of the county, on the road from Shrewsbury to Bala through Llan-vyllin, in an angle near the confluence of the rivers Severn and Vyrnwy, over the former of which, near the church, is a stone bridge of three arches. It is considered to be one of the most fertile in the principality, the lands contiguous to those rivers being covered, when they overflow their banks, with a rich slimy sediment, which contributes materially to increase their fertility. The waste lands were enclosed under an act of parliament passed in 1787, and are now in a good state of cultivation. The river Severn, which is here navigable, bounds the parish on the east and south-east; and the Montgomeryshire canal intersects the western part of it, through which also passes the road from Welshpool to Oswestry. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of New Chapel annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £24. 16. 10½., and held in commendam by the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Trinio, an ancient structure in the early style of English architecture, was thoroughly repaired and the steeple rebuilt in the year 1829, at which time thirty-eight additional sittings were formed, which, together with forty formerly appropriated, were made free, in consideration of a grant from the Incorporated Society for building, enlarging, and repairing churches and chapels: in the churchyard are thirteen fine yew trees of luxuriant growth. There is a place of worship for Independents. A National school, in which sixty children are at present instructed, is supported by subscription: the school-house was erected in 1827, partly by subscription and partly by a grant of £100 from the National School Society in London. Mrs. Margaret Pitts, in 1722, bequeathed £40 to the poor of Tredderwen Veibion Gwnas, in this parish; Mrs. Long bequeathed £20 to seven poor widows; and Mrs. Mary Derwas bequeathed £100, the interest of which she directed to be applied to the purchase of gowns for the poor: the interest of these sums, together with that of £15 bequeathed by Mrs. Aldersey, is annually distributed among the poor. Mr. Evans also bequeathed £100 to the poor of this parish, but his bequest was rendered invalid by the statute of mortmain. Offa's Dyke passes through the western part of the parish, and may be distinctly traced. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £397. 12.

LLANDRYGARN (LLAN-DRYGARN), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. W.) from Llanerchymedd, containing, with the chapelry of Gwyndy, 449 inhabitants. This parish is chiefly distinguished as having been the residence of Rhys ab Llewelyn ab Hwlkyn, who, for his services at the battle of Bosworth Field, was by mandate of Henry VII. permitted to assume the surname of Bôdychan, from his family mansion, and appointed first sheriff of Anglesey, which office he held till his decease. Of this ancient mansion, one of the towers, of which there are still some remains, was formerly used as the county prison, and the other parts have been converted into a barn and farm-offices. The chapelry of Gwyndy appears to have derived that appellation from the White House, formerly the half-way hotel and posting-house between Bangor and Holyhead, but which, since the building of the bridge at Bangor, and the diversion of the road, has fallen into comparative disuse. A branch post-office is kept here, under the office at Bangor, for the accommodation of families resident in the neighbourhood. This parish formerly constituted part of the parish of Holyhead. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Bôdwrog, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Trygan, is a small and very ancient structure. Dr. Wynne, chancellor of Llandaf, gave a portion of the tithes to the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford, in trust for the poor of this parish; and there are some other charitable donations and bequests, of which the produce is annually distributed according to the will of the benefactors. In the chapelry of Gwyndy, large hammers rudely formed of trap rock, and handmills of various sizes, made of chert, marble, and freestone, of which the smaller were rudely, and the larger well, formed, have at various times been found. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £197. 1.

LLANDUDNO (LLAN-DUDNO), a parish in the hundred of CREUDDYN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Aberconway, containing 662 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shore of the Irish sea, and comprises the promontory called by the Welsh Gogarth, and by the English Great Orme's Head. It is bounded on the north and west by the Irish sea, and on the south by the æstuary of the river Conway; and is connected with the main land, on the east, by a narrow isthmus of sand, intersected by a small valley through which the tide formerly flowed, thus nearly insulating it. The bay of Llandudno is one of the finest on this coast, extending in the form of a crescent from the base of the promontory to the Lesser Orme's Head, without interruption, and affording excellent and secure shelter to shipping during heavy gales. The north side of Great Orme's Head is broken into craggy precipices of various elevation, which, during the breeding season, are the resort of various aquatic birds, among which are the gull, the razor-bill, the guillemot, the cormorant, the heron, and sometimes the falcon: these occupy respectively their several stations in the rocks, the gulls having the lowest and the herons the highest situations; and a small number of puffins is scattered indiscriminately in various places. The eggs of the razor-bill are esteemed a delicacy, and the sale of them, generally at two shillings per dozen, affords a livelihood to several families employed during the season in procuring them. The western side of the promontory is one vast precipice: the mountain extends into the plain above the village, forming a precipitous eminence, the summit of which is called Dinas, and is surrounded with a wall of loose stones, very rudely formed, within which are the foundations of numerous circular buildings, varying in diameter from twelve to thirty feet, and arranged round the west and south sides of the mountain. In the centre is a rocking-stone, called Crÿd Tudno, or the "cradle of St. Tudno;" and upon the extreme northern point of the eminence are the ruins of a large square building, of which the walls, apparently constructed without mortar, lie scattered in various directions. On the highest point of the promontory, and near the Great Orme's Head, a signal staff has been erected, communicating with Llÿsvaen, on the east, and with the island of Priestholme on the west, and forming a post in the line of communication between Liverpool and Holyhead. In some parts the mountain, which is about five miles in circumference, affords good pasturage for sheep, and near the summit are some extensive copper mines, from which about three thousand tons of ore, of a very pure quality, are raised annually and sent to Swansea and to Cheadle, for the purpose of being smelted: the number of men employed in these mines is, on an average, about one hundred and twenty. The mountain consists of alternate beds of chert and limestone, uniformly dipping from every side to a common centre, where the great mass of ore is found. This parish is the head of the great manor granted by Edward I. to the see of Bangor, and is one of the four parishes in this county which are on the Denbighshire side of the river Conway. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Merioneth, to whom the rectorial tithes are appropriated. The church, dedicated to St. Tudno, is a small structure, about two miles distant from the village, and situated on the summit of the cliffs, overhanging the sea. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A free school was established here at a very early period, in which twenty boys and ten girls are at present instructed; and a new school-house is now in progress of erection, the expense of which will be defrayed out of the accumulation of the surplus funds. The poor children of the parish are also entitled to receive gratuitous instruction in the National school founded by Mrs. Mostyn in the adjoining parish of Eglwys-Rhôs. Lewis Owen, Esq., in 1623, bequeathed one-eighth part of the tithes of the parish of Aberconway for clothing poor old men and women of this parish, above sixty years of age; and Mr. Richard ab Robert, prior to 1732, bequeathed £40, and Mr. Thomas Evans, about the same time, £20, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor on St. Thomas's day. In the copper mines is found a great variety of mineral curiosities, such as beautiful specimens of malachite, or mammalated green carbonate of copper, &c. The average annual expenditure to maintain the poor is £140. 14.

LLANDUDWEN (LLAN-DUDWEN), a parish in the hundred of DINLLAEN, Lleyd division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (W. by N.) from Pwllheli, containing 85 inhabitants. The lands in this parish, consisting of about one thousand one hundred and sixty acres, and having for the most part a clayey, though in some places a peaty and gravelly, soil, are generally low and flat, and form the most fertile and best cultivated tract, in this part of the principality. The surrounding scenery is varied; and among the most striking of the objects which it comprehends is Carn Madrin, at the base of which, within the parish, and occupying a romantic situation, is Madrin, an ancient mansion, now the property and residence of T. P. J. Parry, Esq. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Rhiw, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Tudwen, is a small neat cruciform edifice, in good repair. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £51. 2.

LLANDUGWELL, a township in the parish of LLANVECHELL, hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (W.) from Am-lwch. The population is included in the return for the parish. This township was anciently a distinct parish, but the church, dedicated to St. Dogvael, having been allowed to fall into ruins, many years since, it ceased to be parochial, and the rectorial tithes are now taken alternately by the rectors of this parish and that of Llanrhyddlad. There is a separate assessment for the support of its poor: the inhabitants do not pay any church rates to Llanvechell parish.

LLANDULAS (LLAN-DDULAS), a parish in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, on the road between Holyhead and Chester, 3 miles (W. by N.) from Abergele, containing 307 inhabitants. The village, which is of small size, is situated on the banks of the river Dulas, over which is a good stone bridge, and near its influx into the sea. The parish abounds with vast rocks of limestone, in which lead-ore is found; but the inhabitants are chiefly employed in procuring immense quantities of the limestone from the mountains, which is sent hence to Liverpool to be burned for mortar. The spacious bay of Llandulas is noted for the protection it affords to vessels in all states of the weather; and its security and convenience have been increased by the erection of a lofty pier, in 1822, projecting a considerable way into the sea, to which a rail-road extends from the limestone quarries, so that vessels can now receive their cargoes at all states of the tide. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 5½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Ceinbryd, a small plain structure, bearing evident marks of having been considerably enlarged, particularly in remains of the corner stones in the west front, and a handsome circular arch of great antiquity. In the village, situated near the bridge, are four almshouses, erected in 1767, by three brothers named Lloyd, but they are not endowed. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £34. 12.

LLANDURY, a chapelry in the parish of PEMBREY, hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2½ miles (S. E. by E.) from Kidwelly. The population is included in the return for the parish. The chapel is spacious, and service is regularly performed in it in the afternoon.

LLANDWROG (LLAN-DUROG), a parish in the hundred of UCHGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. by W.) from Carnarvon, on the road to Pwllheli, consisting of the Upper and Lower divisions, and containing 1923 inhabitants. This place is of considerable antiquity, and was, during the ninth century, the residence of Cilmin Troed Dû, one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales, the remains of whose palace at Glynllivon were existing till within the last few years. From this chieftain descended the Glynnnes of Glynllivon, ancestors of the present Lord Newborough, who has a noble mansion near the spot, deeply embosomed in trees, and commanding extensive views over St. George's channel, the Menai strait, the Isle of Anglesey, and the country towards Carnarvon. The parish, which is extensive, though mountainous in some parts, and comprehending a considerable portion of sands, contains many large tracts of enclosed and well-cultivated land, of which the soil is rich and fertile. Morva Dinlle, a sandy marsh with some clay, comprising two thousand five hundred acres, and included partly in this parish, and partly in those of Llanwnda and Llanvagan, was enclosed under an act of parliament obtained in 1806. The village, which is large, is pleasantly situated; and several of the inhabitants are employed in the mines and quarries in the neighbourhood. On the coast of the Menai, in this parish, the late Lord Newborough, between the years 1770 and 1780, erected at his own expense, both in the grounds of Glynllivon, and also at Belan, near the entrance of the strait, commodious barracks for the county militia, of which, as lord-lieutenant of the county, he was Colonel-Commandant: these, which had become much dilapidated, have been restored and greatly improved by the present lord: the barracks at Glynllivon are called Fort Williamsburg, and those at Belan, Fort St. David: off the latter is situated his lordship's yacht dock. The mountainous parts of the parish are rich in mineral wealth, consisting principally of copper-ore and slate. The copper mines called Drws y Coed, supposed to have been originally worked by the Romans, are still very productive: the principal slate quarries are those of Cloddva'r lôn, Talysarn, Pen yr Orsedd, and Cilgwyn, the last of which has been worked for more than a century: these several works afford constant employment to more than seven hundred men. The Llanllyni, and Carnarvon rail-road, which passes through the upper division of the parish, was constructed under acts of parliament obtained in 1825, 1827, and 1828, by a company called the Nantle Railway Company: it commences at the Cloddva'r lôn slate quarries, near Nantle Pool, and pursues a westerly direction for some distance; it then takes a northerly course, and terminates at the shipping quay at Carnarvon.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £11. 11. 5½., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Twrog, by whom it is supposed to have been originally founded in the sixth century, is a spacious and ancient structure, neatly fitted up. There are several places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one each for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, founded by Lord Newborough, who also built the school-house at his own expense, is liberally supported by his lordship and the rector of the parish, and is open to poor children of this and the adjoining parishes. Mrs. Ellen Glynnne founded here almshouses for twelve aged and unmarried women, which she endowed with the farm of Plas Newydd, in the parish of Llangoed, county of Anglesey, and with other lands, now producing about £200 per annum: the almswomen are nominated by Lord Newborough, and appointed by the Bishop of Bangor. Mrs. Glynné also bequeathed a rent-charge of £5, payable out of the Glynllivon estate, to the poor ; and there are several other charitable donations and bequests, the produce of which is annually distributed among them on St. Thomas's day. In the mountainous districts of this parish, at a place called Bala Deulyn, where two small lakes are united by a rivulet, is Nantle, an ancient mansion, in which Edward I. resided during the erection of Carnarvon castle, and from which many of his decrees were dated. Near this place, in 1827, two gold coins were found, one of which had on the obverse a figure of that monarch seated in a ship, and holding a sword, with the legend, in ancient characters, EDWARD. DEI. GRA. REX. ANGL. DNS. HYB. D. AQUI., and on the reverse four lions and four crowns, with the legend IPSE. AUTEM. TRANSIENS. PER. MEDIUM. ILLORUM. IBAT. At a short distance to the north of the church is Dinas Dinlle, a fortification occupying the summit of a circular artificial mount on the shore of the Menai strait, and on the confines of an extensive marsh. The enclosed area, four hundred feet in diameter, is surrounded by a vast rampart of earth, and defended in some parts by a second rampart and a deep fosse ; and on the side near the shore the eminence has, by the constant action of the waves, been formed into an abrupt and precipitous cliff. The entrance is on the opposite side, and within the enclosure are vestiges of buildings of an oblong form, constructed of loose stones, and also a tumulus. This strong post, obviously an outwork connected with the station Segontium, adjacent to the present town of Carnarvon, was probably constructed to afford facility in landing supplies for the garrison of that place, when, from adverse winds, the entrance to that port became difficult or dangerous. Its Roman origin, which has been inferred by Mr. Pennant and other antiquaries, from the discovery here of Roman coins, and the necessity for such an outwork, for the convenience of the principal station, is confirmed by vestiges of roads leading from Segontium, of which one, crossing the river Seiont, and pointing directly to this place, was discovered in a very perfect state, at a distance of several feet below the surface of the ground, in laying down the railway from Llanllyvni to Carnarvon. A further corroboration of the Roman origin assigned to this post is derived from the appellation of two ancient fords on a stream near the site, called "Y Foriad," which still respectively retain the semi-British and semi-Roman names of Rhŷd Pedestre and Rhŷd Equestre, implying "the passage for the infantry" and "the passage for the cavalry." The Roman road from Dinas Dinlle to Segontium may still be traced in various places, and especially on its approaching the river Gorvai, near which it is plainly discernible. On the Cilgwyn mountain, in this parish, is a Druidical circle, seventeen yards in diameter ; and at Plâs Newydd, a large upright stone points out the grave of an ancient British warrior. Bedd-Gwenan, and Carnedd Angharad, are also supposed to be the tombs of British chieftains. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £687. 1.

LLANDYGWYDD (LLAN-DYGWYDD), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N.W.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 1131 inhabitants.

This parish is pleasantly situated in the south-western part of the county, on the banks of the river Teivy, and is intersected by the turnpike roads from Cardigan to Newcastle-Emlyn, only four miles distant from the former, though the latter is the post town. The lands are enclosed and in a high state of cultivation ; and the soil is tolerably fertile. The scenery of the southern portion of the parish, bordering on the vale of Teivy, is finely diversified, and highly enriched with groves of stately oaks and other majestic timber ; and the neighbourhood abounds with handsome seats and pleasing villas. Blaen pant, the residence of W. Owen Brigstocke, Esq., is a handsome mansion, beautifully embosomed in woods of majestic growth, and surrounded with flourishing plantations : in the house is an extensive and valuable library, principally collected by the ancestor of the present proprietor, Owen Brigstocke, Esq. ; and the grounds, which are judiciously and tastefully laid out, comprehend much pleasing and picturesque scenery. Stradmores Vale, an elegant modern mansion, the property of Dr. Sheriff, is finely situated on the banks of the Teivy : it is sheltered in the rear by a noble forest of oak, rising from the margin of the river, and forming an interesting and prominent feature in the scenery of this portion of the vale : the prospect from the house, though confined, is extremely beautiful. Noyadd Trêvawr, once a place of great importance, and at present the property and residence of Captain Parry, R. N., C. B., G. C. S., is a good family house, pleasantly situated, and comprehending within the grounds some pleasing scenery ; and Penllan, the residence of the Rev. John Jones, commands a rich and extensive prospect over the high grounds on the opposite side of the river. Park Gors, Cilluch, and Dôl, all within the parish, are also handsome residences on a smaller scale. The manor and lordship of Llandygwydd formerly belonged to the Bishop of St. David's, but were sold to the Rev. Thos. Griffith, together with the estate of Llwynduris, under an act of parliament for the redemption of the land tax, on which, near the site of the old episcopal palace, he subsequently erected the mansion now the property and residence of his son, John Griffiths, Esq. This parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, to which it was transferred, at the dissolution, from Aberguilly : it is valued in the king's books at £10. 12. 8½., and is in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Prebendary of Llandygwydd. The church, dedicated to St. Dygwidd, is a neat modern edifice, rebuilt about the commencement of the present century. There were formerly two chapels of ease, one at Noyadd, of which some vestiges may still be traced in a field called Parc y Capel, and the other near Cenarth bridge, which has totally disappeared, the site having been levelled in the formation of the turnpike road. Here are National schools for the gratuitous instruction of children of both sexes, supported by subscription. To the east of the church are the remains of a small camp, called "Gaer," of which no historical particulars are recorded ; and within a quarter of a mile to the south of it is a barrow: there are also two barrows on an eminence in this parish, called "Pen y Bryn Bwa." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £354. 4.

LLANDYRNOG (LLAN-DYRNOG), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Denbigh, containing 708 inhabitants. This parish is beautifully situated in the fertile and picturesque Vale of Clwyd, and in the earlier periods of Welsh history must have been a place of some importance, being connected with a chain of ancient British posts established both as exploratory stations, to watch the approach of an invading enemy, and as strong holds to which, in cases of imminent danger, the families of the neighbouring districts retreated with their flocks and herds for security. Fairs are held on February 11th and November 20th. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £19. 19. 7., and held in commendam by the Bishop, to whom it was given at the Reformation, in lieu of mortuaries, which were previously paid throughout the deanery of Dyfryn Clwyd, in which the parish is situated. The church is dedicated to St. Tynnog, from which circumstance the parish derives its name. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is supported by subscription. Mr. Henry Powell, in 1748, bequeathed £100 to be applied to the apprenticing of one or two poor boys of this parish annually, who should be appointed by the heir of the Glanywern estate. Mr. Foulke Parry bequeathed £40, Mr. Thomas Powell £20, Mrs. Jane Salusbury £20, the produce of which, together with that of other smaller sums by various benefactors, is annually distributed among the poor. The principal and most extensive of the military posts above-mentioned occupies the summit of one of the Clwydian mountains, and from its strong fortifications was called Bryn y Cloddiau, or "the hill of ditches:" the line of circumvallation conforms to the shape of the hill, and the enclosed area is one mile and three-quarters in circumference, and defended, according to the facility or difficulty of access, by single, double, triple, and quadruple intrenchments: the principal entrance is on the west side, where is only a single fosse, and on the north, where it was more easily accessible, are five fosses. Within the enclosure are several hollows, as if designed for lodgements of men on guard, or probably as places of greater security, which are now filled with pools of water; and in the centre of the camp is a large tumulus. Vron Iw, the ancient mansion of the family of Williams, has been converted into a farm-house: a memorial of its former magnificence is preserved in some lofty pillars among the ruins, which anciently formed a splendid portico: in the grounds is a strongly impregnated chalybeate spring. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £751. 11.

LLANDYSILIO-GOGO (LLAN-DYSILIO-GOGOV), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 18 miles (W. N. W.) from Lampeter, containing 1430 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of Cardigan bay, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Cardigan to Aberystwith, derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tysilio, and its adjunct "Gogo," or more properly "Gogovau," from the numerous caverns worn by the sea in the rocks which line this part of the coast. The Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., was entertained by Davydd ab Ievan at his mansion of Llwyn Davydd, in this parish, on the first night after his arrival in Cardiganshire, on his route to Bosworth Field; and to this circumstance has been attributed the origin of the family of Parry, or ab Harry, in consequence of an illicit intercourse which is reported to have then taken place between the earl and the daughter of his host. There is a small haven formed on the bay, at a place called Cwm Tydwr, in this parish, where two or three small vessels are regularly engaged in conveying limestone and culm from their respective districts: the former is burnt into lime for manure, and in that state sold to the farmers. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Llan-granog annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 18. 1½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, and consists of a nave, chancel, and south aisle; the nave is separated from the chancel by a stone screen of good character; the font, which is octangular, is supported on a pillar of the same form; and near the western entrance is an ancient piscina. Chapel Cynin, in this parish, was a chapel originally in the patronage of the Vicar of Llandysilio-Gogo, but was suffered to fall into decay. It was afterwards rebuilt by the parishioners, in the year 1820, and was subsequently endowed by Major Parry of Gernos, the proprietor of the Cwm Cynin estate, with the sum of £200, to which has been added £2000 by parliamentary grant: the living is now a perpetual curacy, in the patronage of Major Parry. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and Presbyterians. A small Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by subscription. The ancient family mansion of the estate of Cwm Cynin is now a farm-house. In Cwm Tydwr are the foundations of some ancient buildings, which, according to tradition, are the remains of the ancient castellated mansion of the Tudors. Llwyn Davydd, the ancient residence of Davydd ab Ievan, is now become a considerable village; and not far from it are the remains of an ancient fortress, called Castell Llwyn Davydd, comprising a circular area, nearly two hundred feet in diameter, strongly defended by moats and ramparts. Within the area it has the appearance of a large tumulus, but nothing is positively known of its origin or history: by some it has been thought to have been the castle of Mâb Wynion, which was taken by Rhys ab Gruffydd, in 1164. On a farm called Ciliau, in this neighbourhood, is Garn Wen, or "the white heap," a circular enclosure about two hundred feet in diameter, surrounded by a rampart of loose stones, and divided into three compartments: to the south-west of it is a space of three acres, which appears to have been defended by a mound of earth. It must have been a place of great strength, and appears to have furnished materials for building most of the stone walls in its immediate vicinity. The history of this work has not been satisfactorily ascertained; a hill to the west of it still retains the appellation of Cwen y Cwrt, or "the hill of the court," from which circumstance it has been supposed to have been originally a station for the administration of justice to the inhabitants of the district, during the earlier periods of the principality. About thirty years since, a curious vessel was dug up in this parish, made of bell metal, and resembling a flagon in its form; it is supposed to have been used for holding the sacramental wine, and from its having been found in a turbary, near the remains of a dilapidated chapel, the probability of that conjecture derives additional strength. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £545. 13.

LLANDYSILLIO (LLAN-DYSILIO), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W. S. W.) from Bangor, containing 479 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shores of the Menai strait, and at the northern extremity of the Menai bridge, which, over an embankment of considerable length, forms an approach to the village. It is in the grand route from London to Holyhead; and since the construction of the suspension bridge, for an account of which see the article on BANGOR, a new line of road has been formed from this place, communicating with the road to Beaumaris. Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, while carrying on his desolating warfare against the Welsh, landed his forces at Cadnant, in this parish, in 1096, and, having encamped on the summit of an eminence called Dinas, at the upper extremity of the vale, commenced a series of violent and rapacious devastations, which were characterized by the most barbarous and atrocious outrages. Cadnant was the most ancient ferry across this part of the Menai, and, having become a source of very considerable revenue prior to the time of Edward I., was granted by that monarch to Einian Bishop of Bangor, who had performed the ceremony of baptism on the young prince Edward, in Carnarvon castle. During the civil war of the seventeenth century, this place, from its central situation and other local advantages, was selected, as the line of his march, by General Mytton, who landed his forces here in 1648, and, having encamped at Orsedd Migyn, marched from that place for the reduction of Beaumaris, which surrendered to him upon honourable terms. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanvair-Pwllgwngyll, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church is dedicated to St. Tysilio, son of the ancient warrior Brochvael, who fought against the Saxons at the time of the massacre of the monks of Bangor, and was founded by him in 630: it is a small edifice, remarkable for the bleakness of its situation on a rocky peninsula stretching into the strait, by the waters of which it is completely insulated at every tide; and during spring tides, and the prevalence of a north-west wind, it is altogether inaccessible. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The produce arising from several inconsiderable charitable donations and bequests is annually distributed among the poor of the parish, according to the intention of the several benefactors. Some vestiges of the camp constructed by Hugh Lupus at Cadnant are still visible, and near them are the remains of a small circular building. Within the last few years, a very large hammer, rudely formed of hard stone, and of very ancient appearance, was found in the immediate neighbourhood, and has been preserved at Cadnant; and in the course of some subsequent researches, an immense rock of similar stone, equally hard and compact, has been discovered, extending across the parish, of which it is thought the very few ancient hammers of this kind, which are found in some of the choicest collections of antiquaries, were in all probability made. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £54. 16.

LLANDYSSIL (LLAN-DYSUL), a parish, partly in the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, and partly in that of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, on the road to Lampeter, containing 2724 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tysilio, an eminent British saint who flourished during the earlier part of the sixth century. It is situated in the southern part of the county, bordering upon Carmarthenshire, and comprises nearly twenty-five thousand acres of land, forming two principal divisions, called respectively Llandyssil Is Cerdin and Llandyssil Uwch Cerdin, of which the former is in the hundred of Troedyrour, and the latter in that of Moythen. The parish is bounded on the south by the river Teivy, which separates it from the parish of Llanvihangel-ar-Arth, in the county of Carmarthen, and is intersected by the Clettwr stream, which falls into that river, and likewise by several smaller streams, which are tributary to both. It is divided into seven hamlets, which, however, maintain their poor collectively, and in each of which, with the exception only of that in which the parish church is situated, was formerly a chapel of ease, all of which have fallen to ruins. The surface is what is usually termed, in this part of the country, mountainous, the ground in some instances rising into conical hills of considerable elevation, and is intersected by numerous narrow valleys: the soil is in general stony and shallow, but is well adapted for the culture of barley and oats, which are the principal kinds of grain raised here: near Waun Ivor are some large bogs. The village, which is of considerable extent and of interesting appearance, is pleasantly situated on a beautiful reach of the river Teivy, the vale bordering upon which is here enclosed by a succession of bold and richly wooded eminences, alternating with obtruding masses of barren rock, and lofty precipices of rugged character, forming scenery of great beauty and grandeur: the views from the higher grounds embrace some pleasing and extensive prospects over the surrounding country and the fine Vale of the Teivy. Among the numerous interesting objects which enrich the scenery in this part of the vale are, a venerable bridge over the Teivy, the tower of the church rising above the trees in which it is embosomed, an elegant little mansion on the right bank of the river, and Gilvâch Wen, in the midst of luxuriant plantations, backed by hanging woods, which reach to the summit of the impending heights. Alltyrodin, the seat of John Lloyd, Esq., is an elegant modern mansion, built on the declivity of a steep hill rising from the bank of the river Clettwr, and sheltered from the keen winds, which at times rush through the dingle, by the thriving plantations in which it is enclosed: the library is enriched with a valuable collection of Welsh genealogical manuscripts. The grounds on the opposite bank of the river are tastefully and judiciously laid out. The family of Lloyd were originally of Castle Hywel, an ancient mansion which has been for some time deserted by its proprietor, and is now a farm-house. Waun Ivor, the residence of the Rev. D. Bowen, is a genteel house, delightfully situated on the bank of the river Teivy, and commanding from its park-like grounds a beautiful and picturesque view of the bridge of Llanvihangel-ar-Arth, and the church of that parish, situated on the summit of a richly wooded height overhanging the river. Gilvâch Wen, the seat of the Rev. Thomas Lloyd, is a small but elegant mansion, forming one of the most pleasing objects on the banks of the Teivy: it is beautifully situated in the midst of thick groves, and backed by luxuriant and extensive woods; but from the judicious disposition of the trees, the house, with the river winding beneath it, forms a conspicuous and beautiful feature in the landscape. A weekly market is held on Thursday; and the fairs are on February 11th, the Thursday before Palm-Sunday, June 21st, September 19th, and November 11th.

The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's: the rectory, which is a sinecure annexed to the headship of Jesus' College, Oxford, is rated in the king's books at £12. 16. 8.; the vicarage, which is discharged, is rated at £10, endowed with £2000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Tysilio, is an ancient structure, displaying portions in the successive styles of English architecture, with a square tower at the west end: it consists of a nave and aisles, and from its situation forms an interesting feature in the village. On a stone forming the entrance into the churchyard is an ancient inscription. There are places of worship for Independents, Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, and Unitarians. Thirty shillings per annum, charged on a farm called Cwmoidw, are annually distributed among the poor of this parish, at the discretion of the proprietor of Gilvâch Wen. There are many interesting remains of antiquity within the parish, among which are several carneddau, or sepulchral heaps of stones: four of these are nearly contiguous, and on opening one of them, within the last few years, three rude earthen vases and the ashes of human bones were found. A Welsh manuscript of the sixteenth century contains the following notice, which may perhaps throw some light upon the origin of these remains: "A.D. 1131, 5th of April, a desperate battle was fought in this parish, between Llewelyn ab Iorwerth and Davydd ab Owain, in which the former was successful, who buried the slain below the road, where the marks appear to this day." According to the same manuscript, another battle was fought here, in 1250, between the men of Bangor, in North Wales, and Davydd ab Cadivor: the former passed the ford of Rhÿd Owain at day-break on the 8th of March, and encountered Einon, who had come to the assistance of Davydd, with between six and seven thousand infantry and six hundred cavalry: these two chieftains caused a deep trench to be dug for their defence; but the abrupt termination of the manuscript in this place leaves the issue of the battle unknown. There are, in various parts of the parish, several artificial mounds, which appear to have been anciently crowned with small forts: one of these, at a place called Cil y graig, is said to mark the site of Castell Aberinion, noticed in the Welsh annals, and said to have been erected by Maelgwyn, about the year 1205. Another, near the river Clettwr, is supposed to point out the site of a castle called Humphrey's Castle, probably from some Norman adventurer, who had obtained possession of the territory, and built the fortress, which was afterwards strengthened and improved, in 1150, by Hywel ab Owain Gwynedd, from whom it subsequently derived the name of Castell Hywel. A little below the Alltyrodin Arms, in the village, is the ford called Rhÿd Owain, which, according to the tradition of the country, derived that name from Owain Gwynedd's having forded the river at this place, in one of his invasions of South Wales; and near it is a barrow, called Tommen Rhÿd Owain, where probably some chieftain of celebrity was interred. On a hill above the church are some small remains of an ancient castle, with a moated tumulus, on which probably stood the keep: this castle, of which no account is preserved either in history or tradition, is supposed to have been the baronial residence of the lords of Gwynionydd, and to have been the head of that lordship. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £993. 14., of which sum, £476. 2. is raised on the Is Cerdin portion of it.

LLANDYSSIL (LLAN-DYSSUL), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (W. by S.) from Montgomery, containing 914 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated on the left of the road from Montgomery to Newtown, and the neighbourhood commands some interesting views and varied and extensive prospects. From the Goronddû hill the rich Vale of Severn is seen to great advantage, with the windings of the river, which forms the northern boundary of the parish. The manufacture of flannel is here carried on upon a limited scale. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, united by an act of parliament in the 29th and 30th of the reign of Charles II.: the former, which was a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £14, and the latter at £7. 10. 10.: it is in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Tysul, is an ancient structure. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. A Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is principally supported by the rector, by whom it was originally established. Jeremiah and Anne Reynolds, in 1711, bequeathed certain lands producing about £4 per annum; Mr. Hugh Lewis gave a rent-charge of £2; and Charles Jones and John Griffiths bequeathed rent-charges of ten shillings each, the produce of all which benefactions is annually distributed among the poor. On the lofty hill of Goronddû, and on the banks of the Severn opposite to Glânhaven, are remains of several ancient British encampments in a greater or less degree of preservation. This is one of the eighteen parishes and townships forming the united district of Montgomery and Pool, incorporated for the joint maintenance of their poor in the house of industry at Forden, under acts of the 32nd and 36th of George III.: the average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of Llandyssil amounts to £312. 7.

LLANDYSSIL UWCH CERDIN (LLAN DYSUL UWCH CERDDIN), a division in that part of the parish of LLANDYSSIL which is in the lower division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $11\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E. by E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn. The population is included in the return for the parish. It contains the vestiges of two or three chapels, which formerly existed here. The road from Lampeter to Newcastle-Emlyn passes, and the river Clettwr flows, through it, the latter joining the river Teivy, which bounds this division on the south. Alltyrodin and Waun Ivor are two beautiful and ornamental seats situated here; and Castell Hywel, an ancient fortified mansion, is now occupied by a farmer: there are also various remains of antiquity. Several of the inhabitants are employed in various branches of manufacture. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment; the average annual expenditure amounting to £517. 12.

LLANDYVODOG (LLAN-DYVODWG), a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.E. by N.) from Bridgend, containing 309 inhabitants. The soil is various, in some parts affording rich pasturage, and in others being less fertile; and the lands, which, with the exception of the wooded and mountainous parts, have been all enclosed for a very long period, are in a good state of cultivation. In this parish, which is within the mineral basin of South Wales, the coal is principally worked for the supply of the immediate neighbourhood; and numerous chalybeate springs of great efficacy are found, deriving their mineral impregnation from ores of iron, which abound throughout the vicinity. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8. 13. 4., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Richard Turbervill Turbervill, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Tyvodwg. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. In 1685, the sum of £10 was given to the parish by an unknown benefactor, the interest of which is annually distributed among the poor. The existence of some remarkable caverns in this parish has given rise to numerous conjectures: by some they are supposed to be exhausted mines, wrought either by the Romans or by the ancient Britons, before the force of gunpowder was applied to the blasting of the rocks; by others they are thought to be either natural, or formed for the purpose of concealment during the intestine and sanguinary contests which anciently disturbed the peace of the principality. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £159. 14.

LLANDYVRIOG (LLAN-DYVRIOG), a parish in the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 854 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tyvriog, an eminent British saint who lived towards the close of the sixth century, is pleasantly situated on the northern bank of the river Teivy, and on the turnpike road from Newcastle-Emlyn to Lampeter. The ancient borough of Atpar, which was formerly contributory with Aberystwith and Lampeter, in returning a representative to parliament for the county town of Cardigan, of which privilege it was deprived for misconduct in the election of a member in 1742, and invested with it again by the late act for amending the representation, is within its limits, and forms a suburb to the market town of Newcastle-Emlyn, constituting that portion of it which is in the county of Cardigan. The lands are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil is generally fertile. The surrounding scenery is of a pleasing character, and in many parts is enriched with thriving plantations, and diversified with well-wooded eminences. Atpar Hill, the seat of John Beynon, Esq., is an elegant villa, beautifully situated on an eminence commanding a pleasing view of the town and the banks of the Teivy. This parish constitutes a prebend in the cathedral church of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £18, and annexed to the archdeaconry of Cardigan. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the rectory of Llanvair Trêlygon annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Tyvriog, is an ancient edifice, not distinguished by any architectural features of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £170. 9.

LLANDYVRYDOG (LLAN-DYVRYDOG), a parish in the hundred of TWRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N.E.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 853 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, and comprises about two thousand acres of level and well-cultivated land, is situated near the road from Beaumaris to Llanerchymedd. The soil is generally argillaceous, and the parish is watered by numerous rivulets, by some of which a few acres are occasionally inundated. Peat earth is found in the marshy land upon the banks of a rivulet descending from the Parys mountain; and from this earth, after burning it for that purpose, a considerable quantity of copper-ore is obtained. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llanvihangel Tre'r Beirdd annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £14. 9. 7., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Tyvrydog, great-grandson of Cunedda Wledig, by whom it was originally founded, about the year 450, is a spacious, lofty, and venerable structure, in excellent repair, having a remarkably large chancel: it is sixty feet in length, and twenty-five in breadth. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists: to the former of these is attached a burial-ground. A National school, in which fifty poor children of this parish and of the adjoining one of Llanvihangel Tre'r Beirdd receive gratuitous instruction, was erected in 1816, and is supported by subscription. Dr. Wynne bequeathed a house in the borough of Carnarvon, which is at present let for £12 per annum, £6 of which, together with the produce arising from several small charitable donations and bequests, is annually distributed among the poor of the parish at Christmas, according to the intention of the several benefactors. About a mile from the village is a large upright stone, called Lleidr Dyvrydog, or the "Thief of Dyvrydog," the origin of which is by tradition attributed to the conversion into stone of a man who had stolen the church bible, and was carrying it away on his shoulder. Near this stone, on a farm called Clorach, are two copious springs, called Fynnon Cybi and Fynnon Seiriol, deriving their names respectively from St. Cybi, patron of Caer Cybi, or Holyhead, and St. Seiriol, patron of Ynys Seiriol, or the island of Priestholme, who were in the habit of meeting at this place, which was about half-way between their respective abodes, to consult about the religious affairs of this part of the principality: the fame of these springs anciently extended to distant places, and they are still held in high estimation. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £242. 16.

Various

LLANEDARN (LLAN-EDEYRN), a parish in the hundred of KIBBOR, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the banks of the Romney, 4 miles (N. E. by N.) from Cardiff, containing 315 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises about two thousand five hundred and fifty acres of land, partly arable and partly pasture, lies on the eastern confine of the county, and the surface, though in general low, presents some pleasing scenery: it gradually rises to the north into an elevated ridge, in some parts richly wooded, and the whole is embellished with several genteel mansions, the principal of which are, New House, the seat of the Rev. Mr. Lewis; Ruperra, that of Charles Morgan, Esq.; and Cevn Mably, that of Col. Kemeys Kemeys Tynte. To the west the venerable cathedral of Llandaf, and southward Cardiff and the Bristol channel, are included in the prospect. The living is a discharged vicarage, united to that of St. Mellon's, in the county of Monmouth, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5. 8. 11½. The church, dedicated to St. Edeyrn, is a small simple structure. It is stated that St. Edeyrn established a Christian Society here, amounting in number to three hundred persons, but there are no remains of their residence. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £254. 10.

LLANEDWEN (LLAN-EDWEN), a parish in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Carnarvon, containing 294 inhabitants. This parish has been said to derive its name from the dedication of its church to King Edwin, by whose daughter or niece it was founded, in the year 640; but Dr. Owen Pughe, in his "Cambrian Biography," says that Edwen was a female saint of Saxon descent, and seems to consider her the tutelary saint of this church. It is situated on the western shore of the Menai strait, and, with the adjoining parishes of Llanidan and Llandeiniol, anciently formed a district which was the principal seat of the Druidical priesthood, and in which the arch-druid is supposed to have had for ages his chief residence. There are still within the district, and particularly within this parish, considerable remains of those deeply shaded groves so well adapted to the performance of the sanguinary rites of the Druidical religion, which obtained for this island the ancient appellation of Ynys Dywell, or "the Shady Island;" and amid them are numerous remains of Druidical temples, altars, circles, and cromlechs. Porthamel, or Porth-Aml, the only ferry between the Menai bridge and Carnarvon, is celebrated as the place where Suetonius Paulinus, in the reign of the Emperor Nero, crossed the strait for the invasion of Mona, in which attempt he was opposed by the Druids, who, having assembled an army of men and women arranged in all the mystic terrors of their idolatrous superstition, and brandishing lighted torches, drew up on the western shore to oppose their progress. But after spreading a momentary panic through the Roman ranks, they were quickly repulsed by the rallying troops, and many of them consigned to perish in their own sacrificial fires. The sacred groves in which their rites were solemnized were cut down, and the reign of Druidism, which had for ages been established in this isle, as its principal seat, was finally destroyed. At a short distance from this place is a field still called Maes Mawr Gâd, or "the plain of the great army," supposed to have been occupied by the Roman forces under Julius Agricola, in his successful expedition to regain possession of the island, which Suetonius, by a general revolt of the British states in his rear, that necessarily caused him to withdraw his forces, had been compelled to relinquish. Opposite to Moel y Don, or "the hill of the wave," in this parish, the English suffered a signal defeat in the reign of Edward I. Having landed in the island, in 1282, under the command of Luke de Tany, a Gascon, after reducing to obedience such of the inhabitants as had not previously sworn allegiance to that monarch, they constructed a bridge of boats across the strait, near the spot where Agricola had landed, in order to effect an entrance into the country on the opposite shore. The Welsh, having hastily thrown up an intrenchment, to defend the pass into the mountains, placed themselves in ambush, and quietly awaited the result. De Tany, having, with a detachment of his troops, rashly ventured at low water to pass the bridge before it was completed, his retreat was intercepted by the return of the tide; and the Welsh at this moment rushing from their ambuscade, and impetuously assaulting his detachment, killed the greater number, and drove the rest into the strait: of this force, which consisted of more than two hundred soldiers, seventeen gentlemen, and thirteen knights, one only escaped, whose horse swam with him to the bridge.

The parish, which is small, though generally destitute of wood, of which it is difficult to raise any plantations of considerable extent, is nevertheless in some parts richly ornamented with timber of ancient growth: these instances, however, are not common, and are probably the remains of the ancient groves which escaped destruction by the Romans. The shores of the Menai are rocky and precipitous; the scenery is bold, striking, and in some places beautifully picturesque; and in the parish and its immediate vicinity are several gentlemen's seats, some of which display elegant specimens both of ancient and modern architecture. Plás Newydd, the seat of the Marquis of Anglesey, is a splendid mansion of modern erection, built upon the site of an ancient house, which once belonged to the celebrated Gwenllian, a descendant of Cadrod Hardd, and is beautifully situated in a portion of the ancient Druidical groves, on ground rising gently from the margin of the Menai. The building consists of a semicircular centre and two semi-octagonal wings: the façade is relieved by octagonal turrets on each side of the centre, and the respective wings, rising from the base above the parapet, which is embattled; and the entire edifice, as seen from the water, to which it is open in front, forms a conspicuous and interesting object. It contains a noble suite of apartments, a handsome library, and a beautiful chapel: the latter is lighted on each side by a fine range of pointed windows, enriched with tracery of elegant design, and embellished with stained glass: the roof is delicately and elaborately groined, and the altar, which has a receding canopy, is beautifully enriched with tabernacle-work. The whole of this elegant mansion is built of Mona marble from the quarries of Moelvre, near Red Wharf bay, and displays, both in its design and execution, a high degree of taste and judicious arrangement. The grounds are extensive and pleasingly laid out: in front of the house is a spacious lawn, sloping to the margin of the strait, from the waves of which it is protected by a strong parapet wall, on which is a noble terrace; while each side, and the rising ground behind, are sheltered by groves of venerable oak and ash of luxuriant growth. Plâs Côch, another seat in this parish, the property and residence of Sir William Bulkeley Hughes, was originally built by Hugh Hughes, attorney-general in the reign of Elizabeth: it is a noble antique mansion, presenting a fine specimen of the architecture of that age; and over the entrance are the arms of the family of Hughes, with the date 1569. The soil of this parish is fertile, and the land for the most part is enclosed and cultivated. Limestone of excellent quality is found in great abundance within its limits, and some very extensive quarries are worked, affording employment to a considerable number of the inhabitants: great quantities of this limestone, both for building and for the purpose of manure, are raised from these quarries, which extend along the shore of the Menai, and shipped to Liverpool and other places, in numerous vessels. Through the park of Plâs Newydd runs a bed of granite, in a state of decomposition, and so soft that it crumbles upon the slightest touch.

The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llanidan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church is a small but neat edifice of great antiquity; and the churchyard is one of the most beautiful in North Wales, and remarkable as containing the remains of the Rev. Henry Rowland, the eminent antiquary. A parochial school, in which forty-five girls receive gratuitous instruction, was founded by the Marchioness of Anglesey, by whom it is principally supported. Bishop Rowland, in 1616, bequeathed £6 per annum, charged on his estate at Plâs Gwŷn; Lady Bailey bequeathed a small annual sum, derived from the estate of Plâs Newydd; Mr. Bagnal bequeathed a small rent-charge; and Mrs. Rowland, in 1740, gave £100 in money, the three former of which, together with the produce of the latter, are annually distributed among the poor during the winter. The estate of Llŷllew, in this parish, now producing £200 per annum, was given by Bishop Rowland, as an endowment to the free grammar school which he had founded at Bottwnog. Within the limits of the park of Plâs Newydd is one of the largest cromlechs in the island, supported on five upright stones, which have been stated by some writers to be six feet in height, but at present do not rise more than two feet above the ground: the tabular stone is about twelve feet in length, about the same in breadth, and four feet in thickness. Adjoining this is a smaller cromlech; and at no great distance, in the woods, is a large carnedd, which was opened a few years ago, and found to contain a vault, seven feet in length and four in breadth, but, after a diligent search, no other relics were discovered. Near Maes Mawr Gâd, in making a fence in the year 1829, several Roman coins, fibulæ, buckles, and other vestiges of Roman antiquity were discovered; and near Porthamel is a large mount, supposed by Mr. Rowland to mark the scene of Suetonius' sanguinary victory. Plâs Gwŷn, in this parish, was the birthplace and residence of the Rev. Henry Rowland, the learned author of the Mona Antiqua Restaurata: that elaborate and interesting production was composed by the author at this his patrimonial estate, and the old oak chair in which he sat while writing it is still preserved in the house: he died here, and was buried in the churchyard, in 1725, as appears by the Latin inscription on his tomb, though his biographers state his death to have occurred in the year 1723, in which his work first appeared. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £162. 7.

LLANEDY (LLAN-EDI), a parish in the hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (S.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 1001 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Loughor, by which it is separated from the county of Glamorgan, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Swansea to Llandilo-Vawr: it extends nearly six miles in length, and is about a mile in breadth, and contains a considerable tract of fertile land. Coal is found here, but it is worked only for the supply of the immediate neighbourhood. An annual fair is held in the village on the 8th of November. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Edith, has recently received an addition of one hundred and twenty free sittings, towards the erection of which the Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels contributed the sum of £100. There are places of worship for Baptists and Presbyterians. At a cottage near Forest Hall, a deserted mansion in this parish, was born, in 1721, the Rev. John Walters, M. A., the learned author of Dissertations on the Welsh Language, a Welsh and English Dictionary, and other works. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £259. 15.

LLANEGRIN (LLAN-EGRYN), a parish in the hundred of TALYBONT, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Towyn, containing 764 inhabitants. It is about five miles in length and two in breadth, and comprises about ten thousand acres, part of which is mountainous land, while some is so low as to be subject to occasional inundation. The beautiful little river Dyssynny, which has its source at the foot of the lofty Cader Idris, meanders through it, and, on the southern side of the parish, pours its waters into the spacious bay of Cardigan. The village is pleasantly situated near the northern bank of the Dyssynny, which is navigable for vessels of ten or twelve tons' burden from the sea to beyond Peniarth Weir, near which stands the ancient mansion of Peniarth, the property of William Wynne, Esq. The higher grounds command extensive and varied prospects, embracing a fine view of the vale of Cardigan bay, and of the lofty hills on this part of the coast. About three-fifths of the land are unenclosed and uncultivated: in this portion, considerable quantities of peat are dug for fuel: the remainder is comparatively fertile and in a good state of cultivation: the prevailing soil is a strong clay. Slate abounds in the parish, and is quarried to supply the immediate neighbourhood; but the quality is not sufficiently good to make it an object of general demand, nor is any of it exported. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, which has been invested in the purchase of a tenement in Montgomeryshire, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Mr. Titley, who pays the curate an additional annual stipend of £10. The church, dedicated to St. Egryn, and situated about a mile from the village, on an eminence commanding a fine and extensive prospect, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture: the chancel is separated from the nave by an elaborately carved screen and rood-loft, which are said to have been brought hither from Cymmer abbey, near Dôlgeley. Among the sepulchral monuments in the church are several to the memory of different members of the family of Owen of Peniarth. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The free school was founded in 1650, by Hugh Owen, Esq., of Talybont, who bequeathed £400 for its foundation and endowment: the latter was augmented by Griffith Owen, Esq., who, in 1668, bequeathed £400 to be invested in the purchase of land, of which the produce was to be appropriated to the salary of a writing-master, the catechising of poor children of the parish, and the apprenticing of scholars from the school. The last bequest was laid out in the purchase of the tenements of Bryn Nant Ceiriog and Nant y Pool: the whole income arising from the endowment is about £80 per annum: seventy children are gratuitously instructed, and as many as the funds will allow are apprenticed, according to the will of the testators. Talybont, in this parish, is supposed to have been anciently a mansion of the princes of North Wales, and the residence of Llewelyn, who dated one of his charters from this place: on the farm belonging to this estate is a large artificial mound, on which a watch-tower is said to have formerly stood; and on the opposite bank of the river, in the parish of Towyn, is a similar station. On the Peniarth Mill farm, at the foot of a hill called Cwm ych, is a chalybeate spring; and there is also a spring called Vron Well, the water of which is in high repute for its efficacy in the cure of rheumatic complaints. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £496. 4.

LLANEGWAD (LLAN-EGWAD), a parish partly in the lower division of the hundred of CATHINOG, and partly in the higher division of that of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by S.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 2214 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Egwad, who is said to have lived here in seclusion and devotional retirement, probably near the spot still called "Eisteddva-Egwad," where there are the ruins of an ancient and very extensive mansion. The parish extends for nearly seven miles from north to south, and about four miles from east to west, and is intersected by the river Cothy, which falls into the Tywi at this place. The lands, which, with the exception of a very small portion, are enclosed, are fertile and in a good state of cultivation: the village is pleasantly situated. Search was made by N. B. Jones, Esq., within the last few years, for copper-ore, of which a vein was discovered, but it dipped so considerably below the bed of the river, as to render the working of it altogether impracticable. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Welsh and Wesleyan Methodists: a second place of worship for Independents is now in progress of erection. There is a bequest of £4. 2. per annum for teaching poor children of the joint hamlets of Llanegwad and Hirnan. The late Rev. John Francis, of Bath, charged an estate in the parish of Llandeveylog, in this county, with the payment of £25 per annum, in addition to which is £60 per annum arising from bequests of various benefactors, the whole of which sums are annually distributed among the poor of the parish, according to the will of the testators. Near Cothy bridge are the remains of an ancient dilapidated edifice, formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church, but now converted into a stable: there were anciently several other chapels in the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £903. 18.

LLANEILIAN (LLAN-ELIAN), a parish in the hundred of TWRCelyn, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from Amlwch, containing 1438 inhabitants. This parish is of considerable antiquity, and early in the fifth century was the residence of Caswallon Law-Hîr, Prince of North Wales, who had a palace on the summit of Llaneilian mountain, the site of which is at present occupied by a small cottage, called from that circumstance "Llŷs Caswallon." It derives its name from St. Eilian, who, in 450, founded a church here, which was munificently endowed by Caswallon, and adjoining to which that prince erected a chapel; and these edifices, with the exception only of Llanbadrig church, were the earliest places of Christian worship erected in the principality. St. Eilian, who was bishop of Lindisfarne, was celebrated for the sanctity of his life; and the high veneration in which his memory was held drew multitudes from the remotest parts of Britain to this place, in which he had resided, in order to obtain, by their pilgrimage and votive offerings, the highly appreciated benefit of his favour and protection. The offerings of the pilgrims upon these occasions amounted annually to a large sum, and were received in a chest kept in the church for that purpose, and called Cyff Eilian, from the contents of which the church of St. Eilian and the chapel of Caswallon were elegantly rebuilt, and two farms purchased, the rents of which, till within a very recent period, were applied to keeping them in repair. It was the custom of the devotees to visit a well called Fynnon Eilian, situated in a barren part of the parish, among wild and broken rocks, on the eve of the saint's festival, and, after drinking the water, to kneel for some time before the altar of a small chapel erected over it: they afterwards repaired to the parish church, where they performed other ceremonies, concluding with an offering to the saint. This custom even at present prevails to a small extent, and though the spring is nearly dried up and the chapel in ruins, many persons still annually resort to this place, for the purpose of imploring the intercession of the saint for persons labouring under grievous sickness ; and their offerings upon these occasions are annually distributed among the poor. The parish, which is extensive, is situated at the northern extremity of the island, upon the shore of the Irish sea, into which a part of it considerably projects, forming a headland, called by Caswallon, in honour of his tutor, Hilary's Point, a name which it still bears ; and off the coast is good anchorage for coasting vessels, of which many are employed in conveying copper-ore and other mineral produce from the Parys mountain, which is partly in this parish. The surface is varied, and, with the exception of the mountainous portion, and several acres of turbary and moor land, is generally enclosed and cultivated. Several attempts have been made at various times, on Llanelian mountain, to discover copper-ore, of which a considerable vein has recently been found on Rhôs Myneich, and several men are at present employed in working it for a Cornish mining company.

The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Coedanna and Rhôspeirio annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £14. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Eilian, is an elegant structure, partly in the early and partly in the decorated style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a spire : the entire edifice, which is embattled, is handsomely and substantially built of grit-stone, with quoins and cornices of freestone. It comprises a nave and chancel, the roofs of which are internally of ancient carved oak, that of the latter resting upon finely sculptured corbels of angels playing on musical instruments. A splendid screen of richly carved oak, ornamented with a portrait of St. Eilian, but much defaced with paint, separates the chancel from the nave, in the former of which are four stalls of tabernacle-work, with the date 1533, and an altar-piece of carved oak, of inferior execution. The east window, of three lights, enriched with tracery, and surmounted by an elegant ogee canopy, contains some portions of ancient stained glass. Within a few yards of the church, and now communicating with the chancel by means of a covered passage, which greatly disfigures the appearance of the building, is the small chapel of Caswallon, a beautiful structure, containing an altar-piece of oak, richly and elaborately carved, and ornamented with an east window of elegant design : in this chapel is kept the oak chest, called Cyff Eilian, in which are still deposited the offerings of the devotees at the shrine of this saint. About the middle of the seventeenth century, a considerable sum of money was expended for oil paintings of the Apostles and St. Eilian, of which that of the latter is the only one now remaining. In digging a grave in the churchyard, many years ago, a deep trench was discovered, extending about twenty yards in length, and containing a great quantity of human bones, supposed to be the place of interment of a number of sailors, who at some remote period perished upon this coast in a storm. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The village wakes, commonly called Gwyl Mâb Saint, formerly continued for three weeks, and, though now lasting only for about half that time, are still very numerous attended. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £237.

LLANELHAIARN, or LLANHAIRN (LLAN-AELHAIARN), a parish in the hundred of UWCHGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (N.) from Pwllheli, containing 660 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of Carnarvon bay, and in an extensive mountainous district, comprehends the lofty range of mountains called Yr Eivl, the conical summits of which are conspicuous from every elevated point in this part of the principality. These mountains, which are three in number, the central one having an elevation of one thousand eight hundred and sixty feet above the level of high water, rise abruptly from the shore of St. George's channel, in which they form boldly projecting promontories, separating the districts of Arvon and Lleyn. The village, which is small, is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road from Carnarvon to Pwllheli : the surrounding scenery is boldly varied, and some parts of the parish command extensive prospects over the surrounding country, which abounds with features of picturesque beauty. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6. 15. 4., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Aelhaiarn, is a spacious and venerable cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture : the interior, which is appropriately arranged for the performance of divine service, possesses some interesting architectural details, and the building is kept in excellent repair. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, in which poor children are gratuitously instructed in the Welsh language, is supported partly by a small endowment, and partly by subscription. A bequest of £100 in money, and another of a certain portion of land, both by unknown benefactors, were originally assigned to the relief of the poor. Through the Yr Eivl mountains is the celebrated pass into Vortigern's Valley, across which extends an immense rampart of stones ; and on the southernmost are the remains of one of the strongest and most extensive British fortifications in Wales, called Tre'r Caeri, or "the town of the fortresses." This strong military post is defended on the side on which alone it is accessible by triple ramparts, of which the two innermost are nearly entire. The foundations of buildings, of various forms and dimensions, are scattered over the whole of the summit of the mountain, which is almost level, and also on the declivities. Within the walls of defence are the foundations of several circular buildings, about thirty-two feet in diameter : the upper wall is about twelve feet in height, and, in some places, fourteen in thickness at the top. Nearly the whole of the enclosed area is filled with cells of various forms, round, oval, oblong, and square. Several other mountains in the neighbourhood are fortified in a similar manner, though not with equal strength, from which circumstance it is supposed that Tre'r Caeri was the principal of a chain of military stations, and most probably the principal strong hold of the native Britons driven into this part of the country by the victorious arms of the Saxons. The mountains abound with copper-ore and manganese, but no mines of either have yet been opened. Under the Yr Eivl mountains, and about a quarter of a mile from the church, is a very copious spring, called Fynnon Aelhaiarn, contained in a square enclosure, surrounded by a wall: the water of this spring, which was anciently in high estimation for its sanctity, is still in some repute for cold bathing. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £136. 8.

LLANELIDAN (LLAN-ELIDAN), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Ruthin, containing 749 inhabitants. It is situated in the upper part of the Vale of Clwyd, where the mountains assume a bolder and more rugged character than in the lower section of that pleasing valley. A fair is held on the Thursday before Palm-Sunday. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Bangor, and subject to the consistorial court of the Bishop: it consists of two compositions, each rated in the king's books at £8, one in the patronage of the Bishop, and the other appropriated by letters patent of the 32nd of Elizabeth to the grammar school at Ruthin. The church, dedicated to St. Elidan, is an ancient and spacious structure, enriched with some elaborate carving in oak, and having the east window embellished with some fine specimens of stained glass: it contains several handsome monuments, among which are some to the memory of the Thelwalls, the Kenricks, and the Lloyds. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. All boys born in this parish are entitled to gratuitous instruction in the free grammar school at Ruthin. Several charitable donations and bequests, amounting in the aggregate to £340, were, in 1764, invested in the purchase of a farm, called Garth y Groes, now producing £25 per annum, which sum, together with the interest of £34, secured upon the Ruthin turnpike trust, is annually distributed at Christmas among the poor of the parish, according to the will of the several testators. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £509. 5.

LLANELIEU (LLAN-ELIEU), a parish in the hundred of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Hay, containing 115 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Ellyw, granddaughter of Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog, who ruled over this territory about the commencement of the fifth century, and was distinguished chiefly for the number and the piety of his children. The surface of the ground is extremely uneven and irregular, and the soil consequently various: a considerable proportion of the parish is mountain land, which affords only pasturage for sheep, cattle, and small horses; these tracts are in some parts intersected by deep narrow glens or valleys, in which corn is grown; but the farmer depends more for his support upon his flocks and live stock than upon the agricultural produce of his lands. The surrounding scenery is bold, and in some parts romantic; and the view of the mountains by which the parish is bounded, and of those in the distance, is strikingly grand and beautiful. Here were formerly several ancient mansions, but they have been all abandoned as family residences by their proprietors, and are at present occupied as farm-houses. One of these is situated close to the church: on the sides of the entrance gateway to it are the following inscriptions,—“Exitus acta probat, 1676;” “Sic hora sic vita,” “Deus nobis hæc otia fecit, R. A. W. M. Anno Domini —;” “Noctua II vola, 1676, W. A.

H. I;” “Non Jupiter quidem omnibus placet,” “Spēs alit exules.” The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Ashburnham. The church is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel: it is situated in a mountain dell, sheltered on the south-east by the Black Mountains, to the base of which the cultivated portion of the lands extends. From the churchyard is obtained a beautiful and extensive view of the chain of mountains comprising the Brecknockshire and Carmarthenshire Beacons, with the fertile tract intervening between it and the Black Mountains. Attached to the parsonage-house, which is in very bad repair, are about thirty acres of glebe land. Within a cairn in a field on the Porthaml estate, the property of the Earl of Ashburnham, in this parish, was found, some years ago, a spearhead of flint, nearly seven inches in length, and two inches broad in the widest part, which had been rudely chipped into its artificial form, and appears to have been made before the use of iron was known in this country. In the same cairn was found a coarse earthen vessel, which, in the eagerness of the workmen to discover the treasure it was supposed to contain, was broken. Walter Watkins, of Cwm, in the parish of Glâsbury, by will in 1775, charged certain lands called Tŷr Jenkin Perrot, in this parish, with the payment of the annual sum of ten shillings to two of the poorest legitimate children in it. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £55. 12.

LLANELLIAN YN RHÔS (LLAN-ELIAN), a parish in the Uchdulas division of the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, near the road from Liverpool to Holyhead, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Abergele, containing 604 inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £11. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is dedicated to St. Hilary. Divers small benefactions, amounting in the whole to about £150, have been made for the benefit of the poor, the interest of which is distributed among the most deserving objects annually on St. Thomas' day. Fynnon St. Elian, a well notorious as being resorted to for the execrable practise of invoking vengeance upon the heads of such as have given grievous offence, is situated near this place, but in the parish of LLANDRILLO, the article on which contains an account of the ceremonies observed on these occasions. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £291. 10.

LLANELITYD (LLAN-ELITYD), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W.) from Dôlgelley, on the road to Barmouth, containing 416 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the eastern banks of the river Maw, or Mawddach, near its confluence with the Wnion, extends for nearly five miles in various directions from the church, and comprises some fine tracts of meadow and arable land. An act of parliament was obtained, in 1809, for enclosing the common and waste lands, under the provisions of which four thousand one hundred and sixty-four acres have been subsequently enclosed. The river Eden falls into the Mawddach about three miles above the village, and the scenery throughout the parish is richly diversified: the views along the banks of the rivers are beautifully picturesque, in some places even highly romantic, and have acquired much additional beauty from the extensive and flourishing plantations of G. H. Vaughan, Esq., recently made. There are several ancient mansions in the neighbourhood, inhabited by opulent families; and the venerable remains of the abbey of Cymmer, nearly opposite to the church, on the other side of the river, form an interesting feature in the village. Within three miles and a half of the village, near the road to Trawsvynydd, is the celebrated waterfall of Rhaiadr Dû, more generally called Dôl y Mellynlyn, from its proximity to a house of that name, and of which a description is given in the article on Dôl-gelley. The principal of the neighbouring seats are, Hengwrt, the property of G. H. Vaughan, Esq.; and Dôl-uwch-Eogryd, which was built by one of the family of Nanney of Nannau: on an eminence within the grounds of the latter, commanding a fine view of the vale, is a spacious banqueting-room, called the Apollo; and on a wall adjoining the house is the inscription "Non Domus Dominum, sed Dominus Domum," which was removed from the house to its present situation. Copper-ore abounds in the parish, and a mine is now being worked with considerable success at Cain Mawr. Peat is found here in abundance, affording an ample supply of fuel. The river Mawddach is navigable for vessels not exceeding twenty tons as far as the bridge of Llanelltyd, to which the tide flows, and several small craft come up to this place from Barmouth: vessels of small burden are occasionally built here. The road from Dôl-gelley divides into two branches at the village, one on the left leading down the vale along the river side to Barmouth, and another on the right towards Trawsvynydd and Tan y Bwlch. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of G. H. Vaughan, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is an ancient structure, and contains some good monuments, among which is one to the memory of Robert Howel Vaughan, Esq., of Hengwrt and Nannau. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, to which is attached a Sunday school. Mr. Richard David, in 1770, bequeathed a small portion of land, the rent of which he directed to be paid to his nearest relative in the first degree, legally settled in this parish.

Cymmer abbey, or, as it is called by the Welsh, Y Vaner, and Yr-hên-Vonachlog, was founded in 1198, by Meredydd and his brother Gruffydd, sons of Cynan ab Owain Gwynedd, for monks of the Cistercian order, and dedicated to St. Mary. Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, who was a great benefactor to this establishment, augmented its endowments and gave to the abbot Esau and his brethren an ample charter, confirming all preceding grants, and conferring additional and very extensive privileges. From this period it continued to flourish until the dissolution, at which time its revenue was £58. 15. 4. The site remained in the possession of the crown till the reign of Elizabeth, who granted it to her favourite, Robert Earl of Leicester. The present remains of the conventual buildings consist principally of the abbey church, of which the roofless walls are yet standing: at the east end are three lofty, narrow, and sharply pointed windows, above which are three of smaller dimensions, thickly overspread with ivy: on the south side of the east end are several niches, in which were anciently statues. The great hall and part of the other buildings have been converted into a farm-house, and the approach is formed by a noble avenue of stately lime trees. These remains form an interesting and picturesque ruin, and, as seen from the parish church, and from many points on the opposite side of the river, have a truly venerable and romantic appearance. On a small circular eminence, near a place called Pentre, and within a short distance of the abbey, stood the ancient castle of Cymmer, erected by the sons of Uchtryd ab Edwin, and demolished, in 1113, by the sons of Cadwgan ab Bleddyn, between whom and the founders hostilities had arisen. There are no remains of this fortress, except the site, which is still called Tommen, or "the Tumulus." Hengwrt was formerly the seat of Robert Vaughan, Esq., an eminent antiquary, who published various works on British antiquities, and collected and transcribed a vast number of Welsh manuscripts, which are still carefully preserved at this ancient mansion, and which were augmented by a large collection made by Mr. Jones, of Gelli Lydy, according to a mutual agreement between those gentlemen, that the survivor should possess both. Mr. Vaughan was a correspondent of the learned Usher, Selden, Sir Simon D'Ewes, and other eminent men of his time: he died in 1666, and was buried in the parish church. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £202. 18.

LLANELLY, a parish in the hundred of CRICK-HOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by N.) from Abergavenny, on the road to Merthyr-Tydvil, composed of the hamlets of Aberbaidon and Maesgwartha, each of which separately supports its own poor, and containing 4041 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated on the river Usk, and is divided into two nearly equal parts by the river Clydach, a mountain torrent, which, descending with impetuosity through a deep channel obstructed by rocks, forms many picturesque falls in its course through the parish. The surrounding scenery is strikingly and richly diversified, combining features of romantic grandeur and enchanting beauty. The scenery on the banks of the Clydach, in particular, though seldom visited by the tourist, and consequently little known, is remarkably picturesque and beautiful. The banks of this rapid stream rise precipitously to an immense height, and are richly clothed with wood, and in some parts with timber of majestic growth, forming, in the luxuriance and variety of the foliage, a pleasingly striking contrast to the rugged and barren summits of the mountains which rise above them. The Clydach, in its progress through the narrow cwm, or vale, which they enclose, forms two interesting falls, and there was formerly a third, called Pistyll Mawr, which, however, has been destroyed by the sinking of a coal mine, within the last few years, at the head of the rock from which the water was precipitated, when the channel of the river was bored some distance higher up, and the stream, which is carried through a tunnel, now emerges at the bottom of the rock. Of the two others, called respectively Pwll Crochan and Pwll Cŵn, the latter is by far the more picturesque, being formed by the precipitation of the river from a considerable height into a basin worn in the rock by the continual action of the water, from which it descends with great force from an elevation of thirty feet into a pool encircled with impending rocks and thick underwood, over which a few aged yew trees cast a sombre shade. The parish abounds with mineral wealth of various kinds, in procuring and manufacturing which the inhabitants are principally employed. In the mountains which enclose the small but picturesque vale of Clydach, coal, iron-ore, limestone, and fire clay are found in great profusion. The Clydach collieries, which are very extensive, belong to the Brecknock Boat Company, and supply the town of Brecknock and the surrounding country to a great distance with bituminous coal. An immense quantity of coal is also raised here by the Clydach Iron Company, for the supply of their extensive works: it is all worked by levels, brought down the mountain steep by means of inclined planes, and conveyed in trams by the rail-road belonging to the canal company, either for the supply of the iron-works, or to the Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, for conveyance to Brecknock and its vicinity. The Clydach iron-works, now belonging to Messrs. E. Frere and Co., were originally established about two hundred years ago, by a member of the family of Hanbury, of Pontypool, in the county of Monmouth. These works, which are conducted upon a very extensive scale, comprise three blast furnaces for smelting the ore, worked by a steam-engine of seventy horse power, and by a water-wheel forty feet in diameter: the forges, in which charcoal is employed, are supplied with air by a steam-engine of smaller power, and by a water-wheel of the same diameter; and the rolling-mills for converting the pig iron into bars are set in motion by the water-wheel alone. Notwithstanding the general depression of the iron trade, these works are in full operation, and afford employment to about one thousand men: the quantity of iron produced at the Clydach works, in the year 1831, was ten thousand tons of pig iron and six thousand tons of bar iron, in the manufacture of which fifty thousand tons of coal, and a proportionate quantity of limestone and ore were consumed. Great facilities of communication between the mineral and manufacturing districts of this parish and other parts of the kingdom are afforded by the Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, and by a rail-road from the aqueduct below Aber Clydach to the Beaufort iron-works, in the parish of Llangattock. This rail-road, which is the property of the canal company, and about eight miles in length, winds up Cwm Clydach and communicates along its whole course with tram-roads from the different works in the neighbourhood. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, after traversing a distance of sixteen miles from the town of Brecknock, with a fall of sixty-eight feet, by means of six locks, is here conveyed over the valley and stream of the Clydach, at an elevation of little less than a hundred feet above the bed of the river, by a strong aqueduct of stone, supported by a prodigious embankment raised upon an arch, twenty-two feet in the span, built over the Clydach in 1799; the whole forming a prominent feature in the scenery of the vale. The living is a perpetual curacy, united, with that of Llangeney, to the rectory of Llangattock, in the arch-deaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to Ellyw, is a small ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a low massive tower, and consists of a nave and one aisle, separated by a series of pointed arches. It is situated on an exposed eminence, about a mile south of the Usk, and a little westward of the Clydach; and the churchyard, which is small, is enclosed by yew trees of ancient growth, and commands a charming prospect over the Vale of Usk, which abounds with richly varied and highly picturesque scenery. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and for Calvinistic and English and Welsh Wesleyan Methodists. Parochial schools for the gratuitous instruction of the poor are supported by subscription. Edward Lewis of Aberclydach, Esq., in 1713, bequeathed a rent-charge of £3, payable out of the produce of his estate of Pant Dreiniog, for six Welsh sermons to be preached annually in the church of Llanelly, by some clergyman other than the incumbent and his curate, "as long as the church of England shall continue in this country." Mr. William Lewis, of Llanelly, in 1760, bequeathed £2 per annum, charged on a tenement called Llandewi Ysgŷryd, in the county of Monmouth, to such poor persons not receiving parochial relief as may be thought most deserving. Harry William, or Harry William Jenkin, of Llanelly, in 1687, bequeathed to the poor of this parish certain lands, called Tŷr yr Hooper, which are supposed to be now let considerably below their value. On a hill called the Gaer, overlooking the Vale of Clydach, are the remains of an ancient encampment, supposed to be of British construction; and on a rock opposite to it are some vestiges of another military post, called Dinas. Mr. Edward Llwyd, who examined the coal and iron mines throughout the county of Brecknock, more than a century ago, discovered near the mines, in this parish, a singular fossil production, consisting of a cylindrical piece of limestone, about eight inches in length and three inches in diameter, having the surface ornamented with narrow and equidistant circular cavities, in each of which was a circle of small diameter, with a small stud in the centre: various spars are also frequently found among the iron-ores in this neighbourhood. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £375. 4.

LLANELLY (LLANELLI), an incorporated seaport and market town, and a parish, in the hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (S. E. by S.) from Carmarthen, and 216 (W. by N.) from London, containing 7646 inhabitants, of which number, 4173 are in the borough hamlet. This place, which appears to be of great antiquity, derives its name from its church being dedicated to St. Elliw. It was probably an ancient British town of some importance, and remains of British fortifications may be distinctly traced in the immediate neighbourhood. The town is situated on the northern bank of the Burry river, which forms the expansive æstuary of the river Loughor, and constitutes the boundary between the counties of Carmarthen and Glamorgan; and though formerly described as a small and insignificant place, inhabited chiefly by sailors and persons employed in the neighbouring coal mines, it has, from the convenience of its situation on a navigable river, and from the richness of the mineral productions of its neighbourhood in iron, coal, and limestone, risen into manufacturing and commercial importance, and is still rapidly increasing in population and extent. An act of parliament was obtained in 1813, by which a partial enclosure of that portion of the parish immediately dependent on the town was effected, and the land vested in trustees, to be let on lease, and the proceeds applied to the improvement of the town and harbour: this property now produces £600 per annum, and is capable of being much increased in value. Small houses of genteel appearance have been erected in almost every direction; as also have numerous others of inferior character, which are occupied as soon as they can be completed. The town has been recently paved, and is amply supplied with water from the river Lliedi, which flows through it. Its prosperity will be further increased by the formation of the intended turnpike road from Loughor to Carmarthen, under an act recently obtained, which will pass through it, and, as the Swansea Road Trust are also empowered to make a road from that town to Loughor, will most probably become the mail coach road to Carmarthen.

Llanelly is supposed to be situated in or near the centre of the mineral basin of South Wales, which is calculated to contain no fewer than forty-two beds of coal, incumbent upon each other, with intervening strata of stone, &c.: upon these beds are found numerous fossil remains. The abundance of excellent coal in the vicinity has already caused the establishment here of two extensive copper-works, called the Llanelly Copper-Works and the Cambrian Copper-Works, and of two large iron-foundries, which are in active operation. The Cambrian Copper-Works are remarkable for having only one chimney, of the extraordinary height of two hundred and thirty-one feet: it is of a pyramidal shape, and, from its loftiness, forms a conspicuous and imposing object in the view of the town. Several extensive collieries are here in full operation, and are equally distinguished for the quantity and the superior quality of their produce, consisting of coal and culm of both the coking and stone species. The port, which exercises paramount jurisdiction over those of Carmarthen, St. Clear's, Laugharne, Kidwelly, and Pembrey, as dependent members, has been greatly improved under the provisions of the act of parliament above mentioned, prior to the passing of which it was only open beach. In 1812, an act was obtained, sanctioning the formation of a navigable canal, called the Llanelly canal, to connect this port and town with the Kidwelly canal, at Spudder's Bridge, and of a line of railway from the upper end of the Kidwelly canal to the coal and limestone works in the Great Mountain, with several other branches of canal or railway, which designs were accordingly carried into execution. Under an act obtained in 1829 the construction of a railway, more than two miles in length, is authorized, from the interior of this parish to the coast at Machynis Pool, where it is to terminate in a wet dock, calculated to accommodate twenty-one vessels, each of three hundred tons' burden. These works will greatly facilitate the conveyance of the mineral produce of the interior to this place, either for the supply of the works established in the town, or for the purpose of being shipped from the port. The principal article of import is copper-ore, the produce of which, after having been here manufactured, is shipped off to the value of £200,000 per annum: not less than one hundred thousand tons of coal and culm are also annually exported, some of the coal, owing to its peculiarly fine quality, being shipped to France, and to the Mediterranean for the use of the steam-boats. Besides the large dock connected with the railway now in progress, there are three other docks, one of which is a floating basin, capable of admitting vessels of one hundred and eighty tons' burden. During the last five years vessels of an aggregate burden of fifty-three thousand nine hundred and ninety-six tons have cleared out annually on an average. The improvement of the navigation of the rivers Burry, Loughor, and Lliedi, is regulated by the act obtained in 1812, by which commissioners are empowered to scour, enlarge, and deepen the same, to erect buoys and lights, and to regulate the pilotage and mooring of vessels, for which a small tonnage rate is paid by such vessels as enter the river Burry. The markets, which are abundantly supplied with provisions of every kind, and with hardware and other articles of merchandise, are held on Thursday and Saturday, and are much frequented: the fairs, which are principally for horses, cattle, and pigs, are on Holy Thursday and September 30th, and are in general numerous attended. Llanelly is a borough by prescription, and most probably received its corporate privileges from its ancient lords, though no evidence of any regular charter having been granted to it has yet been discovered. The government is vested in a portreeve and an indefinite number of burgesses: the former is chosen annually at the court leet of the lord of the manor, and the latter are elected by a jury of burgesses at the same court, which is the only mode of obtaining the freedom. By the late act for amending the representation of the people it has been united with Carmarthen in the return of a member to parliament: the right of voting is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of at least ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the number of tenements of this value, within the limits of the borough, which are minutely defined in the Appendix to this work, is about one hundred and ninety-eight, or upwards. A court for the lordship is held every alternate Monday, before the lord's officers, for the recovery of debts under forty shillings, contracted within the liberty. By the late Boundary Act Llanelly has been made a polling-place in the election of the knights for the shire.

The parish contains about eighteen thousand acres, and is divided into five hamlets, called the Borough, Berwick, Glyn, Hengoed, and Westvae hamlets. The living, which is rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., as a discharged vicarage, is strictly a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £200 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Rees Goring Thomas, Esq., who is impropiator of both the great and small tithes. Previously to the Reformation, at which time the tithes were alienated from the church, there was a chapel in each of the five hamlets into which the parish is divided: of these, the chapel in the borough is the only one remaining entire, and at present forms the chancel of the parish church, to which two transepts have been added, and other additions made; the whole constituting an irregular edifice, having a tower surmounted by an embattled parapet. It is said to be the intention of the patron, Mr. Thomas, to rebuild those of St. John and St. Dewi, or St. David, and to endow them for the maintenance of a clergyman. There are three places of worship for Baptists, and one each for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Several free schools are supported by subscription, in which about two hundred boys and eighty girls receive gratuitous instruction. The sum of £5 per annum was bequeathed by Mr. Allen of this parish, to be expended in the purchase of bibles, for the poor, which was for some years regularly paid and applied to that purpose; but the payment of it has latterly been discontinued, under the operation of the Mortmain act. On a small promontory projecting into the Burry river, a little below the town, which was formerly insulated, a monastery is supposed to have been erected by St. Peiro, about the year 513: this saint constituted himself first abbot, and was succeeded by Samson, a disciple of St. Illtyd: the farm-house of Machynis, the name of which is supposed to be a contraction of Mynach Ynys, or "Monk Island," is conjectured to occupy the site of this ancient religious house. Pen Castell, in the immediate neighbourhood of the town, is thought to be the vestige of an ancient British fortification. Near the church is a fine old mansion, formerly belonging to Sir John Stepney, Bart., who for many years, during the reign of George III., was ambassador at the courts of Berlin and Dresden: after being for more than sixty years deserted by the family, during which time it was let out in different tenements, and the conservatory converted into a market-house, it came into the possession of William Chambers, of Bicknor, in the county of Kent, Esq., who, at considerable expense, has succeeded in restoring the interior to its legitimate use, and has since erected a market-place for the accommodation of the town. Strady, the seat of D. Lewes, Esq., and Glanmôr, the residence of R. I. Nevill, Esq., are also situated in this parish: the former, prior to its becoming the property of the father of the present owner, belonged to the ancient family of the Mansels, who had extensive possessions in this and the adjoining parishes: two of this family were created baronets in 1621, but one of the titles is extinct, the other being enjoyed by the present Sir William Mansel, Bart. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the entire parish amounts to £1300. 2.

LLANELWETH (LLAN-ELWEDD), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, nearly 1 mile (N.E.) from Builth, containing 182 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Wye, by which it is separated on the south and south-west from the parish of Builth, in the county of Brecknock, and is intersected by the turnpike road from that place to Newtown in Montgomeryshire, from which, soon after it enters this parish, branches a road up the eastern bank of the Wye to Rhaiadr. The surface is generally undulating, with some abrupt eminences of considerable elevation: the lands, with the exception of some elevated commons and a small rocky district, are enclosed and in an excellent state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied; and the views from the higher grounds, and especially from the rocks beyond Wellfield, are extensive and extremely rich. In the neighbourhood are a few gentlemen's seats. Llanelweth Hall, the ancient residence of the Gwynnes of Garth, in the county of Brecknock, (of which family was Marmaduke Gwynne, a judge on the North Wales circuit, who died in 1712,) has been deserted by its proprietor, and is now in the occupation of a tenant. Wellfield House, erected in 1787, by David Thomas, Esq., of London, descended from a branch of the family of Thomas of Llwyn Madoc, in the county of Brecknock, and now the property of his nephew, Edward Thomas, Esq., is a spacious and handsome mansion, with a portico of the Tuscan order, finely situated on a lofty eminence, and embosomed in flourishing plantations, forming a prominent and pleasing object from every point of view, and strikingly contrasting with the rugged barrenness of some of the surrounding heights. The grounds are pleasingly ornamented with shrubberies and walks, and command an extensive and richly varied prospect, embracing a fine view of the rivers Wye and Irvon winding through their respective vales, with the town of Builth and the adjacent country. From the summit of an eminence on this estate is one of the most extensive and magnificent panoramic views in any part of the principality: it comprehends a circle of more than twelve miles in the radius, entirely enclosed with lofty hills, and embraces a vast number of interesting objects, and a rich variety of beautiful and picturesque scenery. To the east are the Black Mountains, of dreary and rugged appearance, with the acclivities of others of more softened aspect; and to the west are the mountains of Tregarn and Garn Wen, the former said to be the highest ridge, next to the Beacons, in this part of South Wales, and the latter remarkable for its conical form, and the cairn which crowns its summit. About a mile to the north of Wellfield is Penkerrig House, formerly the seat of the family of Jones, and now, by marriage with the heiress of that family, the property of Thomas Thomas, Esq., of Ystrad, near Caerphilly, in Glamorganshire: the house has been recently enlarged and partly rebuilt, and embellished with a new front in the Elizabethan style: it is pleasingly ornamented with a rich plantation of evergreens, and is sheltered in the rear by a hill of considerable elevation, covered with stately timber. In the grounds, which are laid out with great taste, is a fine sheet of water, covering about six acres; and the view from the house, though not extensive, is picturesque.

This parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £6. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Edward David Thomas, Esq., as lessee of the tithes under the prebendary of Llanelweth. The church, dedicated to St. Matthew, a small edifice not distinguished by any remarkable architectural details, is situated on an eminence near the high road, and on the bank of the river Wye. Lady Hartstrye, Hartstrong, or Hartstongue, bequeathed a small farm in the parish of St. Harmon, in this county, now producing £16. 12. per annum, for the gratuitous education of poor children of this parish: from this fund is supported a small charity school, which is now held in a room hired for that purpose, but for which it is intended to erect a suitable building by subscription. One poor child is annually apprenticed from the funds of the Boughrood charity, this being one of the sixteen parishes which are entitled to partake of that benefaction. On the summit of the eminence near Wellfield House are the imperfect remains of a semicircular intrenchment, once defended by a rampart of loose stones, and to which a walk has been constructed from the grounds of that seat; and on the confines of this parish and of that of Disserth, where the desperate battle between Rhys ab Tewdwr and the three sons of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn is supposed by some to have been fought, may be seen, from this eminence, the square moat of Cwrt Llêchryd, so called, perhaps, from a monument erected there to the memory of Riryd ab Bleddyn, who was slain in that battle. At a short distance is a tumulus, called by the Welsh "Castell," of which nothing historical is with certainty known: by some it is supposed to have been surmounted by an arx speculatoria, and by others to be only sepulchral. There are also some remains of a fortification on the hill behind Penkerrig House, but they are in a very imperfect state. On the farm belonging to the Wellfield estate are two remarkable quarries; in one is obtained a kind of transitional clay slate, which displays some curious marine impressions of a species of the Trilobite: the other produces a hard kind of clay, or stone, perforated with small holes emitting a fine black powder: the external appearance of the substance indicates the action of fire, and in the clay are found some fine specimens of crystals, some of them very beautiful and perfect. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £83. 16.

LLANENDDWYN (LLAN-ENDDWYN), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.N.W.) from Barmouth, on the road to Harlech, containing 798 inhabitants. The village is pleasantly situated, and the inhabitants are partly engaged in the manufacture of webs, partly in the working of mines of manganese, which metal is found in the parish, and the rest in agriculture. An act of parliament was obtained, in 1810, for the enclosure of the waste lands, under the provisions of which two thousand three hundred and seven acres were allotted; and a considerable portion of this tract has been brought into a good state of cultivation. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llanddwywau annexed, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £10. 18. 1½., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Enddwyn, is an ancient structure. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The poor children of this parish are gratuitously instructed in the parochial school of Llanddwywau. Near the high road is a great stone, called Coeten Arthur, or "Arthur's Quoit." The waters of a spring called St. Enddwyn's well, are thought to be efficacious in the cure of rheumatic affections. The distinguished Archdeacon Prÿs was for some years rector of this parish; and Colonel Jones, one of the judges who passed sentence of death on Charles I., was buried in the churchyard. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £178. 18.

LLANENGAN (LLAN-EINGION), a parish chiefly in the hundred of COMMITMAEN, but partly in that of GAFLOGION, Lleyl division of the county of CARNAR-

VON, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (S.W.) from Pwllheli containing 1016 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises the headland, or promontory, of Penrhÿn Dû, extending into St. Tudwal's Roads in St. George's channel, is pleasantly situated at the southern extremity of the county; it is about four miles in length and three in breadth, and contains three thousand nine hundred and eighty acres. The surface is varied, much of the parish being hilly, while some ground near the river Sôch is so low and flat as to be subject to frequent inundation: the stream above-mentioned is the only one by which the parish is watered. At a small distance from the shore are two islands, upon the larger of which are the remains of an ancient chapel, now converted into a barn, which was dedicated to St. Tudwal, from whom the extensive roads off this coast derive their name. St. Tudwal's Roads afford good anchorage for the largest ships, and are so extensive and secure that the whole of the British navy might ride here in perfect safety during the heaviest gales. The bay, which is the finest and the most secure in the channel, affords an asylum for vessels which put in here when in danger of being driven into the adjoining exposed bay, called "Hell's Mouth," or upon the extensive ridge of sand called Sarn Badrig, or "Patrick's Causeway," which stretches from the shore of Merionethshire nearly into this bay. The soil of the parish is of various qualities: in some places it consists of clay, in others of sand, and in others again of fine loamy soils, or rocky land. Extensive veins of lead-ore have been discovered in some parts of the parish, and several attempts have been made to work them; but the influx of water into the mines is so great that the expense in many instances has exceeded the profits, and they are consequently worked only upon a very limited scale. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £17. 6. 5½., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Einion, is a spacious structure, newly pewed, principally in the later style of English architecture, with some portions of a much earlier date: it consists of a nave, chancel, and north and south aisles, and is remarkable as the only parish church in the county having a tower and a peal of bells: the tower is square, lofty, and situated at the western end of the edifice; the bells are four in number. According to an inscription, now nearly obliterated, it appears to have been built by Einion, King of Lleyl, who flourished about the commencement of the sixth century, and who is said to have founded a college at Penmon, which he placed under the superintendence of his nephew Seiriol, and to which the Scandinavian wanderers on the neighbouring coasts are said to have resorted for instruction in the Christian faith. The rectory-house stands in an enclosure called the "Prior's Field." There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The produce of several small charitable donations and bequests, of which some are invested in land, is annually distributed among the most necessitous of the poor during the winter. Upon the sea-coast are two tumuli, or barrows, called by the inhabitants Castellau, or small forts, but which are probably the graves of some warriors of remote times. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £263. 4.

LLANENGHENEDL (LLANENGHENEL), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from Bôdederu, containing 412 inhabitants. This parish forms a level and fertile district, watered by numerous rivulets, and comprises a considerable extent of enclosed and well-cultivated land. The village is pleasantly situated on the old Holyhead road, and the new line of road to that place passes through a considerable portion of the parish. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing, and the adjacent country is finely varied. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanvâchreth, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Enghenel, commander of the British forces under Cadvan, in the memorable battle of Chester, in 603, and said to have been erected about the commencement of the seventh century, is a small but lofty edifice, situated on a rock, close to the road leading from Llangevni to Holyhead: several parts of the present structure display marks of very great antiquity. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Several small charitable donations and bequests have been made by various benefactors for the relief of the poor of this parish, the produce of which is principally appropriated to the reduction of the poor's rate. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £164. 10.

LLANERCHILA (LLANERCH-ILA), a township in that part of the parish of LLANSANTFRAID YN MECHAN which is in the upper division of the hundred of DEYTHUR, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W. by N.) from Llanvyllin, containing 141 inhabitants.

LLANERCHLLWYDOG (LLANERCH-LWYDOG), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Fishguard, containing 169 inhabitants. This place derives its name from Clydawc, one of the reguli of the county, by whom, according to Mr. Fenton, the church was originally founded, and who, while pursuing the diversion of the chase in this vicinity, was treacherously murdered, and afterwards interred in the churchyard. The parish is romantically situated on the river Gwynn, which, after pursuing a north-westerly course, falls into Fishguard bay: it comprises a large tract of land, which, with the exception of a mountainous district, is wholly enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surface is finely undulated, and the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified and in some parts highly picturesque. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Llanllawer annexed, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of Thomas Lloyd, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. David, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance: in the churchyard are two upright stones of great antiquity, which are supposed to mark the grave of Clydawc. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £56. 1.

LLANERCHROCHWELL (LLANERCH-VROCHWEL), a township in the parish of GUILSFIELD, lower division of the hundred of POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 2½ miles (N. W.) from Welsh- pool. The population is returned with the parish. It lies near the road from GUILSFIELD to Llanvair, which is here crossed by another from Welshpool to Meivod. Many respectable residences are situated in this township, and there are a few houses of singular appearance in a pass between the mountains, termed Bwlch Aeddau, from having been anciently fortified by the chieftain whose name it bears. The ground in the vicinity, though hilly, is well cultivated: the township is within the liberties of the borough of Welshpool.

LLANERCHYMEDD, a market town and chapelry, chiefly in the parish of AMLWCH, but partly in those of LLANBEULAN, LLÊHCYNVARWYDD, and CEIDIO, in the hundreds of LLYVON, MENAI, and TWRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 14 miles (W. N. W.) from Beaumaris, and 263 (N. W. by W.) from London. The population is returned with the respective parishes. This town, of which two-thirds are situated within the parish of Amlwch, is, in respect of population, the second in the Isle of Anglesey, and appears to have derived its progressive increase in extent and importance from its central situation. Previously to the commencement of the parliamentary war, it had become a very populous village, and as such it is set forth in a petition which, during the protectorate of Cromwell, was presented for the establishment of a market, which was granted in 1657, and confirmed by Charles II., in 1665. This market, with the exception of that of Beaumaris, was the only one in the whole island, and constituted a chief source of the prosperity of the town until the year 1785, when a market was granted to Llangevni, the still more central situation of which renders it more convenient for the general resort of the inhabitants of the island. Llanerchymedd is pleasantly situated on the high road from Bangor to Amlwch. The making of shoes is carried on to a very considerable extent, affording employment to more than two hundred and fifty men; and the manufacture of a high dried Welsh snuff, closely resembling in its quality the celebrated Irish snuff, commonly called Lundy Foote's, for which it has partially become a substitute, has recently been established upon an extensive scale: the business, however, is not conducted upon a plan calculated to ensure to the inventors all the advantages of which, under better management, it might be made productive. The market, which is well attended, is on Wednesday; and five annual fairs are held under the same letters patent by which the market was granted, but the days are not fixed with certainty, being frequently changed to suit the convenience of the dealers, who are thus enabled to drive the cattle to the English fairs: the nominal days are, January 1st, March 10th, April 4th, May 6th, June 23rd, the three Wednesdays before August 7th, and the 14th of that month, October 2nd, November 13th, and the three first Wednesdays after the last-mentioned day. The vill of Llanerchymedd, forming that portion of the town which is in the parish of Llanbeulan, now deemed extra-parochial, and containing fifty-seven inhabitants, maintains its own poor, but has neither churchwardens nor any other parish officers, the whole consisting only of six acres of glebe land, which, together with the houses built on them, belong to the rector: the rest of the parish is eight miles distant, being separated from this detached portion by no fewer than five intervening parishes. The poor of the other parts of the town are maintained with those of the several parishes in which they are respectively situated. The living is a curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanbeulan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious structure, with a lofty square tower at the western end, and is the joint property of the families of Lluidiarth and Bodelwyddan, who have always kept it in repair without any charge to the inhabitants of the town. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school, capable of receiving about a hundred and sixty children, and in which fifty-four boys and sixty girls are gratuitously instructed, was built in 1824, and is liberally supported by subscription. Children of the adjoining parishes of Coed-anna and Ceidio are eligible to this school.

LLANERVUL (LLAN-ERVUL), a parish in two divisions, Lower and Upper, in the upper division of the hundred of MATHRAVAL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (W.N.W.) from Llanvair, containing 989 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Ervul, appears to have been a place of some importance at a very early period, and abounds with vestiges of British and Roman antiquity: it extends nearly eight miles in length and three in breadth, and is pleasantly situated in the vale of the river Banwy, the whole of which, with its encircling hills, is included in this and the adjoining parishes of Llangadfan and Garthbeibio. The surface is boldly undulating: the lands are but partially enclosed and cultivated, the hilly parts affording only pasturage for sheep and young cattle during the summer. The soil of the lower grounds is tolerably fertile, but that of the upper is poor, resting chiefly on a stiff clay or brittle slate, requiring the process of paring and burning, with an unusual quantity of manure, to render it capable of producing grain of any kind. By far the greater portion of the parish, having a boggy surface, forms an uncultivated waste, and is claimed as sheepwalks by the several farmers whose lands are contiguous. On the Drûm are three pools, of which one is called Llŷn y grinwydden, or "the pool of the withered tree," situated on a rocky hill, and said to be of unfathomable depth: it is about seventy yards in length, and contains no fish but eels and carp. Llŷn Hir, or "the long pool," is about three hundred yards in length, and one hundred and fifty in breadth: the upper end of it is so firmly crusted over with the slough brought down by the floods from the turbaries above it, that sheep and men can walk upon the surface; but what it loses in extent, from this circumstance, it gains at the opposite extremity by the violent action of its waters, driven by the west winds, against the banks, which are of peat earth: this pool contains excellent red trout, but in very hot summers it is nearly dried up: on the north side is a stone inscribed MET. II. 1430; it is at present seven feet distant from the bank, which space is supposed to have been gained by the receding of the water since that date. Llŷn y Bugail, or "the shepherd's pool," abounds with eels, but is not distinguished by any peculiar characteristics. Within this parish, on the border of that of Llanbrŷnmair, is a pool, called Llŷn Gwyddior, or Cadivor, of remarkably clear water, which formerly contained great numbers of fine trout, but these have been extirpated by the introduction of pike. This pool, which is about a mile in circumference, is situated on an eminence extending in a direction from north to south: to the west of this ridge are some very deep hollows, open to the south-west and north-west, within which the collected winds burst impetuously through an opening in the ridge parallel with the direction of the pool, and agitate its water with great violence. The wool produced here is generally coarse, especially on the higher hills, on which the hardest breed of sheep in the principality is fed: these hills are covered with heath, and among them are found extensive turbaries, sufficient for the supply of the surrounding district. In 1797, a company of adventurers began to sink for coal at Cyvylchau, in this parish, but their enterprise was not attended with success, and the attempt was discontinued: about the same time a few specimens of copper-ore were dug up in the township of Coed-Talog, but no regular works have been established. The turnpike road from Welshpool to Machynlleth and Dôlgeley passes through the village, in which an annual fair takes place on the 7th of May, and the petty sessions for the upper division of the hundred of Mathraval are held occasionally.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9.2.11., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Ervul, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture: in the churchyard is an ancient monument, commonly supposed to have been erected in memory of the patron saint, bearing a mutilated inscription, which, however, as far as it is legible, does not at all support this conjecture. There was formerly an ancient chapel at Dôlwen, in the township of Cevnllŷs Uchâv. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. Mrs. Priscilla Forster, a descendant of the family of the Herberts of Llŷsyn, bequeathed £300 for the instruction of poor children of this parish: this sum has been invested in the purchase of a farm, now producing £35 per annum, which is appropriated agreeably to the intentions of the benevolent testatrix. The produce arising from several charitable donations and bequests is annually distributed among the poor. On the summit of an eminence called Moelddolwen, in the township of Cevnllŷs Uchâv, are the remains of a strongly fortified camp, including an irregular quadrilateral area, about a hundred yards in length, and guarded on the west, on which side is the entrance, by an advanced work about twenty yards in diameter: the camp is defended, on the sides where it is most easily accessible, by fosses of greater depth, the earth having been thrown up to form a breastwork. In the same township is a fortified eminence called Gardden, having a circular rampart, which encloses an area seventy yards in diameter. The entrances of these strong holds, both of which are of ancient British construction, are on the most accessible sides of the hill, and, from their breadth, appear to have been contrived for the admission of the chariots armed with scythes, which were in use among the ancient Britons. A ditch and rampart, equal in dimensions to Offa's Dyke, may still be traced crossing the vale of the Banwy near Rhôs y gall. The Roman road from Caer-Sws to the present Chester, or from Caerlleon, in the modern county of Monmouth, to the same city, enters this parish on the hills of the Drûm, passes through a bog called Corsyvisog, now impenetrable from the accumulation of slough descending from the turbaries on the hills, and, traversing the moors in a direct line to Bwlch y Drûm, thence descends through Cynniwyll, crosses the Banwy below Neuadd wên, passes over Craig y Go, and enters the parish of Llanvihangel at Rhÿd pont y Styllod. Though concealed by long grass in the moorish grounds of the Drûm, this road may be easily discerned at a distance, in the recently ploughed lands in various parts of the parish, in which it forms a bold and conspicuous ridge, and in which the materials of its construction may be found a little below the surface. On the common of Craig y Go are vestiges of ancient mines, which are supposed to have been originally worked by the Romans; and at the foot of the declivity of the hill on which the common is situated is a cavern called Ogov Dôlanog, of which the entrance is so narrow as to prevent any person from penetrating far into it. There are two large tumuli and several carneddau in the parish, but no particulars of their origin are recorded. Neuadd wên, now a farm-house, was anciently the mansion of Meredydd ab Cynan ab Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, and appears, from the few remains of the ancient building which have been found among some rubbish at the back of the present farm-house, to have been erected about the eleventh or twelfth century: among these vestiges were the ruins of an arched window, with mouldings of freestone, in the style of that age. This mansion was anciently called Llÿs Wgan, from a rivulet near the spot; and adjoining it is the farm of Llÿsyn, which appears to have derived its name, a diminutive of Llÿs, "a palace," from its vicinity to this residence. Near the church is a fine well, dedicated to the patron saint, the water of which was formerly in great repute for its efficacy in the cure of various diseases. The Rev. Joseph Thomas, who married the daughter of Parkhurst, the Hebrew and Greek lexicographer, and who assisted him in the execution of his literary labours, was born at Llÿsyn. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £396. 18.

LLANEUGRAD (LLAN-EIGRAD), a parish in the hundred of TWRCelyn, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (E.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 323 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the coast of the Irish sea, by which it is bounded on the east, was anciently much more extensive than at present; and not far from the church, upon the site of a farm called Park, are distinct traces of a town or large village, of which the foundations of the buildings alone remain. In the year 873, a memorable battle was fought at Bryngola, within its limits, in which the Danes, who at that time made frequent descents on the coast of Anglesey, were defeated with great slaughter by Roderic the Great, who, after a sanguinary contest, obtained a signal victory over the invaders, and drove them to their ships. The soil of this parish is fertile, and the lands are enclosed and cultivated. The substratum is limestone, of which there are immense rocks in the parish; and extensive quarries of black and grey marble afford employment to a considerable number of the labouring poor: the situation of the place upon the coast affords a facility of exporting the produce of these quarries, and great quantities are shipped to various parts of Great Britain. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llanallgo annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. 10½., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Eugarad, is supposed to have been originally founded, about the year 605, by Eugarad, son of Caw-o-Frydain, and brother of St. Alltgo, who, about the same time, founded the church of Llanallgo: it is a small but somewhat stately edifice, of lofty proportions and venerable appearance: adjoining it is a small antique chapel. On the farm of Llugwy, in this parish, formerly stood a chapel of ease to the neighbouring church of Llanallgo; the small existing remains of which are called Capel Llugwy. The poor are entitled to one-third of the rent of a farm in the parish of Llanvair-Mathavarneithâv, now let for £75 per annum, which is annually distributed among them at Christmas. There are also some small benefactions in land, the produce of which is similarly appropriated. Adjoining the ancient town above noticed are the remains of an extensive and well-fortified camp, in which Roderic is supposed to have stationed his forces in his conflict with the Danes; and on the highest eastern point are some remains, consisting principally of a gateway and some portions of ruined walls, of an ancient building, in which that sovereign is thought to have held his court while engaged in repelling the Danes from this part of his dominions. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £97. 2.

LLANFINNAN (LLAN-FINAN), a parish in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W.) from Beaumaris, containing 163 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Finnan, by whom it was originally founded in the early part of the seventh century, is pleasantly situated on the old line of road from London to Holyhead. It comprises a considerable portion of elevated ground, the substratum of which is limestone; and the lower lands, which are fertile and productive, are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature; and the views from the higher grounds extend over a large tract of country, abounding with interesting objects. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Llanvihangel-Ysceiviog, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Dean of Bangor. The church is a small plain edifice, and contains several monuments to the memory of deceased members of the family of Lloyd. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Six poor children of this parish are taught gratuitously in the parochial school of Llanvihangel-Ysceiviog, under an endowment of the Rev. Dr. John Jones, Dean of Bangor, who was for some years curate of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £71. 9.

LLANGADOCK (LLAN-GADOG), a market town and parish, comprising the hamlets of Above-Sawdde, Dyfryn-Cydrich, and Gwynve, in the lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 21 miles (E. N. E.) from Carmarthen, and 188 (W. by N.) from London, and containing 2476 inhabitants.

This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cadog, is of very remote antiquity; and the town, which was formerly of much greater importance than at present, was anciently distinguished for its castle, of which frequent notice occurs in the Welsh annals. By whom, or at what period, this fortress was originally erected, is not known; but in the various struggles of the native chieftains of South Wales, for the extension of their territories, and in the frequent dissensions which arose among them, it was invariably an object of the greatest importance, and the occupation of it was eagerly contended for by the adverse parties. In 1204, the castle of Llangadock was strongly fortified by Rhys ab Gruffydd, from whom, however, it was soon taken by his uncle Maelgwyn, assisted by Gwenwynwyn, Prince of Powys: but these chieftains did not long remain in possession of it, as it was recovered in a successful assault by Rhys, who continued to hold it for some time. About the year 1208, Rhys Vychan, otherwise Rhys Grŷg, brother of Maelgwyn, having quarrelled with his nephews Rhys and Owain, turned his arms against them, and dispossessed them of this fortress, in which he placed a strong garrison; but the latter chieftains, on being apprized of the circumstance, marched against it with all their forces, and, putting the garrison to the sword, levelled it with the ground. The town suffered materially from the ravages of the English vassals, during the continuance of hostilities between them and the native inhabitants of this part of South Wales. The Welsh prince Llewelyn, having made his submission to Edward I., expectations were fondly entertained that the country would have enjoyed a respite from the continual depredations committed by the English who had settled in this part of the principality; but soon after the accession of that monarch to the throne, the oppressive tyranny of his officers at Aberystwith drove the inhabitants once more into open rebellion; and the brave Llewelyn again had recourse to arms. On this occasion, the archbishop of Canterbury endeavoured to adjust the differences which had arisen between the natives and the English; and to this prelate Rhys Vychan complained that, among other excesses, the English had attacked and plundered the church of Llangadock, wounded the priest, whom they left expiring before the high altar, converted that sacred edifice into stabling for their horses, and burned the houses in the town. After the entire subjugation of Wales by Edward, and the dispersion of the family of Dynevor, to whom the castle of Llangadock belonged, that fortress was most probably neglected, and suffered to fall into decay, no vestiges of it being now visible.

The town is beautifully situated between the rivers Brân and Sawdde, over the former of which it has a neat stone bridge of three arches, and near its confluence with the river Towy, by which the parish is bounded on the west: it consists principally of one spacious street, containing several well-built houses of respectable appearance, and is abundantly supplied with water, but neither paved nor lighted. Within the last few years Llangadock has been constituted a post town; and a new line of road, over the Black Mountain, has been recently completed, connecting it with the coal and limestone works in that district, and with the Swansea canal at Pont Ar Dawy. The road from Llan-dilo to Llandovery also passes through it; and among other improvements, which have here taken place, may be mentioned the erection of an elegant stone bridge of five arches over the river Towy, which was completed in 1819, at an expense of £2300, defrayed by this parish and those of Llandilo, Llansadwrn, Llanthoysaint, and Mothvey, adjoining. The parish contains coal, limestone, and lead and iron ores: the two former are worked on a moderate scale, employing from fifty to sixty persons each during the summer months; and coal is conveyed by the new road to the Swansea canal, by which it is forwarded to the port of Swansea, where it is shipped to various parts of the kingdom: the lime is carried in waggons to Cardiganshire, the upper parts of this county, and to Brecknockshire: the lead and iron ores are not worked at present. The market is on Thursday; and fairs are held annually on January 16th, March 12th, the last Thursday in May, July 9th, the first Thursday after September 11th, the second Thursday after Old Michaelmas-day, and December 11th. The town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates; and at the court leet of the lord of the manor a portreeve is annually chosen and sworn into office, whose duties consist in collecting the tolls of the market and fairs, the mortuaries of freeholders, deodands, and other dues.

The living is a vicarage, with Llanthoysaint annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church is an ancient and venerable structure, containing a good organ built by the late David Jones, watchmaker of this town, in 1804, at the expense of the parish: in 1283 it was designed to be made collegiate, in honour of St. Maurice and his companions, and St. Thomas the Martyr, by Dr. Thomas Beck, Bishop of St. David's, for a precentor and twenty-one canons or prebendaries, of whom seven were to be priests, seven deacons, and seven subdeacons, together with five clerks; but this design was frustrated by that prelate's death. In the hamlet of Gwynve is an endowed chapel, in the gift of the Vicar of Llangadock. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The ancient castle of Llangadock was built on a solid rock, near the banks of the small river Sawdde, at a short distance to the east of the town, which is by some writers supposed to have been the site of an ars speculatoria, or Roman watch-tower. The Roman road called the Via Julia Montana took its course through this parish, or its immediate vicinity, in which it is thought there was probably a Roman station; but no traces of such a work are now discernible. To the south-east of the parish is a hill, called Tri Chrŷg, or the "Three Hillocks," from three large carneddau, or heaps of stones, on its summit, which form conspicuous objects in the distant view of this place, and are supposed to be the graves of some ancient British chieftains, or of numerous warriors that may have fallen in some unrecorded battle fought near the spot. Near this eminence are some remains of an ancient British encampment, called Garn gôch, enclosing a circular area of considerable extent, defended by a rude rampart of loose stones, in some places ten feet high; and in both the town and the immediate neighbourhood are the ruins of several mansions of superior dimensions and style of architecture, evidences of the former grandeur and importance of this place, in which is thought anciently to have been situated a mansion called Llŷs Brychan, or "Brychan's Palace." On the banks of the Towy, in this neighbourhood, are numerous gentlemen's seats of pleasing aspect. Within two miles of the town, and within the limits of the parish, are Glânsevin and Mandinnam, both the property of Edward Pryse Lloyd, Esq. The former, which is the family seat, is beautifully situated in grounds tastefully laid out; and on the spacious lawn in front of the mansion is a stately and venerable oak, the trunk of which is twenty-four feet in circumference. Mandinnam, which is usually occupied by the eldest son of the actual possessor of these estates, is at present the residence of Mrs. Lloyd, relict of the late — Lloyd, Esq., of Glânsevin, and mother of the present proprietor. In the hamlet of Gwynve is a seat of that name, the property of L. Lewis, Esq.; and near the town is Dan yr Allt, belonging to J. W. Lloyd, Esq. New Golden Grove, near Llandilo, the seat of Earl Cawdor, is a handsome mansion built of limestone mostly brought from the Black Mountain. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £1025. 12.

LLANGADVAN (LLAN-GADVAN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MATHRAVAL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (W.N.W.) from Llanvair, containing 1067 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cadvan, son of Eneas Lledewig of Armorica, who flourished in the sixth century, and was regarded as the tutelar saint of warriors. It is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road from Welshpool to Machynlleth, which passes by the noted posting-house called Cann Office, about three-quarters of a mile from the church; and comprehends a tract of nearly seven thousand acres, of which about five thousand are enclosed and cultivated. The surface is boldly undulated, and the surrounding scenery is strikingly varied, combining portions of cultivation and verdure with features of rugged sterility. At Moel Achles, in the township of Cowny, a vein of lead-ore was discovered, and mines of that metal were for some time worked with considerable success; but these works have been discontinued. Peat is dug in the parish, and forms the principal fuel of the inhabitants. A branch of the river Vyrnwy flows through the village, and unites with the river Banwy, near the church. In the neighbourhood are some handsome mansions, of which the principal within the parish is Llwydiarth House, formerly the seat of the family of Vaughan, descended from Aleth Hên, King of Dyved, and now the property of Sir W. W. Wynne, Bart. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is a small venerable structure, in the ancient style of English architecture, and is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. It is supposed that there were formerly chapels in the townships of Cyfin, Cowny, and Maesllymysten, which were served by monks from the adjoining monastery of Cyfin; and, according to tradition, the inhabitants of these townships had no sittings in the parish church, the smallness of which appears to corroborate the account. The churchyard is extremely small, and the soil so shallow that the want of a more spacious cemetery is much felt by the inhabitants. The parsonage-house was burnt down in 1645, when Vavasor Powel was sent by the parliament to sequester the livings of the clergy in the county of Montgomery. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of the parish, and for which a suitable building is now in progress of erection, is supported by subscription; and there are several small charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor. In the township of Cyfin, in this parish, was a small monastery, probably dependent on the Cistercian abbey of Strata Marcella: among its endowments were the hamlet of Cevnllŷs Uchâ, in the parish of Llanervul, and that of Tŷr y Mynach, in the parish of Llanbrynmair, which, on its dissolution, became the property of the Vaughans of Llwydiarth. There are no remains of the building; but the site which it occupied is still called Cae 'r Mynach, and below it is a ford over the river Owddyn, a branch of the Vyrnwy, called Rhŷd y byddê, which is by some thought to be a corruption of Rhŷd yr Abadan, "the ford of the abbots," or of Rhŷd y badan, "the ford of the boats," from a pool adjoining, in which boats were formerly kept. At Cann Office are the remains of a British encampment, the area enclosed by the defences of which is partly occupied by the present posting-house: a mound of earth, about seventy yards in circumference, extending along the bottom of the moat by which it was surrounded, is still remaining. Near Pont y llogel, in the township of Cyfin, and near the bank of the river Vyrnwy, are two cairns, the larger of which is nearly sixty yards in circuit, and has its outer circumference composed of upright stones, four feet in height, with the interior piled up to the height of five feet in the centre. In removing the stones to furnish materials for the wall of Llwydiarth Park, a stone coffin was discovered in the centre, containing two skeletons, the head of one being placed by the feet of the other, and an urn, in which were some burnt bones and ashes. There are numerous carneddau in this and the adjoining parishes of Garthbeibio and Llanervul, varying in diameter from ten to twenty yards, and a great number of smaller dimensions. In the centre of each of these, when opened, is found a kistvaen, or stone coffin, over which the cairn is always more protuberant: the outer circumference, like that of the large one above-mentioned, is generally formed of large upright stones, and those contained within are piled loosely in circles around the tomb, the interstices being filled up with stones of a smaller size. Besides these, which are undoubtedly the sepulchres of native British chieftains, there is, on the neighbouring hills, and more especially on that called Pen Coed, a great number of barrows, supposed to be the graves of their followers: they all exhibit evident marks of fire, and in some the heat appears to have been so intense, that the stones were partly vitrified. In the township of Moelveliarth are the remains of a small fort with intrenchments; and in Maesllymysten is a small camp, on the summit of a precipitous eminence, defended on the only side on which it is accessible by a deep ditch. On the summit of an opposite hill, called Mopart, and running completely across it, is a ditch as large as Offa's Dyke, probably intended to prevent incursions from the mountains above. A pair of ancient millstones was found in digging for turf in the township of Cyfin, in the year 1828, at a depth of nearly two feet below the surface. Fynnon Gadvan, or "St. Cadvan's Well," was formerly in great repute for the marvellous efficacy attributed to its water, and was anciently covered with some building, of which the stones, of remarkably large size, were remaining within the last few years. There is a chalybeate spring in the township of Cyfin; but it is not much resorted to. William Jones, an eminent poet and critic, was born in this parish, in 1729, and was interred here in 1795: the Cambrian Register contains a sketch of his life, and some notice of a history which he published of this and the adjoining parishes of Garthbeibio and Llanervul. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £312. 6.

LLANGADWALADR (LLAN - GADWALADR), or EGLWYSAEL, a parish in the hundred of MALDRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W.) from Llangevni, containing 573 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cadwaladr, is situated on the Maldraeth Sands, in Carnarvon bay, and on the turnpike road leading from Llangevni to Aberfraw. It is of considerable extent, and is bounded on the south-east by those sands, on the south-west by the bay of Carnarvon, on the north-west by Aberfraw, and on the north-east by Trêvdraeth. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, and the distant views embrace some pleasing prospects over the adjacent country, and an extended view of the open bay. The surface is boldly undulated; and the soil, though varying in different parts of the parish, is for the most part fertile. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Talyllŷn annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £16. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Cadwaladr, was founded or built by Cadwaladr, the last of the Welsh kings of Britain, in 650: it is an elegant structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a north and south transept, called respectively the Bôdorgan and Bôdowen chapels, of more recent erection than the rest of the edifice, and in the purest character of the later style of English architecture. The Bôdorgan chapel, forming the north transept, was originally built by Richard Meyrick, Esq., in 1640, and rebuilt in 1801, in a style of inferior beauty, which forms a striking contrast to that of Bôdowen, constituting the south transept, which was erected by Anne, widow of William Owen of Bôdowen, in 1661. This last, in the beauty of its style and the richness of its details, is one of the most elegant specimens of ecclesiastical architecture in North Wales: the windows, though partly divested of the richly stained glass with which they were originally embellished, are still strikingly beautiful. The window of the chancel is of elegant design, and was formerly enriched with brilliant stained glass, inserted at the expense of Meyric ab Llewelyn ab Hwlkyn, in 1535, as appears by an inscription below the figures; though greatly mutilated, there is still enough of the original glass remaining to bear testimony to its pristine beauty. On the lintel of the south door of the church is a rude inscription, which has been decyphered thus:—CATAMANVS REX SAPIENTISSIMVS OPINATISSIMVS OMNIVM

REGVM. Catamanus was grandfather of Cadwaladr, and is said to have been buried in Bardsey Island; but the learned author of the "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," is of opinion that his remains were finally deposited here by Cadwaladr, who, perhaps, erected the church over his grave, and on that account invested it with the privilege of sanctuary. About three-quarters of a mile to the south of the church are the ruins of the ancient chapel of Llanveirian, which appears to have been originally a parish church, and afterwards a chapel, having been finally suffered to fall into decay, about the year 1775. The present rector has caused the cemetery to be enclosed with a stone wall, and some yew trees to be planted within the area, marking the site of the ancient edifice. There is a place of worship for Independents. A National school has been established in the adjoining parish of Trêvdraeth, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, into which those of this parish also are admissible. A suitable building, capable of receiving one hundred and fifty children, was erected for its use in 1828; and there are at present seventy-five children in the school, which is supported by the gentry and clergy of the two parishes. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £177. 17.

LLANGAFO (LLAN - GAFFO), a parish in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N. W. by N.) from Carnarvon, containing 137 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Caffo, who flourished in this part of Wales about the middle of the sixth century. It comprehends an extensive tract of land, of which a large portion is marshy, some part hilly, and the remainder enclosed and in a fair state of cultivation. In 1790, an act of parliament was obtained for more effectually embanking the marshes called Maldraeth and Corsddeugae, under the provisions of which two hundred and thirty acres were allotted to the several proprietors of land in this parish. The soil is in general fertile, and the lower grounds afford excellent pasturage for cattle. The surrounding scenery, though pleasingly varied, is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, but the higher grounds afford some fine views over the adjacent country. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llangeinwen, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church is a small ancient edifice, situated on an eminence overlooking the Maldraeth marsh: it is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service, but is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. Several small charitable donations and bequests have been made at various times, of which the greater part has been lost; the interest of the remainder is annually distributed among the poor. Two gold coins of the Emperor Constantine, in a good state of preservation, were found near the church, in the year 1829, and several silver and copper coins of that and other emperors have been found in the parish.

LLANGAIN (LLAN - GAIN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Carmarthen, containing 423 inhabitants. This parish is beautifully situated on the north bank of the river

Towy, which is here navigable for ships of large burden, and comprises a large extent of good arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil is extremely favourable to the growth of corn, of which great quantities are raised of a quality not surpassed by that of any other part of the principality. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, the views comprehending a portion of the beautiful Vale of Towy, with the ivy-mantled ruins of Green Castle overhanging the river, and other picturesque and pleasing features. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of F. Bludworth, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Synin, is a neat edifice, occupying the summit of a lofty eminence above the Vale of Towy, which commands varied and extensive views over the surrounding country and the bay of Carmarthen. Leland, describing the remains of Green Castle, says, "four miles from Llanstephan, on the same ripe, is a place or cliffe called Green Castle, where ships used to lie at anchor;" to which Camden adds, "it is also called Castle Mole, and supposed to be the Humphreys Castle of Dr. Powel, and built by Uchtred Prince of Merioneth, A.D. 1138." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £282. 6.

LLANGAMMARCH (LLAN-GAMMARCH), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (W. S. W.) from Builth, on the road to Llandovery, comprising the hamlets of Penbyallt and Trêvllŷs, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 1105 inhabitants. The western and southern parts of this parish are mountainous, and in some places the soil is boggy; but the country adjacent is, notwithstanding, far from being unproductive; and much stately and valuable timber is found in the vicinity. On descending into the Vale of Llangammarch from the Eppynt Hills, the north side of which is steep, and in some places even precipitous, the prospect is both luxuriant and picturesque, commanding a view of the Irvon from Llancaiddwr to the influx of the river Dulas, throughout which part of its course its banks are finely wooded. The village is situated on the river Irvon, a powerful stream which flows into the Wye near Builth, and on the turnpike road from that town to Llandovery. A small manufacture of fine flannel, employing only about a dozen persons, is carried on here. Llangammarch forms a prebend in the collegiate church of Christ at Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £27, and belonging to the Bishop, as Treasurer of the College, to which office the great tithes are appropriated. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Llanwrtyd and Llanddewi-Abergwessin annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8. 14. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Cammarch, is situated on a projecting rock between the rivers Irvon and Cammarch, and consists only of a nave and chancel, in a very dilapidated condition: it was formerly much larger, even within the memory of man, having an aisle, which, becoming dilapidated, was taken down and never rebuilt. The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists have two places of worship, one of which, situated at Cevn Llanddewi, is endowed with a tenement called Pen-llêch-vâch, in this parish, purchased by subscription among the congregation, and now let for £5 per annum to one of their own sect. Margaret Jones, by will dated May 22nd, 1782, bequeathed the reversion of £400 Bank stock, on the death of Harriet Robotham, wife of John Robotham, of Hampstead, in the county of Middlesex, then upwards of sixty years of age, to the curate, churchwardens, and overseers of Llangammarch, in trust for the establishment and endowment of a free school in this parish, and also the reversion, on the death of the same party, of £200 Bank stock, the interest to be applied in clothing old people; £50, the interest to be employed in clothing young people; and £50, the interest to be appropriated for an annual feast to the trustees. Mr. Hugh Perry, of Brecknock, in 1730, charged a tenement in this parish with the payment of twenty shillings annually, after the decease of his daughter, to be distributed among the poor of the parish; but it is not now paid. Near the ancient mansion of Caerau is a circular artificial mount, two hundred and forty feet in circumference, and eighteen feet high, supposed to have been the site either of an ancient British or a Roman fortress; but, as there are neither any remains of the walls nor of the fosse, it is impossible to ascertain its exact origin: no Roman coins, nor any antiquities of that people, have ever been discovered here; but, from its situation, it is not unlikely to have been the site of a watch-tower on the Roman road from Carmarthen to the station at Cwm, in the county of Radnor. James Howel, a voluminous writer and eccentric wanderer, author of the "Epistolæ Hoelianaë," the "Lexicon Tetraglotton," "Londinopolis," "Dodona's Grove," and other works, was born at Cevn-Brŷn, in this parish, as was also his elder brother, Dr. Thomas Howel, Bishop of Bristol: their father was curate of Llangammarch from 1576 to 1631. Theophilus Evans, author of several theological and other works, resided in this parish, of which he was vicar for many years: his first publication, entitled "Pwyll y Pader," appeared in 1739, and contained a comment on the Lord's Prayer, in several sermons written in the Welsh language; in the same year he published his "Drych y Prif oesoedd," a brief history of the Britons, a work more read and admired in South Wales than any published in the vernacular language; and in 1752 he published, in the English language, a "History of the Modern Enthusiasm." He was a learned antiquary, and a man of great piety and benevolence, and devoted to study all the time which was not employed in the performance of his pastoral duties: being for many years afflicted with a scrophulous complaint, he was the first to discover the medicinal virtues, in such disorders, of the mineral waters in the neighbouring parish of Llanwrtyd, an account of which he published. In 1763, he resigned the living of Llangammarch in favour of his son-in-law, the father of the late Theophilus Jones, Esq., the historian of the county of Brecknock, who was born in this parish: this gentleman's History of his native county evinces extensive acquisitions and great industry and perseverance: he died at Brecknock, but was buried at Llangammarch. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £395. 14.

LLANGAN (LLAN-GAN), a parish, chiefly in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, but partly in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 16 miles (W.) from Carmarthen, containing 733 inhabitants, of which number, 710 are in the Carmarthenshire, and the remainder in the Pembrokeshire, portion of it. On the banks of the Tâf, in this parish, anciently stood the famous Tŷ Gwŷn ar Dâf, or "the White House on the Tâf," an occasional residence of Hywel Dda, sovereign of all Wales, who, about the year 940, convoked at this place a grand national council, for the purpose of compiling and enacting the code of laws which has given so much celebrity to his reign, and which are still known as "the laws of Hywel the Good." In order to give greater solemnity to this convocation, and to implore the divine wisdom to assist their counsels, the king remained here with his whole court during Lent, in the constant exercise of prayer and other acts of devotion. Soon after the destruction of the monastery of Bangor-Iscoed, in North Wales, and the slaughter and dispersion of the brethren of that extensive establishment by the Northumbrian Saxons, a religious society was settled at this place under the auspices of Paulinus, son of Urien Reged, a disciple of St. Germanus, in which originated the abbey of Albalanda, or Whitland, afterwards erected near the site, and called by the Welsh, after the name of the former establishment, Tŷ Gwŷn ar Tâf, "the White House on the Tâf." According to some historians, this establishment, which was for brethren of the Cistercian order, was founded by Rhŷs ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, in the reign of William the Conqueror; but Bishop Tanner, with more probability, ascribes it to Bernard Bishop of St. David's, who presided over that see from 1115 to 1147. It is related in the Welsh annals that Cadwaladr, brother of Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, during the disputes which arose between him and his nephews, the sons of Owain, entrusted the custody of his newly erected castle of Cynvael to the abbot of Tŷ Gwŷn ar Tâf, who defended it with obstinate valour against the assaults of the young princes by whom it was besieged. After a determined resistance, protracted till the walls of the castle were beaten down, and the whole of the garrison either slain or wounded, the abbot effected his escape from the ruins, through the assistance of some friends in the camp of the enemy, and retired into his monastery. The monastery, which was dedicated to St. Mary, and had an establishment of eight monks, continued to flourish till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was estimated at £153. 17. 2.; and its site was granted, in the 36th of Henry VIII., to Henry Audley and John Cordel.

The parish is pleasantly situated on the river Tâf, and is intersected by the old Whitland road from Carmarthen to Haverfordwest: it comprehends a large tract of good arable and pasture land, the whole of which, with a very small exception, is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil is fertile, and the surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified, and in many parts highly picturesque. This place constitutes a prebend in the cathedral church of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The tithes of the parish are divided between the prebendary and the vicar, the former of whom has two-thirds, and the latter one-third: a part of it, which anciently belonged to the abbey, is tithe-free. The church, dedicated to St. Canna, is a neat modern edifice, rebuilt in the year 1820, and consisting of a nave and chancel, the former erected by a parochial rate, and the latter at the expense of the lessee of the prebendal tithes. A school-house has been erected in the churchyard, but no school has yet been established in the parish. The existing remains of the abbey are very inconsiderable, serving only to point out the site, in a sequestered valley sheltered by groves of stately growth, to the right of the present turnpike road from St. Clear's to Narberth. Of the royal palace of Tŷ Gwŷn, which was comparatively a small building, designed chiefly for a hunting seat, no vestiges at present are discernible. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £282. 6.

LLANGAN (LLAN-GANNA), a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by W.) from Cowbridge, containing 261 inhabitants. It is of small extent, comprising only about eight hundred acres: on the north it is separated by the river Ewenny from the adjacent parish of Coychurch, and on the north-east by a rivulet, called the Canna, from that of St. Mary Hill: at the western end of it is situated the village of Treos. Its surface is rather flat, and its northern boundary is subject to inundation: the soil is fertile, and in some parts argillaceous, and intermingled with fragments of the limestone, which forms the substratum: the entire parish consists of rich arable and pasture land. The limestone is worked to a considerable extent, as also was formerly the lead-ore found imbedded in it; but the latter is now neglected. The valuable mine of Tewgoed, now exhausted, was on an east and west vein, called, from the colour of its contents, "the red vein," which was joined obliquely from the north-west by three others, called "blue veins:" at the junction of each of the latter with the former was a body of rich steel-grained ore, but that of the blue veins was galena, or laminar potters' ore. The court leet of the manor is held by the Earl of Clarendon and the Earl of Dunraven alternately. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £12. 16. 0½., and in the alternate patronage of the Earl of Clarendon and the Earl of Dunraven. The church, a small neat edifice, is dedicated to St. Canna, the mother of St. Crallo: the latter founded Coychurch, and was nephew of St. Illtyd, the founder of Lantwit-Major. In the churchyard is the stone head of a cross, sculptured, like those at Coychurch and Lantwit, within a circle, and which, although it bears no legible inscription, is considered, from those upon the latter, to have been erected in the fifth century, by Samson, pupil and successor of St. Illtutus in the college of Lantwit, to the honour of his patron and master. In front of the church is a fine cross, in the early style of English architecture, with an elegant shaft rising from a pedestal which is ascended by four steps, and ornamented in the capital with finely sculptured representations of the Nativity, Baptism, Transfiguration, Crucifixion, Resurrection, and Ascension, of our Saviour: this cross escaped the destruction to which, during the usurpation of Cromwell, these relics of the religion of our ancestors were commonly devoted, as monuments of superstition, by the parliamentary commissioners, both in the principality and in England. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. Mrs. Gwenllian Williams gave £5, Mr. Lewis Thomas £10, and Mr. Edward Thomas bequeathed half the annual rent of a house and croft in the parish of St. Mary Hill, now producing £4 per annum, for distribution among the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £74. 4.

LLANGANTEN (LLAN-GANTEN), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (W.) from Builth, containing 179 inhabitants. This place has obtained a melancholy celebrity from the death of the gallant Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, Prince of North Wales, and the last independent sovereign of that country, who, after the brilliant success which attended his arms at the straits of Menai, came to his castle at Aberedwy, near Builth, to hold a conference with the chieftains of this district. While at this place, he was surprised by the unexpected arrival of an English army under the command of Sir Edmund Mortimer and John Giffard, who had obtained intelligence of his movements, and was compelled to make a hasty retreat to Builth, in the hope of finding security in the castle of that place till he could organize his forces to repulse the enemy. But being denied entrance into the castle by the garrison, he advanced westward for nearly three miles up the vale of the Irvon, and crossed the river a little below the church of Llanynis, by a bridge called Pont y Coed, intending either to return into North Wales through Llanganten, Llanavan-Vawr, and Llanwrthwl, and thence into Montgomeryshire, or probably to join his friends in the counties of Carmarthen and Pembroke, against whom Edward had sent an army under Oliver de Dyneham. Having passed the Irvon, he stationed the few troops that accompanied him on the north bank of the river, where the ground being higher and more precipitous than on the opposite side, and also covered with wood, a few men might defend the bridge against very superior numbers. In this situation he preserved a communication with the whole of Brecknockshire, and, relying upon the impracticability of passing the river during the winter season, he waited for reinforcements from the west. The English forces, who, in consequence of this delay, came up with Llewelyn, having made some fruitless attempts to obtain possession of the bridge, would probably have been compelled to abandon the pursuit, had not Sir Elias Walwyn discovered a place where the river was fordable, at some little distance, where a detachment of the English army, having crossed the river, unexpectedly attacked Llewelyn's forces in the rear, and easily defeated them. Llewelyn, either during the pursuit, or while watching the movements of the main body of the English army, which still remained on the opposite bank of the river, was attacked and slain in a small dell in this parish, about two hundred yards from the scene of action, by Adam de Francton, who plunged a spear into his body, and immediately joined in pursuit of the fleeing enemy. On his return from the pursuit, probably in search of plunder, he discovered that the person whom he had wounded, and who was still alive, was the Prince of Wales, and, on stripping him, found a letter in cypher and his privy seal concealed upon his person. Elated with this discovery, Francton immediately cut off his head, and sent it as an acceptable present to the English king, then at Aberconway. The body of the unfortunate prince was dragged by the soldiers to the spot where the road from Builth now divides into two branches, one leading to Llanavan, and the other to Llangammarch, and there interred. The dell in which he was killed is to this day called Cwm Llewelyn, or "Llewelyn's dingle," and the spot where he was interred, Cevn Bedd Llewelyn, or "the ridge of the grave of Llewelyn," by which name the village at that place is known.

The parish is bounded on the south by the river Irvon, and on the north by the Whevri, and comprises but a moderate portion of arable and pasture land, which is all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of feature, is agreeably enlivened by the streams which nearly circumscribe the parish, and the banks of which are in many places richly clothed with wood. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the lessee of the tithes under the Prebendary of Llandarog, in the Collegiate Church of Brecknock. About four acres of glebe land are attached to the living, but there is no parsonage-house. The church, dedicated, according to some authorities, to St. Catherine, and to others, to St. Canten, from which latter the parish is supposed to derive its name, is a small edifice, situated in a narrow dell near the south bank of the river Whevri: it contains no monuments, and is distinguished by no architectural details of importance. A Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of the poor is supported by subscription. The sums of £2. 10. to the poor, and ten shillings to the minister for preaching a sermon, are paid annually at Christmas, arising either from the estates of Rees Price, Esq., of Climeri, or from those of William Price, Esq., who died in 1718. Mrs. Parry, in 1721, bequeathed a rent-charge of twenty shillings, issuing from a tenement in the parish of Llanthetty, to be paid to the poor of this parish on the Thursday before Easter, with power to distrain in the event of non-payment. Occupying a strong situation on the bank of the Irvon is a mound of earth, surrounded by a moat, and nearly circumscribed by the winding of the river: this fortification is called Castell Caerberis, but there are no records either of its origin or its history. A mineral spring, of which the water is strongly impregnated with sulphur, was discovered in 1831, on the banks of the Whevri: it is covered when the water of the river is high, which circumstance may account for its having remained so long unnoticed. The soil in its immediate vicinity is clayey, and the substratum is composed of rotten clay slate, which, on the banks of the river, contains nodules or balls nearly circular, varying from four to twelve inches in diameter, in which, when broken, are found specimens of spar. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £88. 16.

LLANGAR, or LLANGAER (LLAN-GAR), a parish in the hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (S. W.) from Corwen, containing 229 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying "the church of the camp," is most probably derived from an ancient fortification which formerly occupied the summit of a hill called Caer Wern, in the immediate vicinity of the church, and of which there are still some vestiges, though nothing is known of its origin or history. The parish is pleasantly situated near the confluence of the rivers Dee and Alwen, and on the turnpike road from Corwen to Bala: it comprises about thirteen hundred acres of enclosed arable and pasture land, and an extensive tract of common and waste land, producing abundance of peat, which is the principal fuel of the inhabitants. The surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified with lofty hills and pleasing vales. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £5. 7. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is a neat ancient edifice, in the early style of English architecture. A Sunday school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is held in the church: the children of this parish are also eligible for gratuitous instruction in the school at the village of Cynwyd, in the parish of Gwyddelwern, under the will of Hugh Roberts, who bequeathed a sum of money for the support of that school, in 1807. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £153. 11.

LLANGASTY TALYLLŶN (LLAN-GASTY-TAL-Y-LLŶNN), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (E. S. E.) from Brecknock, containing 175 inhabitants. The name of this parish is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Gasty, or Gastayn, an eminent British saint, who flourished in the fifth century, and is said to have been preceptor to Cynog, son of Brychan, who was murdered on the Van mountain, in the parish of Merthyr-Cynog; and its distinguishing adjunct is descriptive of its situation in front of the beautiful lake called Llyn Savaddan, on the banks of which the church is agreeably placed. The manor was granted by Bernard Newmarch to Reginald Walbeoffe, and, after successively passing to the several families of Williams, Parry, and Davies, was, with the exception of the advowson of the living, sold by the last to Philip Champion Crespigny, Esq., whose descendant, — Crespigny, Esq., is the present proprietor. The surface of the parish, which comprises about one thousand five hundred acres, is partly hilly and partly flat: the only river is the small stream of the Llynvi, but within the parish is included a considerable portion of Llyn Savaddan. From the summit of a long dorsal eminence, called Allt yr Esgair, partly in this parish and partly in that of Llansantfraid, and which, from the imperfect remains of fortification still visible, appears to have been occupied as a military post, is obtained a most magnificent prospect, which, though less extensive than that from the Beacons, is infinitely more pleasing, and combines a richer variety of beautiful features. On the south it embraces the picturesque Vale of Usk, with the frequent windings of the river, of which the banks are richly clothed with verdure; on the west the town of Brecknock, with the adjacent country, skirted in the distance by Bwlch Aberbrân; on the north the mansions and grounds of Pont y wall and Trephilip, and the country about Talgarth, with the Radnorshire hills in the back ground; and at the foot of the eminence is the beautiful lake of Llyn Savaddan, or Llangorse Mere, on the banks of which are the church and village of Llangorse, the church of Cathedine, the church of Langasty Tallyllŷn, and the picturesque ruins of Blaenllyvni castle, and at the distance of rather more than half a mile from the western extremity of the lake is the beautiful village of Llanvihangel Tallyllŷn. The parish formerly contained several gentlemen's seats, which have been converted into good farm-houses: the soil is generally light and gravelly, except near the margin of the lake, where it is rather wet and heavy. The high road from London to Brecknock, through Crickhowel, passes close by the south-western extremity of the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 9., and in the patronage of the Rev. Richard Davies. The church is a dark, ancient, and decayed edifice, with a tower of more modern erection, containing four bells, beautifully situated on the margin of the lake: the interior is particularly well pewed, and the steps leading to the ancient rood-loft are still remaining. A school for the gratuitous instruction of the children of the parish has been recently established, and is supported by the Rev. Mr. Davies. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £76. 15.

LLANGATHEN (LLAN-GATHAN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3¼ miles (W. by S.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 1182 inhabitants. This parish is delightfully situated in a fertile district of considerable extent, celebrated for the richness and the diversity of its scenery, and is bounded on the south by the river Towy, which winds gracefully through the beautiful vale to which it gives its name. This enchanting vale extends for upwards of thirty miles in length, comprehending every variety of scenery, and embracing some of the most interesting and magnificent views which are to be found in the principality. The village is situated on the turnpike road from Carmarthen through Aberguilly to Llandilo-Vawr, and derives an appearance of cheerful activity from the number of travellers passing through it. The environs abound with richly wooded eminences and luxuriant plantations, belonging to numerous elegant villas and noble mansions, which derive from their situation a pleasingly picturesque appearance. Near the margin of the Towy, which is the finest river in South Wales, is Grongar Hill, celebrated by the poet Dyer, and one of the most interesting objects in the vale, out of which it rises to a very considerable elevation: under the shelter of a black thorn, which is still remaining on its summit, Dyer is said to have composed his beautifully descriptive poem. From this spot is obtained the most enchanting prospect over the whole vale, through which the river is sometimes seen boldly sweeping round the base of some of the abrupt eminences for which the scenery is distinguished, and at others intercepted from the view by the projection of similar elevations, which rise in various parts of the vale. The hills on both sides are richly clothed with thriving plantations, ornamented with stately mansions, and pleasingly varied with scattered villages of rural and picturesque appearance. This beautiful spot comprises two valuable farms, the property of Walter Phillips, Esq., of Aberglâsney, one of the most ancient and spacious seats in this part of the principality, and memorable as the early residence, if not the birthplace, of the poet, who, in his poem of the "Country Walk," alludes to its pleasant situation beneath "Grongar Hill." Sir Rice Rudd, Bart., formerly proprietor of this estate, conveyed by deed to the proprietor of Aberglâsney £25 per annum, in trust for a charity founded in the town of Carmarthen by Bishop Rudd and his widow; and in the event of the proprietor of Aberglâsney refusing to act, the proprietor of the Golden Grove estate, the Bishop and Chancellor of the diocese of St. David's, and the mayor and recorder of Carmarthen, are appointed trustees. In this parish also is Court Henry, the property and residence of the Rev. Henry Wade Green, who has enlarged and greatly improved the mansion, which derived its name, according to some writers, from its having been the residence of Henry VII., who, while Earl of Richmond, is said occasionally to have held his court here, but with greater probability from Henry ab Gwilym, whose daughter married Sir Rhys ab Thomas. It is pleasantly situated, the adjacent grounds partaking of the general character of the scenery which prevails throughout this highly interesting part of South Wales. The present proprietor of Aberglâsney has recently erected a neat and comfortable inn for the accommodation of visitors, who are attracted by the luxuriant and magnificent prospects for which the situation is celebrated, or by the remains of antiquity which are found in the vicinity. Limestone exists in great abundance, and lead-ore is frequently obtained in small quantities. Fairs are held here on April 16th and September 22nd, and at Dryslwyn on July 1st and August 13th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Chester. The church, which is dedicated to St. Cathan, stands on a lofty eminence, and contains a stately monument to the memory of Bishop Rudd and his lady, whose effigies are finely sculptured. There are two places of worship in the parish for Calvinistic Methodists. On Grongar Hill is a very perfect encampment, comprising about eight acres, within a quadrilateral area, having two entrances in the shorter sides of the parallelogram; and not far from it, to the west, are the ruins of Dryslwyn castle, crowning the summit of an abrupt hill in the vale: the remains of this castle, which was erected by the ancient princes of South Wales, and derived its name from its difficulty of access, are very inconsiderable, but nevertheless form an interesting and a picturesque feature in the landscape. Near the church are some very slight vestiges of the ancient Cappel Pen Arw; and within a short distance is a spring, the water of which was formerly in high reputation for its efficacy in the cure of rheumatism and diseases of the eye. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £534. 9.

LLANGATTOCK (LLAN-GATWG), a parish in the hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (S. S. W.) from Crickhowel, containing 2690 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Catwg, or Cadoc the Wise, an eminent British saint, who flourished in the sixth century. It is pleasantly situated on the southern bank of the river Usk, and immediately opposite to the town of Crickhowel, with which it is connected by a handsome stone bridge of thirteen arches, in the centre of which is the point of division between the two parishes. On this side of the Usk is a turnpike road leading down the vale to Llanelly, where, crossing the Brecknock and Abergavenny railway, it is continued over the river Clydach by a bridge, and afterwards joins the turnpike road from Abergavenny to Merthyr: the same road is continued up the vale, through Llangynider, Llanthetty, and the adjoining parishes, to Brecknock. The surrounding scenery is beautifully diversified, and the views from the high grounds extend over the picturesque Vale of Usk and the adjacent country, abounding with objects of interest, and with features of romantic beauty. In the immediate environs are several gentlemen's seats, of which some are within the parish. Glanusk Villa, now the residence of John Hotchkis, Esq., is a handsome house, built under the superintendence of Mr. Nash, by the late Admiral Gell, who, after his retirement from the naval service, passed the remainder of his days at this place. Llangattock Place, now the residence of Mrs. Morgan, was formerly the property of Dr. Ford, an eminent physician, and accoucheur to Queen Charlotte, consort of George III., who, on discontinuing his practice, retired to this parish, in which he purchased an estate. Glanusk Park is the property of Joseph Baily, Esq., who has built a handsome mansion on the estate for his residence, in the later style of English architecture. The parish is rich in mineral treasure, abounding with iron-ore, coal, and limestone of excellent quality. On the bank of the river Ebwy-Vawr, which separates this parish from that of Bedwellty, in the county of Monmouth, are the Beaufort iron-works, so called from their being established on lands let on lease for ninety-nine years by the Duke of Beaufort. At this place a furnace for smelting iron-ore was erected, by Messrs. Kendall, in the year 1780, since which time two other furnaces, a forge, and other works have been erected by the same company. Both the ore and the pit coal for working it, the latter of which is charred into coke upon the spot, are obtained contiguous to the works; and limestone is found within a short distance. These extensive works are now conducted under the firm of Kendall, West, and Bevan, and afford employment to more than one thousand persons, though, from the fluctuation which prevails during the present unsettled state of the iron trade, it is not easy to ascertain the precise number. The machinery employed in them is set in motion by steam-engines of considerable power, and the mountains in this vicinity are intersected in all directions by railways and tram-roads, communicating with the several departments of the works. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, which passes through the parish in its course from Llanelly to Llangynider, is continued to Brecknock, near which town it communicates with the Hay railway, and extends in the opposite direction to Pont y Moyle, near Pontypool, in the county of Monmouth, where it joins the Monmouthshire canal. There is also a tram-road and inclined plane for the conveyance of limestone from the Darren rocks to the canal; and Messrs. Joseph and Crawshay Baily have recently established a steam-carriage and tram-road for the conveyance of coal from their mines in Monmouthshire to the wharf near the village of Llangattock, which it is supposed they will extend so as to comprehend a much wider range.

The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Llanelly and Llangeney united, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £31. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort. The church is an ancient structure, in the decorated style of English architecture, with a remarkably strong embattled tower at the west end: it consists of a chancel, and of two aisles separated from each other by a range of columns and arches, and having originally distinct arched roofs of timber, which, being decayed, were, about forty years ago, replaced by one plain flat ceiling, by which alteration the internal beauty of the church is greatly impaired, and its external appearance rendered heavy by the substitution of a single covering in place of the original double roof. From the "Liber Llandavensis" it appears that a church was consecrated here, about the close of the eleventh century, by Herewald, Bishop of Llandaf, of which probably the tower of the present church, apparently of more ancient date than the other parts of the edifice, is the only portion remaining. In the body of the church is a plain stone, inscribed to the memory of Dr. Ford, who died in 1795, aged 78. There is a place of worship for Independents. On the mountains in this parish are evident traces of the manufacture of iron at a very early period, most probably by the Romans: the sites of ancient blomeries may be easily distinguished by the heaps of cinders which are still remaining; and a vicinal Roman road leading through the iron mines of Bryn Oer, probably to some Roman forges anciently situated at Llanvrynach, in the Vale of Usk, may be traced at no great distance. The mountain called Carno is noticed by Dr. Powell as the scene of a sanguinary conflict which took place, in the year 728, between Ethelbald King of Mercia and Roderic Molwynog, Prince of North Wales, in commemoration of which two large heaps of stones, or "carnau," were raised, from which this eminence derived its name. One of these cairns was opened by the late Archdeacon Payne, some few years ago, when a sepulchral kist was found, in which there was no deposit: the other had been previously opened by some workmen employed to build a lodge for a gamekeeper under the lord of the manor. The ancient park of Cile-Lan, in this parish, was originally of great extent, and formed an appendage to the castle of Crickhowel, with the lands of which, on the opposite side of the Usk, it was connected by a private bridge, which has been long demolished: a great flood which happened here, about fifty years ago, by carrying away the soil, exposed to view the abutments of this bridge: in the upper part of the park are some very small remains of a moated building, indicating the site of the lodge occupied by the park-keeper. In a recess of the mountain called Darren y Cile, within the limestone rock, is a cavern of considerable dimensions, but of no very singular appearance, called by the country people Eglwys Vaen, or "the stone church." Among the incumbents of this parish were two successive Bishops of Llandaf, namely, Dr. Hugh Lloyd and Dr. Francis Davies. Dr. Lloyd, a native of Cardiganshire, and fellow of Jesus' College, Oxford, having become archdeacon of St. David's prior to the breaking out of the civil commotions of the seventeenth century, was ejected, for his attachment to the royal cause, from all his preferments by the parliamentarians, who, in 1645, seized upon the revenue of the church of St. David's; but in 1660 he was promoted to the see of Llandaf, and restored to his archdeaconry of St. David's, which he was allowed to hold in commendam: in 1661, he was presented to the rectory of this parish, by Henry Lord Herbert of Raglan, Chepstow, and Gower, which he also held in commendam: he died in 1667. Dr. Davies, a native of Glamorganshire, and likewise fellow of Jesus' College, held, at the commencement of the civil war, the rectory of Llangan in Glamorganshire, from which he was ejected by the parliamentarians; but his piety and exemplary conduct recommended him so far to some of the leading men of the age, that he was allowed to retain a fourth part of the revenue of his rectory for a few years: he was afterwards appointed chaplain to the Countess of Peterborough, and at the Restoration was replaced in his former preferment, and subsequently promoted to the archdeaconry of Llandaf, of which see he was made bishop on the death of Dr. Lloyd, whom he also succeeded in the rectory of Llangattock, which he was allowed to hold in commendam: he died in 1674. The late Rev. H. T. Payne, A. M., Archdeacon of Carmarthen, and for upwards of thirty years rector of the adjoining parish of Llanbedr, was a native of this place: he was no less distinguished for the strict discharge of the duties of his pastoral office than eminent for his literary attainments, with which he united the most polished and engaging manners; he chiefly devoted his leisure time to antiquarian researches, and was ever ready to impart the result of his studies, for the promotion of science, or the propagation of knowledge: indeed, although he never concentrated the powers of his highly cultivated mind with a view to pecuniary emolument from the publication of literary productions, there has been scarcely any work on the antiquities and topography of Wales, published within the present century, which has not been largely indebted to his pen: he died on Easter Sunday, 1832, and was interred in the churchyard of Llanbedr, in the vault which contained the remains of his wife, who died in 1828. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the parish is £319. 1.

LLANGEDWIN (LLAN-GEDWYN), a parish in the Cynlleth and Mochnant division of the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (W. S. W.) from Oswestry, on the road from Shrewsbury to Bala, containing 323 inhabitants. This parish was formerly a chapelry to Llanrhaiadr yn Mochnant, but was separated from that parish by act of parliament, and formed into a parish of itself. The village is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Tanat; the neighbourhood abounds with pleasingly varied scenery; and in the environs are some good mansions, the residences of respectable families. Llangedwin Hall, the property and occasional residence of Sir W. W. Wynne, Bart., is a handsome mansion with ample grounds tastefully laid out. Slate of good quality has been recently discovered within the parish, and quarries are now about to be opened, which it is expected will be found productive of benefit to the adventurers, and afford employment to the poorer inhabitants of this place. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £400 private benefaction, and £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir W. W. Wynne, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Cedwyn, is a small neat edifice, surmounted by a cupola, containing one bell. A National school was erected in the year 1824, and is supported by subscription: in this establishment about forty poor children receive gratuitous instruction. The sum of £12 per annum, being the interest of charitable donations and bequests, principally of the Wynne family, is annually distributed among the poor of the parish, according to the will of the benefactors. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £143. 1.

LLANGEINOR (LLAN-GEINWYR), a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (N. by E.) from Bridgend, containing 292 inhabitants. The rivers Ogmor and Garw run through the parish, which contains iron-ore and coal, but the latter only is worked, and that merely for local consumption. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Gwinewr. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Robert Jenkins, Esq., in 1766, and his widow, Anne Jenkins, in 1771, left £20 each, and the late Dr. Hoare, Principal of Jesus' College, Oxford, gave £127. 10., for the benefit of the poor, among such of whom as do not receive parochial relief the interest of these sums is periodically distributed. In this parish is one of the ancient court-houses, now generally called church-houses, which is appropriated to the residence of paupers. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £85. 15.

LLANGEINWEN (LLAN-GEINWEN), a parish composed of an Upper and a Lower division, in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. W. by W.) from Carnarvon, containing 776 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very considerable extent, derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Ceinwen, a female who was distinguished for the sanctity of her life, about the middle of the fifth century. It is pleasantly situated on the western shore of the Menai strait, which is here a mile and a half in breadth, and opposite to the town of Carnarvon, to which there is a ferry from this place, called Tâl y Voel. The surface is varied, being in some parts composed of hills of considerable elevation, and the surrounding scenery is finely diversified. The higher grounds afford extensive and interesting views over the Menai strait, the bay of Carnarvon, and the adjacent country. The parish abounds with limestone of excellent quality, of which extensive quarries are worked at Guirt, Gelleniog-wen, Rhŷdgâr, and Penrhŷn bâch, affording employment to a considerable number of men: the produce of these quarries is partly burnt into manure for the supply of the surrounding districts, and great quantities are exported by the Menai to different places on the coast. The living is a rectory, not in charge, with the perpetual curacy of Llangafo annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Rev. Wynne Williams. The church, dedicated to St. Ceinwen, was originally built about the close of the sixth century, and, having fallen into decay, was rebuilt in the year 1812. The present church is a neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, the latter of which is decorated with a handsome east window. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The amount of several charitable bequests to the poor of this parish in money and land, of which last a certain portion was appropriated to the apprenticing of a poor boy, is annually distributed at Christmas, according to the wishes of the respective donors. At Guirt are the remains of a chapel, for many years used as a stable, and now converted into a dairy. Previously to its application to its present use, the figures of the apostles painted on the walls were remaining, and over the east window are still preserved allegorical figures of Time and Death. Near the boundary of the parish is a rude upright stone, with the inscription FILIVS. VLRICI. EREXIT. HVNC. LAPIDEM., supposed to be a monument to the memory of some chieftain interred beneath it. In the quarries at Gelleniog-wen great numbers of human bones are frequently found, which are supposed to be the remains of native inhabitants who at some period fell at this place in defending their country against the Danes. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £280. 5.

LLANGEITHO (LLAN-GEITHO), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8½ miles (N. by E.) from Lampeter, containing 377 inhabitants. This parish is beautifully situated on the river Aëron, by which it is bounded on the south, and comprehends an extensive tract of country, abounding with richly diversified scenery, combining almost every variety of rural and picturesque beauty. The village is sheltered nearly on all sides by hills of varied aspect, of which the declivities and summits are in some parts richly clothed with wood of luxuriant growth, and in others covered with verdure; and that part of it which is not shut in by the surrounding hills commands a fine prospect of the beautiful Vale of the Aëron. The ancient mansions of Glyn Aëron and Court Mawr, formerly the residences of families of distinction, are at present in the occupation of farmers. The lands are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil is fertile and productive. Fairs are held on March 14th, May 7th, August 4th, October 9th, and the first Monday after November 12th. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Ceitho, and rebuilt in the year 1821, is a neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, and is romantically situated on an isolated and richly wooded spot, separated from the village by the river Aëron: it is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service, but is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. In the centre of the village is a large place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The Rev. Daniel Rowland was for some years rector of this parish, and was greatly esteemed as a popular preacher; but, from teaching particular tenets, he was suspended from the exercise of his pastoral functions, and became the founder of a sect called after him "Rowlandists," which is still numerous in this part of the principality: he died on the 10th of October, 1790, aged seventy-seven, and was interred in the churchyard of this parish: a plain stone monument to his memory is affixed to the wall of the church, on the outside. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £41. 19.

LLANGELER (LLAN-GELER), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E. by S.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 1713 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the north-western extremity of the county, bordering on Cardiganshire, and upon the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Cardigan, is of considerable extent. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, embracing a portion of the fertile and picturesque Vale of Teivy, with the windings of that river, which flows on the northern side of the parish. Llŷs Newydd, the property of the Lloyds, but at present in the occupation of Hammond Spencer, Esq., is an elegant mansion, beautifully situated in grounds tastefully laid out, and comprehending much pleasing scenery. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's: the rectory, which is a sinecure, and rated in the king's books at £12. 18. 9., was formerly in the patronage of the Crown, but, after the foundation of St. David's College at Lampeter, it was appropriated to the Principal and Tutors of that establishment: the vicarage, which is discharged, is rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., is endowed with £200 royal bounty, and is in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The tithes of this parish are divided into two portions, called respectively the Grange and the Gwlâd: of the latter, the Principal and Tutors receive two-thirds and the vicar one-third; of the former, one-third belongs to the Llŷs Newydd family, and of the remainder, two-thirds are appropriated to the Principal and Tutors, and one-third to the vicar. The church, dedicated to St. Celert, is a plain and neat edifice, in good repair, but not distinguished by any architectural details of importance: an addition of three hundred and eighty sittings, of which three hundred are free, has been recently made, towards defraying the expense of which the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels granted the sum of £70. An ancient chapel of ease, dedicated to St. Mary, and thence called "Capel Mair," has been entirely demolished. A monumental stone, bearing an inscription in rude characters, and said to be in the Welsh language, is still remaining. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic Methodists, and also one which is jointly appropriated to Independents and Presbyterians. Near the church is a spring called St. Celert's, which was formerly in great reputation for its supposed medicinal virtues. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £441. 6.

LLANGELYNIN (LLAN-GELYNIN), a parish in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Aberconway, containing 279 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Celynin, who flourished towards the close of the sixth century, is situated at the north-eastern extremity of the county, bordering upon Denbighshire. A memorable battle was fought at Cymryd, in this parish, in the year 880, between the forces of Anarawd, Prince of North Wales, and those of Edred Earl of Mercia, who attempted the conquest of this country. In this conflict Anarawd was completely victorious; he drove the Mercians from the field of battle, and continued to pursue them until finally expelled from the principality: this victory was called Dial Rhodri, or "Roderic's Revenge," as Anarawd thus fully avenged the slaughter of his father Roderic in a descent of the Saxons upon Anglesey. The village, which is small, is beautifully situated in a fertile vale under the mountain called Tâl y Van. The surface of the parish is mountainous, the lands partially enclosed and cultivated, the soil various, and the surrounding scenery marked with features rather of boldness than of beauty. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church is a small ancient edifice, not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. Launcelot Bulkeley, in 1718, bequeathed £120, directing the interest to be appropriated to the clothing of six poor boys, and teaching them to read, two to be of this parish, and two of each of those of Caerhên and Llanbedr; and the Rev. Owen Bulkeley, in 1737, bequeathed £60, the interest to be annually distributed among the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £138. 8.

LLANGELYNIN (LLAN-GELYNIN), a parish in two divisions, Higher and Lower, in the hundred of TÂL Y BONT, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Towyn. This parish, which is situated on the coast of Cardigan bay, was anciently the residence of Ednowain ab Bradwen, one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales, in the time of Edward I.: the remains of his house, called Caer Bradwen and Llŷs Bradwen, are still to be seen in the township of Cregennan; and near them are the remains of a Druidical circle. In the reign of Henry IV., Ednyved ab Aaron, grandson of Ednowain, entertained Owain Glyndwr after his defeat by that monarch, and secreted him in a cave near the church of this parish, which was from that circumstance called Ogov Owain, or "Owain's cave:" it is now almost choked up with sand. At a place called Castell, now a farm-house, near Rhôs Levain, an important battle is said to have been fought at some remote period, but no particulars are recorded concerning it. Peat and turf are obtained in the parish. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £15. 10. 2½., and in the patronage of Parry Jones, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Celynin, is an ancient structure: on the road through Llwngwriil to Dôlgeley is a proprietary chapel, called Arthog chapel. There are places of worship for the Society of Friends, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The Rev. Mr. Morgan bequeathed a tenement called Tŷcroes, and Mrs. Morgan another, called Pen yr Allt, in trust for the instruction of poor children of this parish: the rents of both are now applied to the gratuitous instruction of fifty children, for which purpose a good school-house was erected by subscription, in 1831. Near the village of Llwyngwrl, in this parish, are the remains of a British encampment; and on the hill above it, called Gwastad Merioneth, is a small plain, on which are numerous Druidical remains. From this plain a very extensive prospect is obtained of the surrounding country. In a turbarry at Ty'n Coed, opposite to Barmouth, a copper urn, nineteen inches deep, and fourteen inches and a half in diameter at the top, and eleven and a half at the bottom, was found in 1826. At the farm called Tyddyn Bâch lived Mary Thomas, an invalid, who subsisted for several years without any solid food, and almost entirely without nourishment; and in this parish was born the noted astrologer named Arise Evans, an impostor of considerable fame among the class which so much prevailed during the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £556. 11.

LLANGENDEIRN (LLAN-GYNDEYRN), a parish in the hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E.) from Carmarthen, on the road through Llannon to Swansea, containing 2412 inhabitants. This place is thought to have been anciently the residence either of some of the native princes of South Wales, or of some chieftain of distinction in the earlier periods of Welsh history; and the remains of an ancient mansion, called Hên Blâs, or "the Old Hall," which have been converted into a stable, appear to confirm that opinion. The lands are, with the exception of a very small portion, enclosed and in a good state of cultivation; and the substratum of the soil consists of various valuable minerals, chiefly coal, iron, and limestone, the procuring of which affords employment to a considerable number of the inhabitants. A ridge of excellent limestone extends across the parish, in a direction parallel with the strata of coal, which rest upon it; iron-ore is found here, and there are also strata of very fine black and speckled marble. The limestone is worked to a very great extent for the supply of the adjacent districts to a great distance: the marble, which is of excellent quality for chimney-pieces and other ornaments, is sent from the quarries in great quantities to Bristol, and to different parts of the principality; and the coal is also worked to a considerable extent. All the marble burns into white lime, the bitumen with which it is coloured being sublimed by calcination. A fair is held here annually on the 5th of August. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Rees Goring Thomas, Esq., who is the lay impropiator of the tithes of the parish. The church, dedicated to St. Cyndeyrn, is a spacious and plain edifice; and the churchyard is one of the finest and most agreeably situated in the country. There are three places of worship for Independents, two for Baptists, and one for Methodists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children was endowed by Mrs. Catherine Goldfrap, a native of this parish, in 1784, with money then producing £25 per annum, but which, from the reduction of the rate of interest, now produces only £21. 17. 6., to which Sir William Clayton, Bart., and Rees Goring Thomas, Esq., add £5. 5. per annum each: in this school forty-five children are taught to read, and thirty of them to write. Glynn Abbey, a private house in this parish, is supposed to occupy the site of an ancient religious establishment, of which there are no remains, and of which the only existing memorial is the name. Formerly there were numerous seats in the parish, within which no fewer than seven magistrates were resident: but they have all been deserted by their proprietors, and most of them converted into farm-houses. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £645. 15.

LLANGENEY (LLAN-GENEU), a parish in the hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 1½ mile (E. by S.) from Crickhowel, containing 409 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Ceneu, one of the daughters of Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog, who, devoting herself to a life of religious retirement, had an oratory here, and was canonized after her death. The parish, which is not of any considerable extent, is bounded on the south by the river Usk, and is intersected by the small river Grwyney, which, after flowing in a southerly direction for two miles through it, falls into the Usk at this place. The surrounding country is agreeably diversified; and the prevailing scenery is characterized by features of beautiful simplicity: the vale of the Grwyney, in which the village is embosomed, is enclosed by lofty hills clothed with the richest groves, and the stream is bordered on each side by meadows of beautiful verdure. In the neighbourhood are several good mansions and handsome villas; and within the parish are situated Court y Gollen, a spacious mansion, built by the present proprietor, the Rev. Richard Davies, at a convenient distance from the turnpike road to Crickhowel; and Sunny Bank, a handsome modern house, also erected by its present proprietor, Robert Williams, Esq. At Grwyney is a small carding and spinning establishment, in which not more than six persons are employed; and on the river from which this small village derives its name are two paper-mills, for the manufacture of the coarser kinds of paper, affording employment conjointly to about sixteen persons. Near the village is an iron forge, which formerly gave employment to a considerable number of men, in converting into bars the pig iron made at the Sir Hoey works, but which, from some litigation, has been suspended. The turnpike road from London to Milford traverses the southern part of the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, united, with that of Llanelly, to the rectory of Llangattock, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. A certain portion of the tithes of this parish is paid to the sexton, who claims it by a prescriptive right, recognised in a terrier dated 1720, and now in the possession of the Rev. Richard Davies, of Court y Gollen. The church is a neat and substantial edifice in good repair, consisting of a nave, chancel, and a south aisle, which last appears to have been built or repaired about the commencement of the seventeenth century: the nave is separated from the aisle by a series of five pointed arches, resting upon octangular pillars: the edifice is situated on the western bank of the river Grwyney, over which is a neat stone bridge of one arch. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. John Howel, in the year 1620, bequeathed two fields, called Dwygae Llangeney, in trust to the churchwardens, to appropriate the rents to the repairs of the church and the neighbouring bridge, in equal portions, after deducting a part to be annually distributed among the poor at Christmas. In a field on the confines of this parish and those of Crickhowel and Llanbedr is a stone inscribed, in Roman characters, to the memory of one "Turpilus;" and in the grounds of Court y Gollen, near the turnpike road, is a large Maen Hîr, a rude erect stone, thirteen feet high, three feet three inches broad, and eighteen inches thick. Some vestiges of an encampment may be traced on an eminence in this parish, called Pen y Prisc, which is supposed to be of Roman origin, but no satisfactory account of it has been recorded. On the farm of Pen y darren is Fynnon Geneu, or "Ceneu's Well," to the water of which was formerly attributed great efficacy in the cure of diseases of the eye; and another well near Sunny Bank is said to possess petrifying qualities. Near Fynnon Geneu a farmer, some years since, in removing the remains of an ancient building, which was supposed to have been the oratory of St. Ceneu, discovered a very ancient bell of singular form and construction, supposed to have been used by that saint in calling the people to prayers: this curious piece of antiquity was in the possession of the late Venerable Archdeacon Payne, by whose permission it was exhibited before the Society of Antiquaries in London, in the year 1809. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £165. 8.

LLANGENNECH (LLAN-GENNECH), a parish in the hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. N. E.) from Llanelly, containing 670 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the western margin of the river Loughor, by which it is separated from the county of Glamorgan, and is intersected by the rivulet called Morlais, a tributary to that river, and also by the turnpike road from Swansea to Llanelly. The surface is varied; the lands for the greater part are enclosed and cultivated, and the soil is generally fertile. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified; and within the parish is Llangennech Park, the seat of Edward Rose Tunno, Esq., and formerly the property of the Stepneys of Llanelly House. Coal of very superior quality, which obtains a high price in the London market, is found in the parish; and works upon an extensive scale have been established here by the Llangennech Coal Company, who, in addition to the fine beds found on the Llangennech Park estate, have recently opened new pits of coal, and also of culm, of which considerable quantities are exported. The river Loughor is navigable at spring tides, for vessels of two hundred tons' burden, to the quay belonging to the Llangennech Coal Company, who have greatly improved it, and rendered it very commodious, have facilitated the access by deepening the river, have established a steam-boat of twenty-five horse power, for towing the vessels after they are laden with the coal, and have laid down tram-roads, and employ every means for the despatch of business. A fair is held annually on October 23rd in the village. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Edward Rose Tunno, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Gwynog. There is a place of worship for Independents. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £144. 4.

LLANGENNITH (LLAN-GENYDD), a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 16 miles (W. by S.) from Swansea, containing 367 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cenydd, to whom also was dedicated a priory founded in this parish, according to Bishop Tanner, by Roger de Bellomont, or Beaumont, Earl of Warwick, who is said to have conquered the territory of Gower, in which ancient lordship this place is included, in the reign of Stephen. This priory, of which the present parish church was most probably the chapel, was annexed to the abbey of St. Taurinus at Evreux in Normandy, and, as an Alien priory, was seized in the reign of Henry V., by whose unfortunate son and successor it was granted, in 1441, to the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford, in whose possession it now remains. From the frequent mention, in ancient deeds, of the names "East Town," "West Town," "Prior's Town," "Druids' Moor," &c., with reference to this place, it would appear to have been originally of much greater extent than at present. The village is situated near the south-western foot of Llanmadoc hill, and commands a fine view of the adjacent country, through which flows the river Burry; the town of Loughor is seen in the distance, between the hills: the houses, though scattered, and in general of a poor description, have a cleanly appearance, and are whitewashed, as is common in the county of Glamorgan. The soil of the parish is fertile, and the lands are almost entirely enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 16. 8., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Warden and Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford. The church is an ancient and spacious structure, and preserves some characteristics of its original importance, as connected with the priory: in the chancel are several ancient monuments. The glebe-house is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient residence of St. Cenydd, and is still called the College. On Holmes island, which is contiguous to this part of the coast, are the remains of an ancient chapel, formerly belonging to the church. In the small village of Burry's Green is one of Lady Barham's chapels for dissenters, with a neat house adjoining, as a residence for the minister. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £65.

LLANGERNEW (LLAN-GERNEW), a parish partly in the hundred of ISALED, and partly in that of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W. by N.) from Denbigh, containing 1036 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the banks of the river Elwy, and comprises a large portion of one of the most rugged and mountainous parts of the county. The ancient mansion of Hâvodunos, within its limits, is stated originally to have been a religious foundation; but no authentic account has been preserved of such an establishment, nor are there any vestiges of the ancient buildings: the present edifice is in the Elizabethan style. There is also another good old mansion in the parish, called Pennant. Several attempts to procure lead and copper-ore have been made, but the quantity found has been considered insufficient to afford an adequate remuneration to the adventurers. That part of the parish which is in the hundred of Isaled comprises the Upper and Lower divisions; and that which is in the hundred of Isdulas forms the township of Marchaled. Fairs are held on March 29th, May 16th, June 28th, September 29th, and November 29th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £7. 6. 0½, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: the rectory is an impropriation, attached to the Precentorship in the cathedral church of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Digain, is a large edifice in excellent repair, and contains some good monuments of the Lloyds of Hâvodynos. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Numerous small benefactions have been made for the benefit of the poor, the produce of which, amounting to about £77 per annum, is distributed among them annually on St. Thomas' day. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £480. 11.

LLANGEVNI (LLAN-GEVNI), a market town and parish, in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 13 miles (W.) from Beaumaris, and 248 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 1753 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from the river Cevni, upon which it is situated, was, towards the close of the last century, but a small and inconsiderable village, consisting only of two or three solitary houses; but owing to its central situation, and the establishment of a market here, it has, since that period, amazingly increased in extent and population, and is at present one of the best market towns in the island. It is beautifully situated in a rich and fertile vale, watered by the river Cevni, which nearly encircles the town, and over which two handsome bridges of stone have been erected, and upon the old Holyhead road, at the distance of a mile from the new line of road from the Menai bridge to Holyhead, which has been constructed under the authority of government for the more expeditious conveyance of the mail. The parish comprises a considerable tract of land, of which the greater portion is enclosed and cultivated, though one part forms a tract of common, which affords good pasturage for cattle and sheep. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, combining features of rural and picturesque character; and the higher grounds afford some extensive prospects over the adjacent country. The town is well built and of prepossessing appearance, consisting of several regular and well-formed streets, with a neat market-house. On the river Cevni is a small factory for carding and spinning wool, and for bleaching and weaving woollen cloth, which is manufactured here on a limited scale. The market, which was formerly on Friday, is now on Thursday, and is well supplied with provisions of every kind: it was established in the year 1785, and is now one of the best attended in the island. Fairs are annually held on March 14th, April 17th, June 10th, August 17th, September 15th, and October 23rd; and six great cattle markets are held on the six market days preceding Christmas. A post-office under that of Bangor, from which place it is distant eleven miles, has been established in the town, for the accommodation of its greatly increased population. By the late acts for amending the representation of the people Llangenvni has been constituted a polling-place in the election of a knight for the shire.

The living is a discharged rectory, with Trêgayan annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £9. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Cyngar, is a spacious and handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower, crowned with pinnacles, erected in 1824, by subscription, aided by a grant of £250 from the Incorporated Society for the building and enlargement of churches and chapels, for the erection of three hundred and eighty-three additional sittings, of which two hundred and ninety-seven are free. The late Lord Bulkeley gave the land on which the church is built, and £300 towards its erection, also a plot of ground on which to build a glebe-house, with the grounds attached to it; and a portion of land for the enlargement of the churchyard. The Rev. Evan Williams, M. A., the present rector, built, in 1822, an excellent, commodious, and well-planned glebe-house, and contributed £100 towards the building of the church, and the proprietors of land in the parish subscribed liberally towards the accomplishment of the same work. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school, which is held in a large room over the market-place, built expressly for that purpose by the late Lord Bulkeley, was established here in 1818, and is supported by subscription, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, of whom there are at present one hundred and sixty attending it. Numerous small donations and bequests have been made by various benefactors for the relief of the poor of this parish; but they have all been lost, with the exception of £1. 15. per annum, which is distributed according to the intention of the donor.

About one mile from the town, within the limits of the parish, is situated Trêgarnedd, anciently the residence of Ednyved Vychan, the valiant commander of the forces and chief counsellor of Llewelyn the Great, and ancestor of Owain Tewdwr, and of the sovereigns of that house who subsequently succeeded to the throne of England. Trêgarnedd, which took its name from a large earnedd, or sepulchral heap of stones, in an adjoining field, was also the birthplace of Sir Gruffydd Llwyd, grandson of Ednyved, who was knighted by Edward I., in 1284, on announcing to that monarch, who was then at Rhuddlan, the intelligence of the birth of Prince Edward, in the castle of Carnarvon. Sir Gruffydd was greatly distinguished by the royal favour, both in the reign of Edward and during part of that of his son; but in 1317 he attempted to form an alliance with Edward Bruce, who had assumed the crown of Ireland, and in 1322 openly revolted, ravaging the whole country, and committing various acts of atrocity: the English giving him battle, in which he sustained considerable loss, he retreated to his fortress of Trêgar-

nedd, which he had previously garrisoned, and also constructed another strong hold, called Ynys Gevni, in the marsh at a short distance from his mansion, and surrounded it with a broad and deep fosse, of which part is still remaining. In this strong position he maintained himself for some time, but was finally taken prisoner, and conveyed to Rhuddlan castle, where he was soon afterwards beheaded. The site of Trêgarnedd is now occupied only by some mean farm-buildings; but the whole extent is clearly marked by the intrenchments which surround it, and which enclose an area of nearly five acres: part of the moat on the north-west side is quite perfect. The adjacent carnedd, which consisted of an extensive pile of stones, surrounded by a circle of upright stones about eighty-six yards in diameter, was wholly removed in 1822, for the purpose of building a wall to divide the field. Of the fortress in the marsh, the site of which is still called Ynys Gevni, nothing but some small vestiges of the intrenchments are now visible, the continued overflowing of the river having swept away every vestige of the ancient buildings. About a mile from the town are some considerable remains of a paved road, which may be traced for a distance of two miles, in some parts in a very perfect state, being paved in some places with large masses of jasper, which is found in a quarry at no great distance, intermixed with the grit-stone. It is supposed by some antiquaries to be part of a Roman road, which anciently led from the Moel y don ferry across the Menai to the station at Holyhead. In taking down the old church, in 1824, a large stone was discovered beneath the foundation, with a very curious inscription in rude Roman characters, of which, owing to the mutilated condition in which it was found, the following part only is legible; CVLIDON. IACIT. SECVND.... it is now placed upright in the churchyard, upon the spot where it was found. In 1829, in removing a small fence at Glânhwva, near the town, forty human skeletons were found, which, from the position in which they lay, appeared to have been hastily interred; and in the adjoining field great numbers of human bones are scattered in every direction: these are supposed to be the remains of the men who fell at the siege of Ynys Gevni. Adjoining the town is a chalybeate spring, formerly in great repute, but now owing to an admixture of other water, by which its medicinal efficacy is weakened, altogether disused. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £462. 2.

LLANGIAN (LLAN-GIAN), a parish in the hundred of GAFLOGION, in the Llein division of the county of CARMARVON, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Pwllheli, containing 1211 inhabitants. It is four miles in length and three in breadth, and is pleasantly situated near the south-western extremity of the county, and in the centre of the promontory which shelters on the west St. Tudwal's Roads, in the bay of Cardigan. It comprehends a very extensive tract of land, of which a considerable portion is unenclosed and uncultivated: the remainder, which is rich and fertile, has been brought into a good state of cultivation. An act of parliament was obtained, in 1808, for enclosing the common called Mynydd Mynytho, comprising from six to seven hundred acres, of which by far the greater portion is within this parish. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and in some places highly picturesque; and the views from the higher grounds over the bay of Cardigan on the south and east, and over the adjacent country on the north, combine many objects of interest and features of beauty. Nanhoron, in this parish, the residence of Richard Lloyd Edwards, Esq., is an elegant mansion, beautifully situated in grounds which are tastefully disposed, and surrounded with woods of stately growth, and with thriving plantations, which form a prominent and highly ornamental feature in the scenery of the place. The inhabitants, with the exception of such as are engaged in the herring fishery, which is carried on here during the season, are principally employed in agriculture. Some indications of lead-ore have been observed in several parts of the parish, but no mines have yet been opened, nor any works established. A fair is held on June 28th. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanbedrog, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Cilan, is a spacious and well-built edifice, containing several good monuments to the family of Nanhoron, of which one to the memory of Captain Edwards, R. N., who died at sea, is remarkable for its elegance. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Richard Hughes, in 1642, bequeathed in trust to the heirs of Tŷn y Cae and Nanhoron Issa, £40, the interest of which, together with that of some other charitable donations and bequests, is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £450. 6.

LLANGINNING (LLAN-GYNIN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2½ miles (W.N.W.) from St. Clear's, containing 434 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynin, or from its situation on the river Cynin, by which it is bounded on the eastern side, contains a considerable tract of land, which, with the exception of a very small portion, is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. A fair is held on January 18th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of St. Clear's, or of J. Lewes Philipps, Esq., patron of St. Clear's, the right of appointing the minister being a subject of dispute: the Bishop of St. David's presented at the last vacancy by lapse. The church has no architectural claim to particular description. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £101. 19.

LLANGLYDWEN (LLAN-GLEDWYN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N.W.) from St. Clear's, containing 319 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cledwyn, one of the sons of Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog, is pleasantly situated on the river Tâf, by which it is bounded on the east. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and the adjacent country well-wooded: some parts of it are in a high state of cultivation. Dôlwyllim, the seat of Evan Protheroe, Esq., M. D., is a handsome modernized mansion, romantically situated in a deep vale, through which flows the river Tâf, forming here a boundary between the parishes of Llanglydwen, Llanboidy, and Killymaenllwyd : the grounds are tastefully laid out, and from the house may be seen the venerable Druidical remains described in the article on Llanboidy, in which parish they are situated. The woods surrounding Dôlwyllim abound with squirrels : on the estate are some indications of lead-ore, but no attempt has yet been made to work it. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £2. 13. 4., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Cledwyn, is a small neat edifice, and was repaired and beautified some years since, at the expense of the family at Dôlwyllim. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £61. 1.

LLANGOED (LLAN-GOED), or LLANGOURDA, a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Beaumaris, containing 562 inhabitants. This place, the name of which signifies "the church in the wood," is situated on the shore of the Irish sea, by which it is bounded on the north, and forms an enclosed and well-cultivated tract. The surrounding scenery is agreeably varied, and the views over the sea and the adjacent country are extensive, and abound with interesting features. Plâs yn Llangoed, in this parish, the residence of Mrs. Hughes, is a spacious mansion, occupying a delightful situation, embracing within its demesnes a rich variety of scenery, and commanding, from various parts of the grounds, extensive prospects of considerable beauty. On the sea-shore are very large quarries of black and grey marble, and of limestone, from which the government works at Port Patrick and other places are supplied. From the former are raised blocks of marble weighing ten tons, and slabs of large dimensions, susceptible of a high polish ; and from the latter, stone of excellent quality for building, and also for burning into lime. These quarries, which are worked upon an extensive scale, afford employment to more than a hundred men, exclusively of others who are engaged in the navigation of ten vessels, which are constantly employed in transporting the larger blocks to Ireland, and the smaller pieces to Liverpool. The situation of the quarries near the sea-shore affords great facility for shipping off their produce ; and on this part of the coast is good anchorage for vessels, while waiting to receive their freight. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed, with that of Llanvihangel-Din-Sylwy, to the rectory of Llaniestyn, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed conjointly with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. Robert J. Hughes. The church, dedicated to St. Cawrdav, is of very ancient foundation : the present structure was erected in 1613, at the expense of Henry Johnes, Esq., to whom James I. granted the tithes of this parish. It is a spacious and elegant cruciform edifice, in the later style of English architecture, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north and south transepts, and containing some good monuments to the memory of deceased members of the families of Johnes and Hughes. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. William Wynne, by deed in 1670, gave a tenement called Tŷddyn Llwyn, in the parish of Bethgelart, in the county of Carnarvon, the rent of which he directed to be appropriated to the apprenticing of two poor boys either of this parish or that of Penmôn adjoining, and also for the purchase of six coats annually, to be given to six poor men at Christmas, and of six penny loaves to be distributed weekly on Sunday : this tenement is now worth £200 per annum, but no appropriation of its rental to the objects for which it was given has been made since 1826. There are several other benefactions to the poor, the proceeds of the whole of which are either lost or misapplied. Plâs Newydd, a very extensive farm in this parish, was left by the foundress of Llandwrog almshouses, in Carmarthenshire, towards their support, and is now become a very valuable property. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £162. 13.

LLANGOEDMORE (LLAN-GOEDMAWR), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from Cardigan, containing 1014 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying "the church of the great wood," is derived from its situation in a district abounding with timber of ancient and luxuriant growth, and with groves of stately oaks and other trees, for the number and beauty of which the immediate vicinity is eminently distinguished. Soon after the death of Henry I., a memorable battle was fought near Crûg Mawr, a conical hill in this parish, between the Welsh, commanded by Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, and the English, in which the latter sustained a signal defeat. The parish is pleasantly situated on the river Teivy, on the turnpike road from Cardigan to Newcastle-Emlyn, and contains, in addition to the large proportion of woodland above-noticed, a considerable portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation : the whole forms a rather hilly surface of about five thousand acres, having a variety of soils, among which clay prevails. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and in some parts highly picturesque ; and the views of the adjacent country combine many features of pleasing character. In the vicinity are several handsome seats and villas, beautifully situated, and commanding extensive prospects. Coedmore, the seat of Thomas Lloyd, Esq., is a noble mansion, situated on a lofty eminence overlooking the river Teivy, commanding a fine view of the venerable remains of Kŷlgerran castle, and sheltered in the rear and on the sides by an extensive wood of stately and well-grown trees : contiguous to this seat formerly stood Castel Ceval, the ancient mansion of the lords of Coedmore. The name of this mansion, anciently written Coed-Mawr, signifies "the great wood," and was probably bestowed on it from the luxuriant and extensive forest in which it was built. The baronage of Coed-Mawr was conferred by Edward III. on Sir Robert Langley, constable of Aberystwith castle, and lieutenant of the county of Cardigan, from whose family it passed by exchange to the Mortimers, of whom Llewelyn Mortimer, the first of that name who owned this estate, espoused Angharad, daughter of Meredydd ab Rhŷs, Prince of Cardigan. Rowland, the sixth in descent from Llewelyn Mortimer, assigned it to his brother-in-law, Sir John Lewis, in exchange for Castell Llwyd, in Laugharne, county of Carmarthen ; and it subsequently came into the pos-

31st, August 21st, and November 22nd, for horses, cattle, pigs, butter and cheese. By the late act for amending the representation of the people Llangollen has been made a polling-place in the election of knights for the shire.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 11. 10½., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Collen, is an ancient structure, partly in the early style of English architecture, consisting of a nave with one aisle and a chancel: the roof is of oak, panelled and richly carved: the east window of the chancel is embellished with a half-length figure of the Saviour, in stained glass, by Eginton. The service is performed in the English language only on the second Sunday in each month. The churchyard is spacious and elevated, and commands a grand and pleasing prospect of the town and bridge, rearing its lofty summit above which is the isolated hill whereon stand the ruins of Castell Dinas Brân. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. In 1773, a parochial school was erected, in which sixteen children are gratuitously instructed by a master who receives the interest of £150, bequeathed at various times for that purpose. The interest of various charitable donations and bequests, amounting in the aggregate to £409, is annually distributed among the poor. The abbey of Valle Crucis, though forming a beautiful and prominent feature in the scenery of the neighbourhood, is situated in the adjacent parish of Llantysilio, under which head an account of it will be found, as also of the famous "Pillar of Eliseg," nearly adjacent, the most ancient inscribed monument of British erection now existing. The ancient fortress of Castell Dinas Brân, from its peculiar situation, and the massive structure of such portions of its walls as are still remaining, appears to have been almost impregnable. Its remains, which are very extensive and highly picturesque, comprise a quadrilateral area, one hundred and ninety feet long, and one hundred and forty broad, forming the entire summit of the mountain on which they stand, and which on most sides is so precipitous that it can be ascended only with great difficulty: the side easiest of access is defended by a deep trench cut through the solid rock. The walls, though ornamented in some places with mouldings of freestone, are composed for the most part of the coarse and friable schistose stone abounding in the neighbourhood, which gives to the broken towers and shattered fragments yet remaining a strikingly rugged and picturesque appearance, and combines with the conspicuousness of their situation to render them one of the most remarkable objects in the surrounding scenery. At Pengwern, the seat of Sir Thomas Mostyn, Bart., are some remains of the ancient mansion of Llŷs Pengwern, supposed to have been the residence of Tudor Trevor, Lord of Bromfield, in the early part of the tenth century, and which certainly formed that of Ednyved Vychan, one of his descendants. Close to the town stands the elegant little mansion of Plâs Newydd, lately the residence of the late Lady Eleanor Butler and Miss Ponsonby, two ladies of Irish extraction, who, in 1778, retired from the gaieties of fashionable society, and secluded themselves in this charming sequestered retreat, where they continued, devoted in their companionship, and seeking little intercourse with the neighbouring gentry, until the death of each. Lady Eleanor Butler died in 1829, and Miss Ponsonby in 1831, and both were interred in the churchyard of this parish: since the decease of the latter lady the estate has been sold by public auction, and was purchased by two other maiden ladies, namely, Miss Lolly and Miss Andrews. The poor of the entire parish are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £1001. 18., of which sum, £586. 8. is raised on the united divisions of Llangollen Traian and Trevor Traian, and the remainder on the division of Glyn Traian.

LLANGOLMAN (LLAN-GOLMAN), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N.) from Narberth, containing 311 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Golman, is pleasantly situated on the Eastern Cleddy river, and in the eastern extremity of the county, bordering on Carmarthenshire. The eastern part of it is intersected by the river, and the northern by the turnpike road leading from Fishguard to Narberth: the whole forms a considerable extent of arable and pasture land. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and the views over the adjacent country embrace some interesting features. Slate of good quality is found within the parish, and some quarries are worked upon an extensive scale, affording employment to such of the inhabitants as are not engaged in agriculture. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Llandilo, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty. The church is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £59. 9.

LLANGONOYD, or LLANGONWD (LLAN GYN-WYD), a parish in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (S.E.) from Neath, comprising the hamlets of Bayden or Lower-Llangonoyd, Cwmdû, Higher Llangonoyd, and Middle Llangonoyd, each maintaining its own poor, and containing 1726 inhabitants, of which number, 331 are in Middle Llangonoyd. This parish, which is situated near the source of the river Llynvi, and in the heart of a wild and mountainous district abounding with mineral wealth, is said to have afforded a temporary asylum to Edward II., who, after his escape from the castle of Caerphilly, sought shelter here in hope of effecting his passage to Ireland. Coal and iron-ore abound in the parish, and are both worked upon an extensive scale. At Maes Têg, about a mile and a half from the church, are the large iron-works of Messrs. Buckland, Smith, and Co., affording employment to more than three hundred men: the collieries of Messrs. Allen also employ about sixty men, and many are engaged in other similar works upon a smaller scale, and in the quarries of limestone and freestone which abound in the vicinity. For the purpose of opening a communication between these works and the neighbouring districts, and affording a facility of conveyance for their produce, a railway has been constructed from the works, which are situated on the line of the Dyfryn-Llynvi railway from the small harbour of Porthcawl, to the market town of Bridgend, passing within a short distance of the coal-works in the parish of St. Bride's Minor. The Dyfryn-Llynvi railway, which is seventeen miles in length, was commenced in 1825, and has been completed at an expense of about £60,000: it begins at Porthcawl, in the parish of Newton-Not-tage, and proceeds by Pyle, where, taking an easterly direction, it joins the Bridgend branch railway at Cevn Cribwr iron-works: from this junction it takes a northerly direction towards Llangonoyd, and, after crossing the river Llynvi, terminates at Dyfryn-Llynvi. For fourteen miles from the sea it forms an inclined plane, rising four hundred feet in the whole of that distance: in the course of the next two miles it has a rise of a hundred and ten feet, and the remainder is a good level. A fair is held here on May 3rd. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £19.5., and in the patronage of Lewis Thomas, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Cynwyd, a saint of the congregation of Catwg. In the hamlet of Bayden there was formerly a chapel of ease, which is now in ruins. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. A school for the gratuitous instruction of children, which it is intended to unite with the central school in London, is supported by subscription. Near the village was formerly a cromlech, called by the peasantry "the Old Church." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the whole parish amounts to £537. 11., of which sum, £227. 7. is raised on the hamlet of Llangonoyd Lower.

LLANGONOYD, HIGHER, (LLAN-GYNWYD), a hamlet in the parish of LLANGONOYD, hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $10\frac{1}{4}$  miles (N. by W.) from Bridgend, containing 260 inhabitants. This hamlet is situated in the upper part of the parish, at the head of the river Llynvi, which joins the Ogmore, and in an extremely rugged and mountainous tract, prolific in mineral and fossil produce, the working of which has caused an increase in the population since the census of 1821. The poor are supported by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £117. 16.

LLANGORSE (LLAN-GORS), a parish composed of the Upper and Lower divisions, each separately maintaining its own poor, partly in the hundred of PENCELLY, but chiefly in that of TALGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (E. S. E.) from Brecknock, containing, with the township of Llanywern, 405 inhabitants. The name of this parish, signifying literally "the church of the marsh, or bog," appears to have been derived from its situation on the low banks of an extensive pool, or lake, from which circumstance this place is also designated, in ancient charters, "Mara," and St. Paulinus on the Meer. This fine sheet of water, which is called Llŷn-Savaddan, or, more generally, Llangorse Pool or Mere, is about two miles in length and about one in mean breadth, the broadest part lying between the churches of Llangasty-Talyllyn and Llangorse. It forms a curve near the source of the river Llynvi, which, passing through it, is hence supposed to derive its name, signifying literally the "lake water." Its mean depth is from nine to twelve feet, though in some places it varies considerably: the deepest part is near the junction of this parish with that of Cathedine, in which place its depth is from thirty-five to forty-five feet: the depth of the lake diminishes very gradually from the centre towards the banks, so that flat-bottomed boats only can be used. The waters contain pike, perch, and eels, which last are frequently of enormous size: the pike are sometimes found of thirty or forty lb. weight, but they are inferior in flavour to those which are taken in the river Wye: the perch are generally small, five or six together weighing not more than a lb., though some are occasionally found weighing three lb. each, and, when of that size, are esteemed a great delicacy. All persons having land adjoining the lake have the right of keeping a boat upon its waters; and many boats are also kept by the fishermen who live in the village of Llangorse. The parish is intersected by the turnpike road from Crickhowel, through Bwlch, to Talgarth, and is separated from the parishes of Llanvihangel-Talyllyn and Llandevaillog Tre'r-Graig by the river Llynvi, which falls into the Wye near the bridge at Glâsbury: the village is situated about half a mile eastward from the turnpike road from Brecknock to Talgarth: the tram-road from Brecknock to Hay passes through the parish. The lands are chiefly arable, and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and from the higher grounds are some fine prospects over the adjacent country, comprehending, on the east, the Black Mountains of Talgarth.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 10., and in the patronage of the Dean and Canons of Windsor. The tithes of the parish were anciently appropriated to the priory of St. John the Evangelist in Brecknock, upon the dissolution of which establishment they were granted by the crown, together with the advowson of the living, to the Dean and Canons of Windsor, under whom they are held on lease by Charles Griffiths, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Paulinus, is an ancient structure, with a tower at the western end, surmounted by turrets, and containing six musical bells, the fine tone of which has been attributed to the effect of the large body of water contained in the neighbouring lake: the nave is separated from the aisles by a series of obtusely pointed arches, supported on octangular columns. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. Mrs. Elinor Williams, of the Gaer, in 1698, bequeathed the rental of a tenement in Battle, which, in 1745, was let on lease for ninety-nine years to Morgan Powel, Esq., at a yearly rent of £2. 12., and now in the occupation of I. L. P. Watkins, of Pennoyre, Esq., to be appropriated to the apprenticing of four children, born in or near Llangorse. John Dilwyn, of this parish, in 1484, bequeathed £20, directing the annual interest to be distributed among the poor; and Walter Lewis of Llangasty-Talyllyn, in 1680, charged the tenements of Caepella and Wrlodd Cil y llŷn in the parish of Cathedine, with the annual payment of twenty shillings to the poor; but neither of these legacies is now paid. Mrs. Williams, of the Gaer, in 1745, bequeathed £40, secured on the Brecknock turnpike trust, now producing £2 per annum, which, together with the interest of £80 invested in the funds, is annually distributed among the poor. An ancient tenement in this parish, called Cwrt y Prior, was the occasional residence of the priors of the monastery of St. John the Evangelist in Brecknock. The monks of Llantony appear also to have held lands in this parish, for, according to an ancient document, it appears that, in 1324, Hugh de Turberville granted them the tenements called "Cevn" and "Celliau," "at the town of the mere or lake of Breconium, situate on the side between the land of the Lord of the mere, and the lands of Roger the Fisherman, and on the other side next to the road or highway leading to Breconium, in pure and perpetual alms." After the dissolution, the tithes of these tenements were for some time paid to the impropiators and vicar of the parish; but one of the Earls of Oxford having claimed an exemption under the grant of Hubert de Turberville, and the Dean and Canons of Windsor, the impropiators, not thinking it proper to bring the question to issue, these tenements have ever since continued to be tithe-free. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £223. 9., of which sum, £103. 11. is assessed on the Lower, and £119. 18. on the Upper, division of the parish.

LLANGOWER, or LLANGYWAIR (LLANGOWER), a parish in the hundred of PENLLŶN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Bala, containing 412 inhabitants. This parish, which is about five miles in length and three in breadth, is beautifully situated on the south-eastern side of Bala lake, and on the turnpike road leading from Dinasmowddwy to Bala and Corwen. The surface is varied, being in some parts rocky and mountainous, and in others swampy and marshy, producing peat in great abundance, which forms the principal fuel of the inhabitants. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and in some places highly picturesque, the parish comprising part of the Berwyn range of mountains, from which is a fine view of Bala lake, of the Aran and Arenig mountains in the distance, and of the intervening country, which is rich in every variety of beauty. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £5. 5., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Gwyr, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, and is beautifully situated, with the small village around it, on the south-eastern side of the lake: in the churchyard is an ancient yew tree of remarkable growth. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. At the north-eastern extremity of Bala lake are two mounds of earth, one of which bears the name of Castell Grono Bevro Benllŷn, "the castle of Goronow the Fair of Penllŷn," from its having been the site of a strong hold occupied by that chieftain, who is said to have lived in the time of Maelgwyn Gwynedd, about the beginning of the sixth century. Near this place is Fynnon Gwyr, a well to which, under the auspices of that saint, extraordinary virtues were attributed. The Rev. Edward Lloyd, A.M., was for forty years incumbent of this parish: he is known as the author of a work in the Welsh language, entitled Meddyginiaeth, a tract on the Sacrament, which he translated from that published by Bishop Patrick: he died in 1685. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £198.

LLANGRANOG (LLAN-GARANOG), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of MOYTHER, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 20 miles (W. by N.) from Lampeter, containing 921 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Caranog, who flourished towards the close of the sixth century, and is said to have had a small chapel or oratory among the rocks on this part of the coast, where he spent his days in religious seclusion. The parish is pleasantly situated on the shore of Cardigan bay, by which it is bounded on the north-west, and on the turnpike road from Cardigan to Aberystwith. The village is seated in a deep dingle, sheltered by hills on each side, and opening at one extremity towards the sea; and its situation on the open bay of Cardigan, affording excellent opportunities for sea-bathing, occasionally attracts to it a few visitors during the summer season. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified; and from the higher grounds are obtained fine views, extending over the bay and the adjacent country. At some distance above the village stands Pigeonsford, the neat mansion of George Price, Esq., and formerly the seat of the family of Parry. The herring fishery is carried on here to a considerable extent during the season; and in this trade from eight to ten small vessels are generally engaged, in the management of which from twenty to thirty men are employed. Below the village is a small creek, affording shelter to the craft employed in the fishery, and also a facility of communication with other places on the coast. A fair is held on May 27th. The living is a vicarage, not in charge, annexed to that of Llandysilio-Gogo, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 parliamentary grant. The great tithes are appropriated to the Treasurership of the Cathedral Church of St. David's. The church is a neat plain edifice, without either tower or spire, consisting of a nave and chancel, separated by a pointed arch: over the western door are the remains of an ornamented gallery, and the steps of the ancient rood-loft are still remaining: the font is square, and is supported by a circular pillar. A small but elegant vicarage-house has been recently built on the glebe land, at the expense of the present incumbent. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. Above the small harbour is a rock, which, from its fancied resemblance to a large chair, has obtained the appellation of "Eisteddva Cranwg;" though by some writers the name is supposed to be derived from its having been anciently a place of meeting for the bards: and on the summit of an eminence in the immediate vicinity is a large tumulus, in form resembling an inverted pan, and thence called Pen Moel Badell. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £258. 17.

LLANGRYSTYOLYS (LLAN - GRISTIOLUS), a parish in the hundred of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S. S. W.) from Llangewni, containing 873 inhabitants. This parish, which takes its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cristiolus, who flourished about the middle of the seventh century, is situated on the great road from London to Holyhead, and near the upper part of the Malldraeth marsh, over which the road is continued by a noble embankment, extending nearly a mile in length. In 1788 and 1790, acts of parliament were obtained for constructing an embankment to secure this low tract from the encroachment of the sea, and for enclosing it, as it formed an extent of about three thousand acres, comprised chiefly within the limits of this parish. Under the provisions of these acts considerable progress had been made in the execution of this work, and many thousand pounds expended on it, when, in 1796, a violent irruption of the sea destroyed the greater part of the embankment, and the enterprise was for some time abandoned. This desirable work was, however, resumed under the sanction of an act of parliament obtained in 1815, and the undertaking was successfully completed in 1819. The entire parish consists of a large tract of enclosed and well-cultivated land, with some common and waste. The surrounding scenery is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature from what is generally found in this part of the island; the soil is various, but for the most part fertile. Coal and freestone of good quality exist in the parish, but have not been hitherto worked to any advantage. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Cerregceinwen annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor, to whom, as Archdeacon of Anglesey, the tithes of the parish are appropriated. The church is supposed to have been originally built about the year 610: the present structure is spacious and handsome, exhibiting some elegant architectural details, and decorated with an east window of good design, enriched with elegant tracery. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, in which a few boys are gratuitously taught to read and write, is supported partly by a small endowment, and partly by subscription. The Rev. Hugh Jones bequeathed £100; the Rev. Dr. Lewis, £50; John Griffith Lewis, £10; Owen David ab Owen, £10; and various other benefactors smaller sums of money; the interest of which, amounting to £17. 10., is annually distributed among the poor of the parish at Christmas. Dr. Henry Maurice, of Jesus' College, Oxford, and Margaret Professor of Divinity in that university, was born in this parish, in 1648: he accompanied his patron, Sir Leoline Jenkins, to Cologne, whither he was sent as ambassador, and greatly distinguished himself as a polemical writer. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £472. 2.

LLANGUICKE, otherwise LLANGUIC (LLANGIWG), a parish in the hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.N. W.) from Neath, containing 1847 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Tawe, which flows through a beautiful and romantic vale to which it gives name, affording in some parts pleasing and picturesque views, and sheltered on both sides by lofty hills of varied appearance and rich in mineral wealth. The mines of stone coal, culm, and iron-ore are almost inexhaustible, and are here worked to a very considerable extent by Messrs. Gough, I. D. Berrington, G. Crane, &c., who employ together several hundred men, but neither the exact number nor the quantity of coal raised can, owing to constant fluctuation, be satisfactorily ascertained. The Swansea canal, which passes through the parish, affords the means of conveying large quantities of mineral produce to the port of Swansea, from which it is shipped to various parts of the kingdom; and a road from Swansea to Brecknock, which passes by the village, gives a facility of intercourse with the neighbouring districts. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Mrs. Leach. The church is dedicated to St. Ciwg. There are two places of worship for Presbyterians. The late Mrs. Turberville, of Kilybebill Place, bequeathed £5 per annum, which is annually distributed in bread among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £280. 5.

LLANGUNLLO (LLAN-GYNLLO), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (N. E. by E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 644 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynllo, is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road from Cardigan through Troedyr-awr to Lampeter, and nearly the whole of it is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil, though varying with the surface, which is finely undulated, and in some parts rises into bold eminences, is in general fertile. The surrounding country is pleasingly varied, and the scenery in many parts is highly picturesque. The upper grounds command some extensive and interesting prospects, and from the eminence on which the church is built is obtained a fine view over the beautiful vale above which stands the mansion of Bronwydd. In the immediate vicinity are some fine estates and elegant seats: of these, the principal are those of Bronwydd and Gernôs. Bronwydd, the residence of the late patriotic Colonel Lloyd, who commanded the Teivy-side volunteers, and subsequently the Fishguard and Newton fencibles, and now the seat of Thomas Lloyd, Esq., is a handsome mansion, beautifully situated on the summit of an eminence richly clothed with wood, and overlooking a deep and sequestered vale, watered by a rapid and turbulent stream, which falls into the Teivy at Hênllan. Gernôs, formerly the mansion of the family of Lewis, and now the seat of Major Parry, by marriage of his ancestor, Thomas Parry, of Cwm Cynon, Esq., with the heiress of that family, is a good mansion, pleasantly situated in grounds comprehending much varied and pleasing scenery. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Freeholders of the parish. The church, dedicated to St. Cynllo, a saint of the fifth century, who was eminent for the sanctity of his life and the austerity of his manners, is a neat edifice, situated on a commanding eminence, and rebuilt at the sole expense of the late proprietor of the Bronwydd estate: it consists of a nave and chancel, and is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £176. 8.

LLANGUNLLO (LLAN-GYNLLO), a parish comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (W.) from Knighton, containing 498 inhabitants, of which number, 323 are resident in the Upper, and 175 in the Lower, division. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynllo, an ancient British saint who flourished about the middle of the fifth century. The parish, which is situated in the north-eastern portion of the county, and near the source of the river Lûg, is bounded on the east by the parish of Heyop, and on the west by that of Llanbister, and extends four miles in length and three in breadth, comprising large tracts of elevated mountain, with much rich arable and pasture land, of which by far the greater part is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil in the lower grounds is fertile, and the system of agriculture pursued is of a superior kind. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of features, is in general pleasing, and on the side towards Knighton is in many parts highly picturesque; the views from the higher grounds embrace some interesting and finely varied prospects over the valley of Cwm Heyop, which is partly within the parish. In ancient writings this parish is styled "Llan Gynllo cum Capellis," and the parish church of Pillith, is said to have been formerly a chapel to the mother church of this place. Llangunllo, with the adjoining parish of Pillith, constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, valued in the king's books at £13, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Pillith annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 1. 0½, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. Three-fourths of the tithes of this parish, and also of that of Pillith, belong to the prebendary of Llangunllo, and the remainder to the vicar. The church is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, and is not distinguished by any architectural details of interest. A small free school, for the gratuitous instruction of eight poor children, is endowed with three acres of land in the parish. Andrew Clarke, in 1752, bequeathed a rent-charge of £2; and Thomas Meyrick, in 1764, gave a rent-charge of £1. 10., both to be annually distributed among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of both divisions amounts to £300. 9.

LLANGUNNOCK (LLAN-GYNOG), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S.W. by S.) from Carmarthen, containing 859 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable extent, has been greatly improved since the year 1806, when an act of parliament was obtained, under the provisions of which more than five thousand acres of land within its limits have been allotted and enclosed, the greater part of it being now in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, is in general pleasing. The manor of Penryn is co-extensive with the parish, in which is an ancient family mansion called Cwm, now the property of Thomas Morris, Sen., Esq., of Llanstephan Cottage. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Llanstephan, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Cynog, is not distinguished by any peculiar architectural feature. There are places of worship for Baptists and Independents. Here is a parochial school, said to have been founded by Judge Vaughan of Derllŷs, and endowed with two cottages and about two acres of land, which endowment was subsequently augmented, by Mr. John Vaughan, with a rent-charge of £5, for clothing eight poor children, and providing them with books. This establishment, which is called the New Well Charity, is traditionally said to have originated from a cure performed on Judge Vaughan by the water of a spring called the New Well, near the site of the present school-house, over the entrance to which is a stone with the following inscription: "This is a charity school for ever, built at the recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the lord, freeholders, and inhabitants of this manor of Penrin, A. D. 1705." Mr. John Popkin, in 1713, bequeathed £10, and in 1771 Mr. David James bequeathed £100, the interest of which sums, together with the dividends arising from £214. 2. 6. three per cent. Bank annuities, bequeathed by Miss Theodosia Laugharne, of the town of Laugharne, is annually distributed among the aged and infirm poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £315. 18.

LLANGUNNOR (LLAN-GYNYR), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the hundred of KIDWELLY, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (E.) from Carmarthen, containing 1041 inhabitants. This parish is beautifully situated on the river Towy, by which it is separated from the borough of Carmarthen, and on the great turnpike road from that town, by Golden Grove, to Llandilo-Vawr: it contains several genteel residences. On the bank of the river is a ridge of elevated ground, at the eastern extremity of which stands the church, commanding perhaps the finest view of the most interesting portion of the fertile and picturesque Vale of Towy. This beautiful prospect embraces Merlin's Hill on the right, and on the left the luxuriant woods of Middleton Hall, with the elegant tower, raised to the memory of Lord Viscount Nelson, crowning the summit of one of the loftiest hills in the vale. Opposite to these are, Grongar Hill, and the abrupt eminence on which are the ancient and venerable ruins of Dryslwyn castle, almost surrounded by a bold sweep of the river; and a little lower down in the vale is Dynevor castle, embosomed in stately oaks, above which rise, in romantic grandeur, the dilapidated towers of that once stately pile. The vale is studded on each side with numerous handsome seats and elegant villas, above which the newly restored palace of St. David's, and the pleasing little village of Aberguilly, are conspicuous. The whole extent of country beyond Llandilo, through which the Towy pursues its winding course, lies open to the view, forming a grand combination of pleasingly picturesque objects and a continued succession of scenery of unrivalled beauty, terminated by the Black Mountains in the distance. The lands, with the exception of a small portion, are enclosed and cultivated; and the soil, though varied, is generally fertile. The Carmarthen race-course is situated on the banks of the Towy, in this parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Cynyr, is a neat edifice, appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service, and, though possessing no architectural details of importance, derives from its beautiful situation an interesting and romantic appearance. It contains a neat monument to the memory of Sir Richard Steele, who, for some time prior to his decease, lived in retirement at a farm in this parish, called Tŷ Gwyn, or the "White House." There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £378.

LLANGURIG, or LLANGIRIRIG (LLAN-GURIG), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W.) from Llanidloes, on the road to Aberystwith, containing 1847 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the northern bank of the river Wye, at no great distance from its source in the neighbouring mountain of Plinlimmon. A new road leading from the village to Rhaiadr, in the county of Radnor, formed in 1830, has placed it on the nearest route from London to Aberystwith, and added materially to its interest and importance. This new line of road, which is nine miles and a half in length, winds through the beautiful and picturesque vale of the Wye, abounding with pleasingly diversified scenery. In various parts of the parish are obtained interesting views, and from Glynn-Brychan is an extensive and delightful prospect, embracing the Vale of Llanidloes, with the windings of the river Severn, and the mountainous ridges by which this district is bounded. The manufacture of flannel is carried on in the parish, but the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture. The living is a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £9. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor, to the jurisdiction of whose consistorial court it is subject. The church, dedicated to St. Curig, a saint of the seventh century, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture: the remains of an elaborately carved screen and rood-loft are still preserved. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Welsh Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Sunday schools, in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations, are supported by subscription. Mr. David Vaughan bequeathed £10 to the poor, the interest of which is annually distributed among them. In 1826, a noble, coined in the reign of Edward III., was dug up in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £1249. 6.

LLANGWILLOG (LLAN-GWYLLOG), a parish partly in the hundred of LLYVON, partly in that of MENAI, and partly in that of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. W.) from Llangevni, containing 267 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cwylllog, a female saint, who flourished in the middle of the sixth century, is pleasantly situated nearly in the centre of the island, and on the turnpike road leading from Llangevni to Llanerchymedd, from which places it is equidistant. A sanguinary battle is said to have taken place on Maes Rhôs Rhyvel, in 1143, between the forces of Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, and the united armies of the Erse, Manks, and Norwegians, who had invaded the island, in which the Welsh prince was triumphantly victorious. Upon that occasion the whole naval force of Wales is said to have been brought into action, and to have succeeded in capturing all the ships of the enemy off Dulas bay. This victory is celebrated in Gray's ode to the memory of Owain Gwynedd, in which he eulogizes the exploits of that chieftain; but it is not noticed by any of the principal Welsh historians. This parish, which is of comparatively small extent, is enclosed, and the land is in a good state of cultivation. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart. The church, situated in that part of the parish which is in the hundred of Malltraeth, was originally founded in the year 605: the present edifice is small, but remarkably well built, and has an ancient and curious chapel at the west end of the nave. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest arising from some small charitable bequests and donations is annually distributed among the poor of this parish, pursuant to the directions of the several benefactors. At a short distance from Maes Rhôs Rhyvel is a place called "Castell," the origin and history of which are equally unknown. Coins of Nero, Vespasian, and Constantine, have been found here at various times, in a state of good preservation, and in 1829 a gold coin of Vespasian was dug up, the impression on which was quite perfect. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £185. 5.

LLANGWM (LLAN-GWM), a parish in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W.) from Corwen, containing 1011 inhabitants. It is stated that the inhabitants of North Wales, revolting against the government of Meredydd, Prince of Powys, about the close of the tenth century, invited Eidwal, son of Meirig, to the throne, to dispossess whom Meredydd immediately called together his troops, and the rival princes met at Llangwm, where, after a sharp conflict, Meredydd was totally defeated, and Tewdwr Mawr, his nephew, slain. This parish, which is of great extent, is situated in a dreary moorland district, near the extremity of the county, bordering on Merionethshire, and is intersected by the road from London through Shrewsbury to Holyhead and Dublin: the female inhabitants are principally employed in the spinning of woollen yarn, and the knitting of stockings, large quantities of which are sent to the neighbouring towns, and are purchased for the London and Liverpool markets: the males are occupied in attendance upon their herds and flocks, great numbers of which are purchased by the English drovers, and fattened for the London market. The village is small, but is noted for the large sheep and cattle fairs held in it, which take place on March 8th, April 18th, and August 11th. The living comprises a sinecure rectory and a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph: the former is rated in the king's books at £11. 4. 7.; and the latter is rated at £6, and is endowed with £200 royal bounty; both are in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Hierom, is a small neat edifice. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Various bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor of this parish, several of which have been lost: the produce of those which remain is annually distributed among them on St. Thomas' day. Llŷs Dinmael, an ancient mansion in this parish, is traditionally stated to have been the residence of Dinmael, a petty prince : courts for the lordship of Dinmael are held twice a year. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £412. 12.

LLANGWM (LLAN-GWM), a parish in the hundred of RHÔS, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. E. by S.) from Haverfordwest, containing 697 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which signifies "the church in the vale," is pleasantly situated on the western bank of Milford Haven, about the same distance from Pembroke as from Haverfordwest. Great Nash, formerly the residence of the family of Owen, now of Orielson, and long noted for its hospitality, is now deserted by its proprietor, and in ruins. Duple-dale, the seat of Mrs. Jordan, is a handsome modern mansion, very pleasantly situated, and commanding a fine view of Milford Haven. At the village, which extends along the shore, is a horse ferry to the parish of Coedcanlais. The inhabitants are principally engaged in a lucrative oyster fishery, the produce of which is generally sold at two shillings per bushel (Winchester measure), to dealers from the coast of Kent, more especially to those of Chatham and Rochester, by whom they are taken away in sloops for the supply of the London market : the average annual amount of the profits of this fishery is about £2000, and in good seasons it frequently exceeds £3000. Coal and culm are found here in great abundance : the mines are worked by Sir John Owen, Bart., who is the principal proprietor, and the produce is shipped at Hook Quay, for the supply of the neighbouring districts. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 12. 11., endowed with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Mrs. Owen Barlow. The church, dedicated to St. Hierom, is a spacious and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture, and contains some ancient monuments, among which are several to the memory of the family of Roch. There is a place of worship for Methodists. George Roch, Esq., in 1707, bequeathed a small rent-charge for the instruction of poor children. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £190. 11.

LLANGWNADL (LLAN-GWYNODL), a parish in the hundred of COMMITMAEN, Llyn division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 12 miles (W. by S.) from Pwllheli, containing 293 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the south-western extremity of the county, and upon the shore of Carnarvon bay, by which it is bounded on the west, comprises a small tract of arable and pasture land, in the cultivation of which the inhabitants are chiefly employed, except during the season of the herring fishery, which is here conducted upon an extensive scale. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and the distant views, extending over Carnarvon bay and the adjacent country, are peculiarly interesting. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir J. S. Piozzi Salusbury, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Gwynodl, who lived about the middle of the sixth century, possesses no architectural claim to particular description. There is a small place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Hugh Griffith of Brÿnodl, in 1788, bequeathed a tenement in this parish, directing the rental, now amounting to £7 per annum, to be appropriated to the payment of a master to teach poor children of this place to read Welsh : the school, in which twelve children are gratuitously instructed, is held in the vestry-room of the church, no building having been erected purposely for its use. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £83. 9.

LLANGWSTENYN, or LLANGWYSTENNIN (LLAN-GYSTENNIN), a parish in the hundred of CREUDDYN, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, on the road from Chester to Holyhead, 2 miles (E. N. E.) from Aberconway, containing 643 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated at the entrance to the Vale of Conway, and on the eastern bank of that river, near its mouth : it is of small extent, and contains no village ; the houses, which are few in number, lying scattered over its surface : formerly it was divided into the two townships of Trê Iorwerth and Llanwdden, which, on account of the small value of the tithes at that time, were united, and their boundaries are not now accurately known. Indications of copper-ore exist in several parts, and spirited efforts are now in progress for obtaining it, which are likely to produce a successful result. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Constantine, is a small plain structure, situated in a pleasing valley close to the boundary line between the counties of Carnarvon and Denbigh, and said to be the first Christian church erected in Wales : it is conjectured to have been founded by Constantine the Great, who died in the year 330. Henry III. was commanded by the pope to do penance in this church, but was subsequently absolved, on payment of a fine of five hundred marks of silver. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. Llangwstenyn participates, in conjunction with the parishes of Aberconway, Eglwys-Rhôs, and Llandudno, in the gift of Lewis Owen, Esq., who, by will dated September 4th, 1623, assigned the rectorial tithes of the parish of Aberconway, in trust, to be equally divided between the vicar of that parish and the poor of all the four. The amount resulting to this parish, in the year 1830, was £16, which was distributed in money and clothes to the poor on St. Thomas' day. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £181. 3.

LLANGWYRYVON, or LLANGRWYDDON, (LLAN Y GWYRYDDON), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. by E.) from Aberystwith, containing 533 inhabitants. The name of this place signifies "the church of the Virgins," and is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins. The parish is situated on the southern bank of the Wyrri river, and comprises a considerable tract of enclosed and well-cultivated land, with a large portion of open and elevated common. The soil is generally fertile, and in some places argillaceous : turbaries are found in various places. Some of the higher grounds are abundantly productive of corn and hay. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Chichester family, as impropiators of the tithes. The church, situated on an eminence, is a small ancient edifice, consisting only of a nave and chancel, formerly divided by a curiously carved screen. In the churchyard is an ancient monumental stone, highly ornamented, and having the figure of a cross sculptured upon it, but without any inscription; it is now used as a gate-post. Owing to the elevated situation of the church, the cemetery commands a fine view of the river and the surrounding country. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A Sunday school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is superintended by a few of the parishioners; and a school-house, in which the children are to be educated on the National system, is about to be erected by subscription among the landed proprietors of the parish. Within the limits of the parish are the remains of an ancient intrenchment, of a curvilinear form; but nothing is known either of its origin or history. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £88.13.

LLANGWYVAN (LLAN-GWYVAN), a parish in the hundred of MALLTRAETH, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (S. W. by W.) from Llangenvni, containing 218 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very small extent, being scarcely a mile in length, and about the same in breadth, is situated at the south-western extremity of the county, on the shore of Carnarvon bay. The lands are cold and barren, and the whole aspect of the place is dreary and desolate. The surrounding scenery is not enlivened either by variety or beauty, and the only views which possess any interest are those extending over the bay. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Trêvdraeth, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Cwyvan, who flourished towards the close of the seventh century, and from which circumstance the parish derives its name, is a small edifice, built on a rocky island in Carnarvon bay, about three quarters of a mile distant from the main land, with which it has a communication only at low water; and during the prevalence of easterly winds it is utterly inaccessible, on which account divine service is seldom performed in it during the winter months. The produce of some small charitable benefactions in land and money is annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £149. 6.

LLANGWYVAN (LLAN-GWYVAN), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (E.) from Denbigh, containing 264 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is situated in the north-eastern part of the county, and at the western base of the Clwydian range of mountains. The surrounding scenery is beautifully picturesque, and the views from the higher grounds over the fertile and extensive vale of Clwyd are rich and magnificent. The surface is finely undulated, and the lands, with the exception of the mountainous part of the parish, are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The living is a discharged rectory, within the jurisdiction of the consistorial court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7. 18. 9., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Cwyvan, is a small neat edifice, undistinguished by any architectural details of importance: the pulpit and reading-desk are respectively placed on each side and adjacent to the communion table. There are some small charitable donations for the benefit of the poor, who also receive gratuitous medical assistance from the dispensary at Denbigh. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £153. 11.

LLANGYBI (LLAN-GYBI), a parish in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Pwllheli, containing 717 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cybi, an eminent British saint, who flourished towards the close of the sixth century, is pleasantly situated in the south-western portion of the county, and nearly in the centre of the promontory which separates Cardigan bay from the bay of Carnarvon. It is of very considerable extent, and the lands are mostly enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, comprising some fine views of the adjacent country, which abounds with varied and picturesque beauty. At Pontrhŷd Gôch is a slate quarry, which, however, is worked only on a limited scale, the slates being of rather an inferior quality, and the demand for them confined principally to the immediate neighbourhood. The road from Carnarvon to Pwllheli passes through the parish, but there are no other facilities of intercourse with the neighbouring districts. The living is a rectory, with that of Llanarmon annexed, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £15. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church is a spacious structure, consisting of a nave and north aisle: in 1830 it underwent a thorough repair, the roof being raised and new windows inserted, and it is now one of the best ecclesiastical edifices in this part of the principality. There is neither glebe house nor any glebe land attached to the living. There are places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists and Presbyterians. A parochial school, in which poor children receive gratuitous instruction, is supported solely at the expense of the rector of the parish. An almshouse was founded by Sir William Williams, Bart., who endowed it with a rent-charge payable out of the estate of Pentyrch Uchâv, for six poor men, who receive £1 per quarter, with a sufficient allowance of fuel, and are nominated by Rice Thomas, Esq., of Coed Helen, heir of the founder: the buildings are at present in a very dilapidated condition, no part of the original endowment having been appropriated for keeping them in repair. The Rev. Mr. Griffith, in 1729, bequeathed a small portion of land, directing the proceeds to be annually distributed among the poor. Near the church is a fine chalybeate spring, called Fynnon-Gybi, enclosed with a stone wall, and having stone seats round it: the water was formerly in great repute for its efficacy in the cure of scorbutic complaints, and is still found beneficial in chronic cases. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £255. 18.

LLANGYBY (LLAN-GYBI), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CAR-

DIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{4}$  miles (N. N. E.) from Lampeter, on the road to Tregaron, containing 275 inhabitants. The lands are in general enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil is tolerably fertile. This place formerly constituted a prebend in the collegiate church of Llandewy-Brevi, rated in the king's books at £1. 6. 8. The living is a perpetual curacy, consolidated with that of Llanvair Clydogau, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of the Earl of Lisburne and Lord Carrington. The church, dedicated to St. Cybi, is a small edifice, consisting only of a nave and chancel. There are places of worship for Independents and Presbyterians: the latter is supposed to be the most ancient congregation of dissenters in the principality, having first assembled here about the year 1663. On a hill above the river Teivy is a large intrenchment, called Castell Goedtrêv, but nothing is known either of its origin or history: it gives name to the farm on which it is situated. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £39. 14.

LLANGYNHAVAL (LLAN-GYNHAVAL), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by E.) from Ruthin, containing 503 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynhaval, who flourished about the beginning of the seventh century, is situated in the rich and fertile Vale of Clwyd, and sheltered by the fine range of mountains which bounds it on the east. The surrounding scenery is beautifully diversified and highly picturesque, and the views over the adjacent country abound with interesting features. A very considerable portion of the parish is unenclosed and uncultivated, but of the remainder the soil is fertile and productive. The living is a discharged rectory, within the jurisdiction of the consistorial court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £15. 15., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church is a small neat whitewashed edifice, occupying a pleasant situation, but not possessing any architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. William Wynn left £5 per annum for teaching poor children of this parish. Thomas Roberts bequeathed £43, Edward Wynn £20, Strange Pedler £10, and John Doulsen £10, to the poor, which, together with some smaller benefactions, have been invested in the purchase of land, the produce of which is distributed among them. In the chain of hills by which the parish is bounded on the east, the highest, called Moel Vamma, is surmounted by a column erected to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of George III.: on the side towards the county of Flint it exhibits a remarkable volcanic appearance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £276.

LLANGYNIDER (LLAN-GYNIDR), a parish composed of the hamlets of Dyfryn and Vro, which separately maintain their own poor, in the hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. W.) from Crickhowel, containing 1440 inhabitants, of which number, 934 are in the hamlet of Dyfryn, in which the church is situated. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynyd, or Cynydr, who lived in religious seclusion in Glamorgan, in the sixth century, and in commemoration of whom a festival was annually celebrated here, on the 1st of August. In ancient records it is frequently called "Llan-Gynydd-Eglwys-Yail," from the Yail, a small stream which passed near the church; and "Llan-Gynydd-Eglwys-Vesey," from an ancient chapel, of which the ruins were formerly visible on the bank of the Crawnant, about two miles from the village. The parish, which extends from the southern bank of the river Usk to the confines of Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire, is bounded on the north by that river, which separates it from the parish of Llanvihangel-Cwm-Dû; on the south-west by the river Romney, which separates it from the parish of Gellygaer, in the county of Glamorgan; on the south by the parish of Bedwelty, in the county of Monmouth; and on the west by the parish of Llanthetty. The adjacent country is finely varied, and in many parts beautifully picturesque; and the view of the mountains by which the parish is surrounded is strikingly beautiful: among these, the lofty conical mountain called the Sugar Loaf, on the border of Monmouthshire, and the Irvol, or Hirvoel, in the adjoining parish of Llanthetty, partly clothed with larch trees of stately growth, are prominent and interesting features. The parish abounds with iron-ore, coal, and limestone. On the river Romney are some iron-works, which were formerly conducted by Messrs. Forman and Johnson, lessees under the Duke of Beaufort, and afforded employment to nearly four hundred persons: they are at present suspended, and there is no immediate prospect of their being resumed. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, extending from Pontymoile, near Pontypool, in Monmouthshire, to Brecknock, traverses the parish, and on its banks a wharf has been constructed for lime and coal; and the tram-road, commonly called the Trivel Road, communicating with the canal at Talybont, in the parish of Llanthetty, passes along the Trivel mountain in this parish, which is also traversed by the turnpike road leading from Llangattock to Brecknock. Fairs are annually held in the village, by prescriptive right, on April 20th, October 7th, December 1st, and the Wednesday before Christmas-day. The parish is within the jurisdiction of a court of requests for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5, established at Merthyr-Tydvil, by an act of the 49th of George III., for certain parishes in the counties of Brecknock, Glamorgan, and Monmouth. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £13. 14. 7., and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort. The church is a plain small edifice, without any claim to architectural notice, consisting only of a small nave and chancel, and containing no remarkable monuments: the parsonage-house was erected at the sole expense of the Rev. William Davies, the present incumbent. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. Mrs. Frances Griffiths, in 1761, bequeathed £10 in money, the interest of which is annually, on Easter-eve, divided among the poor not receiving parochial relief. Miss Prothero bequeathed £8 per annum, payable out of a farm in this parish, to be distributed on the first of January, by the minister and churchwardens, among the poor not receiving parochial relief. It is believed that a Roman vicinal road from Caerphilly to Bedwelty, and thence over Bedwelty common, upon which are manifest and unequivocal traces of a causeway, leading through the mines of Bryn Oer to Llanvrynach, in the Vale of Usk, passed along the high ridge of the Trivel-ddû mountain, in this parish. On this mountain, some years ago, was found a celt, which was in the possession of the late Archdeacon Payne. Near the source of the river Romney is a ford called Rhŷd y Milwyr, or "the soldiers' ford," but from what circumstance it obtained that appellation is altogether unknown. On the Trivel Glâs mountain is a large natural cavern, called Stabl-Vawr, or "the great stable," above which is a large heap of stones, which most probably was raised as a beacon, as, upon examination, no sepulchral deposit was found beneath it, denoting it a cairn. Tradition points out the site of an ancient castle near the high road from this place to Brecknock; but nothing of its history is recorded, and probably it was only a lodge for the residence of a forester under the lords of Tre'r Twr castle. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £357. 13.

LLANGYNIEW (LLAN-GYNYW), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of MATHRAVAL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. by W.) from Llanvair-Caereinion, containing 675 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynw, an eminent British saint, who flourished in the sixth century, and was son of Gwyn-lliw, and brother of Catwg the Wise. That it is of very remote antiquity is evident from the numerous British encampments, apparently of the very earliest character, which are scattered over the hills in various parts of the parish; and that it was either occupied by the Romans, or at least known to that people, has been conjectured on probable grounds by several writers, both from the situation and the quadrangular form of a camp in the hamlet of Mathraval, which subsequently became the seat of the ancient princes of Powys. This station, situated on the bank of the river Banwy, at no great distance from its junction with the other branch of the river Vyrnwy, and at the western extremity of the Vale of Meivod, near the turnpike road from Llanvair to Meivod, has not only been supposed to be a Roman station, but by some antiquaries has been identified with the long lost Mediolanum of the Itineraries. The reasons upon which they establish their hypothesis are, the common opinion entertained by all writers that, from the coincidence of the situation with the distances laid down in the Itineraries of Antoninus and Richard of Cirencester, the site of that station is to be looked for either in the Vale of Meivod, or in that of the Tanat; that the western part of the former of these vales must have been the spot where the ancient Watling-street and the Via Devana would intersect each other, if continued in straight lines; that there are no other remains of Roman origin near this place, which at all correspond with the distances given in the Itineraries; and lastly, the prevailing custom of the early Saxon princes of Britain, to erect their palaces on the sites of stations which had been occupied by the Romans. On the opposite side of the river, in a wood called Gwern ddû, is a circular intrenchment; and in a field beyond it is a circular mount, both which Mr. Pennant thinks were appendages to the principal station at Mathraval, which he concurs with Burton in supposing to have been the

Mediolanum of the Romans. About the latter end of the eighth century, the princes of Powys, in order to guard against the frequent incursions of Offa King of Mercia into the eastern portion of their territories, transferred the seat of their government from "Pengwern Powys," now Shrewsbury, where it had been previously established, to Mathraval in this parish, where they either built a palace, or enlarged one previously erected, which continued to be their chief residence till towards the close of the twelfth century, when Gwynwyn, son of Owain Cyveiliog, having taken "Castell Côch yn Mhowys," now Powis castle, removed the seat of government to that place. The Eisteddvdodau, or triennial assemblies of the bards and minstrels, were regularly held at Mathraval with great solemnity; and Owain Cyveiliog, who, as Prince of Powys, resided in the castle of this place, and Cynddelw Brydydd Mawr, his poet laureate, who lived at Llêchwedd-Isâv, near the banks of the Vyrnwy, both bards of the first eminence, who flourished during the middle of the twelfth century, which is considered the Augustan era of Welsh poetry, composed on those occasions some of their finest odes, of which many are preserved in the Welsh Archaeology. After the removal of the seat of government to Castle Powys, the palace of Mathraval, which was deserted by the princes of Powys, fell into the possession of Robert Vipont, a powerful baron in high favour with John King of England, who either rebuilt, or at least repaired and fortified, the ancient castle. In 1212, Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, having made an incursion into Powysland, invested the castle of this place, which, from having been recently fortified by Vipont, was strong enough to hold out against his assaults, till King John, marching from England with a considerable force to the relief of the baron, compelled Llewelyn to retire with his confederate forces; and in order to prevent any similar attempt on the part of that prince, he ordered the castle to be burnt to the ground, since which period it has been in ruins.

The parish is situated nearly in the centre of the county, and on the turnpike road leading from Oswestry to Llanvair: it is bounded on the south and west by the parish of Llanvair, and on the north and east by the Banwy and Oweddyn, or Mechan, both branches of the river Vyrnwy, which unite a little below Mathraval. It extends for nearly four miles in length, and from one mile and a half to three miles in breadth, and comprises some very extensive tracts of arable and pasture land, which are in a good state of cultivation. Nearly three-fourths of the lands are old enclosures, and the remainder was enclosed under the provisions of an act obtained in 1810, which extended also to the adjoining parish of Llanvair-Caereinion, and part of that of Castle-Caereinion. The surface is greatly undulated, rising in many places into hills of considerable elevation; and the surrounding scenery, which is strikingly diversified and picturesque, is in several parts highly enriched with woods of luxuriant growth, and enlivened by the branches of the river Vyrnwy. At Mathraval Fridd and Park are not less than three hundred and fifty acres of woodland, on which are growing some of the finest oak trees in this county, which is much celebrated for that species of timber: many of the young trees, not more than nine inches in girth at the butt, are sixty feet in height, and for cleaving are considered to be the best in the kingdom; and those of more mature growth are unrivalled in the stateliness of their appearance, forming a majestic and beautiful feature in the scenery of the place. From several of the hills, which are generally of conical form, are some noble and magnificent views over the surrounding country, comprehending the most picturesque portion of the district called Powysland; and from the summit of Penyborth, in the hamlet of Cynhinva, more especially, the view is almost boundless in extent and unequalled in grandeur. Towards the east are seen the open and fertile plains of Shropshire, as far as the high lands of Cheshire and Staffordshire, with the Wrekin, the Breiddyn, the Clee hills, and the Radnorshire range; and on the west are the lofty mountains of Plinlimmon, Cader Idris, the Arans, the Berwyn chain, and the Arenigs, with numerous other Welsh hills, among which one of the peaks of Snowdon is plainly discernible. There are several small turbaries in the parish, which formerly supplied the inhabitants with fuel, but which are now almost exhausted: they appear to have been formed from timber which, being collected in hollows, and becoming decomposed, constituted a peat soil of considerable depth. In one of these turbaries, a little to the north of the church, the pieces of timber found in a horizontal position were chiefly oak and birch; but as the surface was lowered by the removal of the peat for consumption, the stumps of trees which were found in an upright position were of fir, and, on the application of fire, easily ignited and blazed freely. From this circumstance it is evident that the fir is a species of timber of no modern date in this part of the principality, and also that turbarry water is a preservative of timber, especially of fir. The substratum of the peat soil, which is now only a few feet deep, is a shell marl of considerable depth; and between the peat and the marl is a layer of moss and sedges, apparently in their original state. On analyzing the marl, it was found to contain seven parts and one-tenth of extraneous vegetable matter, five-tenths of a part of siliceous earth, eighty-nine parts and eight-tenths of carbonate of lime, and two parts and six-tenths of waste, being a portion of water. According to this analysis, the marl, containing nearly ninety per cent. of carbonate of lime, is highly valuable as a rich calcareous manure for land, though it has not been hitherto much used for that purpose, the inhabitants having been ignorant of its quality. The branches of the river Vyrnwy still retain their wonted celebrity for various kinds of fish of very superior quality, which obtained for them the appellation "Piscosi Amnes." On the Banwy is a beautiful waterfall, near Dôlanog bridge, partly within the parish of Llanvair.

The living is a rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £5. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Cyniw, and situated at the eastern extremity of the parish, near the bank of the Banwy, is an ancient and venerable structure, in the early style of English architecture: in the interior are the remains of the ancient screen and rood-loft, embellished with some exquisite carvings in oak, and in the east window are some small remains of ancient stained glass; the ancient font, which is of large dimensions, is still preserved: in the churchyard are six venerable yew trees. There are places of worship for Independents and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A National school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children has been recently established, and is supported by subscription; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the dissenting congregations. Some small charitable donations and bequests have been made by various individuals, the produce arising from which is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. The only remains of the ancient castle of Mathraval, the supposed Roman station Mediolanum, consist of vestiges of the vast rampart of stones and earth, with a deep fosse on three sides of the quadrangular area which it occupied, the fourth side being defended by the steep eminence overhanging the river: the enclosed area is about two acres in extent, each side being about one hundred and twenty yards in length; at the north-eastern angle, which impends over the river, is a lofty exploratory mount, on which probably there may have been formerly a castelet, commanding a full view up and down the vale. Several relics of antiquity have been dug up among the ruins near this spot, among which were some tiles having protuberances at one extremity, apparently to connect them, also some silver dishes, an old sword, and some silver coins: within the area is a farm-house, situated near the mount, which, together with the greater part of the hamlet of Mathraval, belongs to the Powys estate. In the eastern part of the parish are the remains of two other encampments, forming, with Mathraval, an equilateral triangle, each of the sides of which is about a mile in length: the first of these, which are supposed to be of British origin, occupies a conical hill called Garthen, in the hamlet of Llangyniew, and appears to have been surrounded with three ramparts of earth and two fosses, enclosing a circular area seventy yards in diameter within the inner wall, and one hundred and forty yards in diameter within the outer: the other occupies the summit of a hill in Mathraval Fridd, and comprises an elliptical area conformably to the shape of the hill, seventy-two yards in the longer, and forty-four yards in the shorter, diameter; it is surrounded by two ramparts and one fosse, except on the western side, where, being less defended by the nature of the ground, it is protected by four ramparts and three fosses; the distance between the two ramparts is twenty yards, and between the additional ramparts on the western side, ten yards: both these camps occupy an elevated site, commanding an extensive view of the surrounding country. There is a very powerful spring in the parish, strongly impregnated with sulphur. The late Rev. Dr. Evans, rector of Llanymynech, and canon of St. Asaph, was born in this parish, and was buried in the church, where a marble tablet has been erected to his memory: he was a distinguished Welsh scholar and critic, and assisted Dr. Burney in writing his History of Music, and Mr. Edward Jones in his collection of Welsh airs. Among his papers was lately discovered a letter from one of his friends, requesting his literary assistance in the following terms: "A Friend of mine, of the name of Samuel Johnson, talks of writing a dictionary of the English language, and would be much obliged to you for sending a list of those English words which are derived from the Welsh." The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of this parish is £337. 8.

LLANGYNOG (LLAN-GYNOG), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. S. W.) from Builth, containing 77 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises a tract of about two thousand acres, derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynog, an eminent British saint, who suffered martyrdom about the close of the fifth century. It is situated in a dreary and mountainous district, in the northern portion of the county, and near the source of the small river Dihonwy, which falls into the Wye, near Builth: it is of small extent, and the soil is poor, producing only a little oats and barley, the farmers depending chiefly on the rearing of sheep and a few hardy cattle, for which the hilly grounds afford but inferior pasture. The Epynt hills are partly within the parish; and from their summits some extensive views are obtained over the adjacent country: the immediate neighbourhood exhibits only wild mountain scenery. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the lessee of the tithes under the prebendary of Llandarog, in the collegiate church of Brecknock. The church is a small, ancient, and mean edifice, possessing no claim to architectural notice: it stands a little eastward from the mountain road from Brecknock to Builth, on the brow of the Epynt hills, in a very bleak situation, sheltered only by some larch and fir trees, by which the churchyard is surrounded. A Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported at the expense of the incumbent. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £37. 11.

LLANGYNOG (LLAN-GYNOG), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of LLANVYLLIN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N. W.) from Llanvyllin, containing 499 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynog, the eldest of the sons of Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog, who suffered martyrdom in the fifth century, was buried at Merthyr-Cynog, in the county of Brecknock, and was canonized after his death. The village is beautifully situated in a pleasing but narrow vale, watered by the river Tanat, and sheltered by lofty mountains, in the northern part of the county, bordering upon Denbighshire, and on the turnpike road from Llanvyllin to Bala. The parish is nearly four miles in length, and the same in breadth, and comprehends a large extent of country, abounding in mineral wealth. The scenery is strikingly diversified, abounding with features of picturesque beauty, and of rugged grandeur; and the views over the adjacent country, comprising part of Denbighshire on the east, and Merionethshire on the west, from which latter the parish is separated by the fine range of the Berwyn mountains, are interesting and extensive. A very small proportion of the land is enclosed and cultivated, the remainder being a mountainous district, in which are mines of lead, quarries of slate, and other mineral works. Peat, which forms the principal fuel of the inhabitants, is found in abundance. The lead mines, which are the property of the Earl of Powys, have been worked for nearly a century, and were formerly productive of immense profit to an ancestor of the present proprietor: the ore is of the species called galena, or "potters' ore," and is found in a rake vein, extending in a direction from east-by-south to west-by-north, which is noticed by Williams, in his "Mineral Kingdom," published in 1789, as being perhaps the richest then discovered in the island: it contained in the centre a breadth of five yards of clean ore, so pure as to be immediately conveyed from the mine to the smelting-house, exclusively of a breadth of several feet on each side, which, being mixed with spar, required previous dressing to prepare it for smelting. This vein has been worked to a depth of more than ninety yards, and during a period of forty years yielded upon the average about four thousand tons of ore annually, producing to its proprietor a clear yearly revenue of £20,000. About the commencement of the present century this mine, the working of which had been for some time discontinued, owing to the influx of water, which rendered it impracticable, was leased by a company who drove a level beneath it, in order to draw off the water, and continued the working of it for some time. In the course of their operations the miners occasionally found masses of pure ore, weighing from seventy to one hundred lb. each; but, after prosecuting their labours for some time, the works were again discontinued. Within the last twelve months the old shaft has been re-opened, and nearly seven hundred tons of ore have been raised: the machinery employed in the mine is driven by a stream of water, brought from a distance of seven miles at a very considerable expense.

At Craig y Gribbin, in this parish, are some quarries of excellent blue slate, of a strong and durable quality; but, from the veins of quartz which pervade the entire mass of the rock in which they are quarried, they exhibit a rough surface; and some of the slabs contain beautiful cubes of mundic. Many thousands of these slates are annually procured for the supply of the neighbouring districts, and a considerable quantity is sent to the Montgomeryshire canal at Newbridge, near Llanymynech, for conveyance by water to more distant parts. In the rock of Llangynog, which has a lofty and almost perpendicular elevation on the north side of the village, is another quarry, from which great numbers of slates of similar quality are obtained, and are brought down the steep declivity of the rock in sledges containing about five hundred-weight each, with extreme danger to the persons employed in this arduous task. When the sledge is loaded, and drawn to the edge of the declivity, the conductor sits upon it, passing over his shoulders a rope, which is fastened at each extremity to the front, and, raising his feet from the ground, begins his descent down a narrow winding path, guiding the sledge by opposing his feet to the projecting points of the rock, which would divert it from its course, and governing its accumulating velocity by pressing firmly with his feet upon the ground, and sustaining the weight of the carriage by the rope which passes over his shoulders. Sometimes the guide, passing the rope over his shoulders as in the former case, instead of sitting upon the front of the sledge, descends backwards, and, when in danger of being overpowered by the weight and the accumulated velocity of the sledge, slipping the rope over his head, detaches himself from the carriage, and throws it sideways over the precipice, regarding only his own preservation. In either case the descent is attended with extreme danger, and the least inattention or want of dexterity, on the part of the guide, would expose him to inevitable destruction.

Fairs are annually held in the village on May 6th, August 9th, and September 3rd. The living is a discharged rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £4. 8. 11½, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is an ancient edifice, in the early style of English architecture, and is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Mr. Lewis bequeathed a small portion of land, the rental of which is annually distributed among the poor. A brass celt was found near the village, a few years ago. At Cwm Glân Avon, in this parish, near the base of a rock containing lead and copper ores and calamine, which is on the side of the valley, opposite to the lead-mine above-noticed, are great heaps of scoria, near the site of an ancient building, called Cubil; but the oldest of the miners are ignorant of their origin, which may probably be ascribed to the improvement of the science of metallurgy, which was revived in Britain during the reign of Elizabeth, when this place, among others, had assayers, who carried on the process of extracting silver from the lead with which it was intermixed. On the summit of a mountain to the north of this place is a deserted lead mine, called Craig y Mwyn, or the "cliff of ore," which appears to have been wrought at a very remote period; and within a few hundred yards of the ancient site above named is a mining level called Ogo, or "the cave," driven under a vast depth of slaty rock, which appears to have long ceased to be recognised as a work of art. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £128. 2.

LLANGYVELACH (LLAN-GYVELACH), a parish partly within the limits of the new borough of SWANSEA, and partly in the hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Swansea, comprising the hamlets of Higher Clâs, Lower Clâs, Upper Mawr, Lower Mawr, Upper Pen Derwi, Lower Pen Derwi, Upper Rhwngdwy Clydach, and Lower Rhwngdwy Clydach, each of which maintains its own poor, and containing 7753 inhabitants. About the year 990, Howel, Prince of South Wales, and his nephew Edwin, having entered the dominions of Ithel, Prince of Glamorgan, and ravaged them without mercy, were met, on their return, at a place called Cors Eineon, in this parish, by Howel, the brother of Ithel, who had suddenly raised the country in their rear: having assembled an immense multitude, armed with the first weapons they could obtain, he here routed his enemies with great slaughter, and recovered the plunder which they were carrying away. This parish, which is situated in a district abounding with mineral wealth, is more than ten miles in length, and in many parts six in breadth. Clasemont, lately the seat of Sir John Morris, Bart., has been recently taken down; and the only seat deserving notice, now within the limits of the parish, is Penllergare, the elegant residence of L. W. Dillwyn, Esq., author of some approved botanical works. The principal mineral production is coal, which is procured in great quantities, and the working of which affords employment to the greater part of the population. The copper-works, established here for the manufacture of the ore produced in other parts of the kingdom, and the collieries, are conducted by different companies on a very extensive scale, the former furnishing employment to more than one thousand five hundred, and the latter to two thousand, men. For the residence of the workmen a very considerable village has been built by Sir John Morris, on the western bank of the river Tawy, which falls into Swansea bay, and is navigable to this place for sloops of small burden: it has been designed upon a regular plan, with a view to its future improvement, from the probable increase of the works, and is called, after the name of its proprietor, Morriston. The Swansea canal intersects the parish in its course up the western bank of the Tawy. A fair is held on March 1st. The petty sessions for the hundred are held in this parish; and the Bishop of St. David's, who, as Dean of the College of Christ Church in Brecknock, is lord of the manor, holds two manorial courts here in the year.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 14. 9½, and in the patronage of the Bishop, who, as Dean of the College of Brecknock, is impropiator of the great tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Cyvelach, is a very neat and well-built structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, the former of which has been recently rebuilt: the old tower, which still remains, is detached from the present, as it was from the former, structure, standing at a short distance from the nave: in the sepulchral chapel belonging to the family of Penllergare is an elegant cenotaph of black marble, to the memory of the late — Llewellyn, Esq., of that place. The situation of parish clerk is worth from £70 to £100 per annum, arising chiefly from a charge of two shillings and sixpence upon each plough used upon every farm in the parish, and is in the gift of the Bishop of St. David's. There are in the parish four places of worship for Baptists, seven for Independents, two for Calvinistic Methodists, and one for Unitarians. Thomas Price, Esq., of Penllergare, bequeathed £2, charged on a tenement called Abergwenlas, to the poor: he also gave £2. 5. per annum for the instruction of five poor boys at the newly-erected school at Llangyvelach, and the like sum chargeable on his personal estate. Thomas Popkin, in 1751, bequeathed a rent-charge of £2, and Alexander Amyas, in 1773, the sum of £40, to the poor. Mrs. Williams of Gellygron bequeathed £2 per annum, chargeable on a tenement called Glynmarch, to a school at Gellyonon, in this parish. A school is held at Morriston, for the benefit of the children of the workmen in the different coal and copper works, by the proprietors of which it is supported. Lewis Thomas, Esq., gave a messuage and tenement called Tîr bâch, the rent of which is distributed among the poor of Upper and Lower Mawr not receiving parochial relief. A member of the family of Pen Derwi bequeathed £20, directing the interest to be distributed among the poor of the hamlet of Upper Pen Derwi. Mrs. Mary Rogers bequeathed the sum of £393. 12. 6., of which the interest is to be appropriated in clothing six poor men and six poor women, to the amount of £1 each, the residue to be given to the vicar of the parish; and Thomas Popkin, Sen., Esq., left £7. 10. per annum, charged on a tenement called Hâvod, in the parish of Bettws, in the county of Carmarthen, for distribution among the poor of Llangyvelach. Penllergare, near the western confines of the parish, is the only place besides Loughor having any claim to be regarded as the site of the Roman station Leucarum; and this consists partly in its name, which may be translated "the camp summit," and partly in the discovery of fragments of ancient walls, in a situation likely to have been chosen by the Romans for a military post. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the several hamlets of this extensive parish is £1406. 16.

LLANHAMLLËCH, or LLAN-AMLLËCH (LLAN-AMMWLCH), a parish consisting of two divisions, Lower and Upper, the latter of which constitutes the hamlet of Llêchvaen, in the hundred of PENCELly, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S.E. by E.) from Brecknock, containing 308 inhabitants. The name of this parish, signifying the "church on many flat stones," is in allusion to the strata of the rock on which that edifice is built, and the numerous fragments of slate with which the churchyard abounds. The greater portion of the parish, together with the advowson of the living, formed part of the possessions of Sir John Walbeoffe, one of the companions of Bernard Newmarch in his conquest of the ancient principality of Brecknock, and remained in the possession of the descendants of that family till it became extinct. In the reign of James I., the manor and advowson became the property of the family of Powell, in whose possession they have since continued. The parish, which comprises only about eleven hundred acres, is beautifully situated on the north bank of the river Usk, and on the great turnpike road from London to Milford, which passes through the village: on the west it is bounded by the Brÿnych brook. The lands are chiefly arable; but there are some good meadows near the Usk, which afford excellent pasturage for cattle. The soil, composed of clay and gravel, is tolerably fertile, and the inhabitants are principally employed in agricultural pursuits. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified and highly picturesque: the river, in many parts of its winding course, forms a beautiful feature in the landscape; and the distant views embrace many objects of romantic grandeur, among which are the Brecknockshire Beacons, and the Sugar Loaf and other mountains in Monmouthshire. Peterstone Court, the seat of the Rev. Thomas Powell, is a spacious and well-built mansion, near the site of the old residence of the Norman family of Walbeoffe, and situated in grounds ornamented with a stately avenue of elms, and a small group of oak trees. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal, which opens a communication from these places to Newport, and thence, by the river Severn and the Bristol channel, to most parts of the kingdom, passes through the eastern part of the parish for nearly a mile, and is carried over the river Usk, by a handsome stone aqueduct of four arches, into the parish of Llanvrynach. The Hay railway, from Brecknock to the rich agricultural districts of Herefordshire, passes through the northern part of the parish.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 8., and in the patronage of the Rev. Thomas Powell. The tithes were charged by one of the family of Walbeoffe with the payment of nine shillings annually to the priory of Malvern, which, upon the dissolution of that establishment, was paid to the crown. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, and supposed to have been originally founded by one of the Walbeoffes, was, with the exception of the old tower, rebuilt by a parochial rate in 1802: it is a neat plain edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel; the latter was formerly filled with raised tombs, which, since the rebuilding of the church, have been placed on a level with the pavement; the tower, which is embattled, is a fine specimen of the later style of English architecture, but not elaborately ornamented, and from every point of view forms an interesting and highly picturesque object. The churchyard, which is remarkably picturesque, is adorned with some fine yew trees, several of which, though of great age, are flourishing in full vigour. The parsonage-house is in a very dilapidated state, and is about to be rebuilt under the provisions of Gilbert's act: it appears to be of very ancient date, probably coeval with the settlement of the first Norman family, for, besides the Norman arches which constitute the doorways, and the stone mullions of the windows, several stones have been found in the walls, ornamented with the Norman or Saxon scrolls, and on one of them is an inscription in the Saxon character, of which the word "Meridic" is legible: attached to the living are twenty acres of glebe land. In the hamlet of Llêchvaen was formerly a chapel of ease, which fell down about a century ago, and has not been rebuilt; the central situation of the parish church, and its sufficiency of accommodation, rendering it unnecessary. The Peterstone estate is charged by Miss Walbeoffe with the annual payment of £2, which is regularly distributed among the poor of the parish; and a bequest of £3 per annum, by Miss Walbeoffe, is charged on lands in the parish of Llanvrynach, for apprenticing one child from this parish annually. On a farm called Mannest, within the parish, and crowning the summit of an eminence which overlooks the villages of Llanhamllêch, Llanvigan, and Llanvrynach, and commands a very extensive prospect over the picturesque and fertile Vale of Usk, are the remains of a kistvaen, under an aged yew tree, and surrounded with stones apparently from a dispersed cairn, under which it had been concealed for many ages: at what period it was opened is not known. It consists of three upright stones, two forming the sides, about five feet in length, and one at the end, about three feet wide: the whole height does not exceed three feet from the ground. By some writers this relic has been supposed to be of Druidical origin, and by others to be the remains of a hermit's cell: by topographers it is usually designated Tÿ Iltyd, or St. Iltyd's, hermitage. The crosses and characters appear to be nothing more than the rude efforts of pilgrims and visitors, to leave some memorial of themselves behind, by inscribing the initials of their names, and other devices, on the stones of the monument. The parish was anciently crossed by the Roman Via Julia Montana. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £113.

LLAN-HARAN, a parish in the hundred of Cowbridge, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (N. by E.) from Cowbridge, containing 313 inhabitants.

This parish is situated under the southern declivity of a ridge of hills, and abounds with mineral wealth. The neighbourhood presents much pleasing scenery, and from the high grounds are obtained extensive and interesting views of the Bristol channel, and of the adjacent country, intersected by the river Ogmere. Llanharan House, the seat of R. H. Jenkins, Esq., is a handsome mansion, pleasantly situated under the shelter of a lofty ridge of hills, with a south-eastern aspect: the grounds are richly wooded, and present an agreeable irregularity of surface, embracing also much pleasing scenery; and the upper part of the house commands extensive and interesting prospects. Llanelay, the seat of the late Mr. Vaughan, and now the property of John Edwards Vaughan, Esq., of Rheola Cwm Neath, is also in this parish. Several of the inhabitants are employed in the collieries, which are chiefly worked for the supply of the immediate vicinity: limestone is found in great quantities, and lead and iron ores have been discovered: on the estate of R. H. Jenkins, Esq., magnesian limestone in one place lies above the coal, which rises again beyond it to the south. The living is a perpetual curacy, consolidated with the rectory of Llanilid, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church is dedicated to St. Julius and St. Aaron. Mrs. Thomas, early in the last century, bequeathed £60 to the poor of this parish, of which only £15 is now available: £10 has been recently bequeathed by the late Mr. Gibbon, of Newton House, near Cowbridge, and £120 by the late Dr. Hoare, now producing £6 per annum, paid by R. H. Jenkins, Esq.: the produce arising from these bequests is annually distributed among the poor. At Llanharan House is a valuable collection of Welsh manuscripts, formed by Llewelyn Sion, an eminent bard of Glamorgan, illustrative of the system of bardism, preserved in the Gorsedd Morganwg, in which he presided in 1580. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £106.7.

LLANHARY (LLAN-ARAU), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. N. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 208 inhabitants. The lands of this parish are generally enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation: a portion of its substrata consists of coal of good quality, which is worked for the supply of the immediate neighbourhood. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. 8½., and in the patronage of Richard Hoare Jenkins, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Arau. There is a place of worship for Independents. Mr. Gibbon, of Newton House, near Cowbridge, bequeathed £10, the interest of which is annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £78. 19.

LLANHOWEL (LLAN-HOWEL), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4½ miles (E. by N.) from St. David's, containing 186 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the north-western part of the county, and nearly in the centre of a peninsula stretching into St. George's channel, and terminating in the promontory called St. David's Head. The surrounding scenery is pleasing, but not characterized by any peculiarity of feature. The living is a discharged vicarage, with that of Llandeloy annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Precentor and Upper Chapter of the cathedral church of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Hoel, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £68. 16.

LLANIDAN (LLAN-IDAN), a parish in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Bangor, containing 967 inhabitants. This extensive parish, which is situated on the western shore of the Menai strait, was in ancient times one of the principal stations of the Druids, and comprehended a large district, in which the arch-druid, the sub-druid, and other priests of that order had their residence. From this circumstance is derived the names of the several hamlets of the parish, of which Tre'r Dryw was the seat of the arch-druid; Tre'r Beirdd, that of the bards; Bôdowyr, the residence of the priests; and Bôd Drudan, the habitation of the Druids. Suetonius, who entirely destroyed the authority of these priests in Britain, is said to have landed his forces at Porthaml, not far from this place, at a spot still called Pant yr Ysgraf, or "the valley of skiffs," from his having transported his infantry across the Menai in flat-bottomed boats. Being almost immediately compelled to retreat by the insurrection under Boadicea, the Roman general was unable to make any permanent settlement here, nor have any Roman remains, either of this or a later period, been discovered, with the exception only of a few coins, which have been occasionally dug up in the neighbourhood. The lands are, with some trifling exceptions, enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation. Limestone abounds in the parish, the quarrying and burning of which affords employment to several of the inhabitants: great quantities are burnt for manure, and shipped in the Menai, to be conveyed coastwise to Liverpool and other places. At Bryn Siencyn, near the strait of the Menai, in this parish, fairs are held on March 11th, April 14th, September 13th, October 12th, and November 12th. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacies of Llanddaniel-Vab, Llanedwen, and Llanvair y Cwmwd annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of Lord Boston. The church, dedicated to St. Aidan, was originally founded in 616, and was afterwards appropriated to the convent of Bethgelart: it shared the fate of that establishment in 1535, and was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Edmund Downam and Peter Ashton, who, in 1605, sold it to Richard Prytherch of Myvyrian, whose daughter conveyed it by marriage to the Llwyds of Llugwy, on the extinction of which family it was purchased, with the rest of their estates, by Lord Uxbridge, who bequeathed it to the ancestor of the present patron. One-third of the great tithes is appropriated to the vicar. The present structure is spacious, and contains several good monuments: a curious reliquary is preserved in this church, formed of common gritstone, with a cover of the same material in the form of a dome. A stone called Maen Morddwyd, or "the stone of the thigh," to which the faculty of locomotion was anciently attributed, is said to be now built up in the wall of this church, but it is not sufficiently conspicuous to be easily distinguished. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Henry Rowlands, in 1616, bequeathed a rent-charge of £ 1. 10. on his estate of Plâs Gwŷn, besides which there are some other charitable donations and bequests for distribution among the poor: the estate of Llŷslew, bequeathed by Dr. H. Rowlands, Bishop of Bangor, for the support of his free grammar school at Bottwnog, is one of the best farms in this parish. Of the numerous Druidical and other British antiquities with which the parish abounded, and of which so exact an account has been given by the Rev. H. Rowlands, in his "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," but very few are at present in any tolerable state of preservation, and of many there are scarcely any remains. The spacious grove and temple of Tre'r Dryw are now scarcely distinguishable; and only a few of the stones which formed the sacraria are now remaining to mark out the site. Bryn Gwŷn, the grand consistory of the Druidical administration, a circular cavity one hundred and eighty feet in diameter, and surrounded originally by an immense rampart of earth and stones, has only a few upright stones left, one of which, now forming part of the gable of a dwelling-house, is twelve feet in length and of proportionate bulk. Tre'r Beirdd, "the seat of the bards," has been almost entirely demolished, the materials having been removed for building, and its site is occupied only by two small tenements. Bôdowyr contains a cromlech supported on four upright stones, in a tolerably perfect state, but the circle has been entirely removed. Trêvrŷ has only three upright stones remaining, at a great distance from each other; the foundations have been removed, and the site was levelled by the plough in 1827. Tan ben y Cevn remains in an entire state, though concealed from observation by the brambles with which it is overspread. Two upright stones only are left at Llŷslew; and of numerous others, noticed by Mr. Rowlands, not the slightest vestiges can be traced. Caer Lëb, or "the moated intrenchment," supposed by Mr. Rowlands to have been the residence of the arch-druid, is in good preservation: it forms a quadrangular area, defended by a double rampart, with a broad intervening ditch, and surrounded on the outside by a ditch of smaller dimensions: within the area are foundations of square and circular buildings. Castell Idris, built on the summit of a rock, and defended on the accessible sides by three walls in the form of a crescent, appears to be a fortress of later date, though of British origin: it is a place of great strength and in good preservation, though overgrown with brambles, and concealed by a young plantation of forest trees. The Rev. Henry Rowlands, an eminent antiquary, and author of the "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," was vicar of this parish at the time he wrote that work. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £452. 18.

LLANIDLOES (LLAN-IDLOES), a newly created borough, market town, and parish, in the upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $26\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.W.) from Welshpool, 22 (W. S. W.) from Montgomery, and 193 (W. N. W.) from London, containing 4189 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable extent, derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Idloes, an eminent British saint, who flourished about the middle of the sixth century. The town is situated in a beautiful and fertile vale, watered by the river Severn, which has its source within the parish, and almost surrounded by verdant hills of moderate elevation, of which some are crowned with thriving plantations, and others are richly cultivated. The scenery of the vale is beautifully picturesque, and the banks of the river are enlivened with some pleasant villas and handsome residences: the hills which surround the town form a rich and striking contrast to the barren heights seen in the distance, among which the great mountain of Plinlimmon, partly within the limits of this parish, forms a conspicuous and interesting feature. The town occupies a favourable site on the southern bank of the river Severn, and on the turnpike road from Shrewsbury through Newtown to Aberystwith: it consists principally of two spacious streets, intersecting each other nearly at right angles, and has of late years been greatly improved by the erection of several respectable buildings on the site of more ancient houses of timber frame-work and plaster, which formerly prevailed throughout the place, and by the removal of the numerous heaps of cinders which had previously been suffered to accumulate in front of the houses. Within the last few years a handsome stone bridge of three arches has been erected, at an expense of £3000, over the river Severn, near the place where it receives the tributary stream of the Clywedog, which, after flowing some distance through the parish, falls into the Severn at this place: the inhabitants are amply supplied with water. The approaches to the town are remarkably fine, especially that from Aberystwith, which is strikingly picturesque; and the environs abound with features of rural simplicity and romantic beauty. On the road leading from Aberystwith, having passed over a stone bridge about two miles from this town, there is a genteel farm-house, the grounds belonging to which are agreeably laid out, and are planted with a variety of fir, lime, elm, chesnut, beech, and other trees, with a beautiful trout stream passing close to the house. On the south-eastern side is a very handsome large house, now in progress of erection, which, when completed and the grounds laid out, will form an ornamental feature in the scenery of the place. A little nearer the town a beautiful house has been lately built, having handsome grounds disposed with great taste, and planted with trees, flowering shrubs, and annuals. Dôl Llŷs, in this parish, commands a delightful view of the Vale of Severn, with the windings of the river and the rich and finely varied scenery on its banks, terminated by the high mountains in the distance. Mount Severn, an elevated and truly romantic spot, overlooking that river, which, here obstructed in its course, forces its way with noisy impetuosity over immense masses of rock, commands an interesting view of the picturesque cottage of Nant y brace, embosomed in the trees which crown the opposite bank. There are some pleasing views to the south-east, and in many parts of the neighbourhood are fine prospects over the adjacent country, which is richly diversified. About two miles from the town, on the road to Trêveglwys, is a spacious pool called Llŷnebyr, extending over a surface of nearly one hundred acres, and abounding with pike, eels, and perch: it is frequented by wild fowl, and during the summer season is the resort of parties of pleasure, for whose accommodation two boats, belonging to gentlemen in the vicinity, are kept upon the pool.

The manufacture of flannel has been established from a very early period in this town, which, forty years ago, was the only place in the county where that material was made, and whence it was conveyed by packhorses to the market of Welshpool for sale. Since that period, however, it has been out rivalled by Newtown, which, within the last twenty-five years, has obtained great eminence in the production of flannel of a finer texture, but probably less durable than that of Llanidloes. The manufacture of this town has, notwithstanding, continued to increase, and there are at present more than forty carding-engines, eighteen fulling-mills, and nearly thirty-five thousand spindles constantly in operation in the town and neighbourhood, affording employment to a considerable number of men, who weave the flannel at their own dwellings. About three hundred pieces of flannel, averaging in length one hundred and fifty yards each, are manufactured here, and sent every fortnight to the market at Welshpool, held for the sale of them every alternate Thursday. A considerable trade is carried on in malt, for drying which there are several kilns, and in the town and its vicinity are also several tanneries and corn-mills. The market is held on Saturday, and is abundantly supplied with wool, grain, and provisions of every kind. The market-house, or town-hall, an ancient edifice of timber and plaster, is conveniently situated in the centre of the town: the upper story is appropriated to the use of the wool market. Fairs are held annually on the first Saturday in April, May 11th, the Saturday next preceding the 24th of June, July 17th, the last Saturday in September, and the first Friday in October and on the 28th of that month. Sheep fairs are also held every Thursday from the 26th of May to the 26th of June inclusive, which are numerous attended by the shepherds of both North and South Wales.

This town received its first charter of incorporation from John De Charlton, Lord of Powys, in the 18th of Edward III., and obtained other successive charters, of which the last was granted by John Tiptoft, Lord of Powys, in the 26th of Henry VI. Under these charters, which have been lost or destroyed by accident, the government is vested in a mayor, recorder, and an indefinite number of aldermen and burgesses, assisted by a coroner, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The mayor is elected by the burgesses annually at the court leet of the lord of the manor, in the first week after Michaelmas, and may, if he chooses to qualify, act as a magistrate within the borough, but is not ex officio a justice of the peace: the recorder is appointed by the lord of the manor, and holds his office for life. The elective franchise was granted in the 27th of Henry VIII., when Llanidloes was constituted a contributory borough to Montgomery: it exercised that privilege till the year 1728, when, together with the other contributory boroughs of Llanvyllin and Welshpool, it was disfranchised by a vote of the House of Commons, which restricted the right of election to the burgesses of Montgomery alone. This resolution of the Commons being directly at variance with a previous resolution in 1680, by which the right of election was confirmed, the burgesses, by the statute of the 28th of George III., were granted the power of asserting their right of voting for a member for Montgomery before any future committee of the House of Commons, and of making an appeal, within twelve calendar months, against any subsequent decision. The late act for amending the representation of the people has restored the franchise to this borough, in common with others in the county which had been deprived of it; and it is now one of the five which contribute with Montgomery in the return of a representative to parliament. The right of voting is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which have been greatly extended by the late Boundary Act, and are minutely detailed in the Appendix to this work, is one hundred and twenty-four. The freedom is inherited by the eldest son of a burgess, on his coming of age, and is conferred on others by the lord of the manor and a jury of burgesses at the annual court leet. Llanidloes has also been made a polling-place in the election of a parliamentary representative for the county. The county magistrates and the county coroner exercise jurisdiction within the town, and the former hold a petty session for the hundred on the first Monday in every month. A court baron for the manor of Arustley, the jurisdiction of which extends over the hundred, is held every third Monday, for the recovery of debts and determining of actions under the amount of £2, by process similar to that of the supreme courts at Westminster. The surface of the parish being hilly, and in some parts mountainous, the soil is various, though generally fertile: the lower grounds are in a good state of cultivation, and the declivities of the hills afford pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep. In 1816, an act of parliament was obtained for enclosing the common and waste lands in this vicinity, called the "Arustley Enclosure Act," under the provisions of which considerable portions of land in this parish have been enclosed, and are now under cultivation. Turf and peat, which constitute the principal fuel of the inhabitants, are procured in abundance. Lead-ore has been found in the parish, and some mines were formerly worked, but not with sufficient advantage to remunerate the adventurers, and they have consequently been discontinued: the hills abound with a coarse kind of slate, and in the vicinity are some quarries of stone of very good quality for building.

The living is a discharged vicarage, within the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £4. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Idloes, was originally founded towards the close of the fifth, or at the beginning of the sixth, century: of the original building the tower only is remaining. The present structure consists of a nave and aisle, the latter of which was built about two hundred years since, and is separated from the former by circular clustered columns, the capitals of which are decorated with palm leaves, and by finely pointed arches: the roof of the nave is of carved oak, ornamented with figures of cherubim holding shields charged with armorial bearings, exquisitely carved. According to tradition these were removed hither from the abbey of Cwm Hîr, in the county of Radnor, and the date upon one of the shields (1542) corresponds with the time of the dissolution of that abbey. An elegant screen from the same monastery formerly separated the chancel from the nave, but it was removed in 1816, when the chancel and south wall were rebuilt, and has not been restored. At the same time the church was new pewed, the expense of both having amounted to £1600: a new set of bells was also hung in the tower, in 1825, at an expense of £200. There are places of worship for Baptists, the Society of Friends, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, all neatly and appropriately fitted up. A parochial school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is supported by subscription; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Jenkin Bowen bequeathed certain portions of land; Evan Glynn gave a rent-charge of £2. 10; Dr. David Lloyd, a rent-charge of £12. 12; and Catherine, wife of Edward Lloyd, gave £100, which has been laid out in the purchase of land, the produce arising from which several benefactions is annually distributed among the poor, according to the directions of the testators.

Within the limits of the parish is partly included the lofty mountain of Plinlimmon, or, more properly, Pumlumon, "the five-peaked mountain," which is the highest in the several chains of which it forms the centre; and from this place the ascent to its summit is usually made. The sides and summit are, like the adjacent hills, entirely destitute of wood, and present a barren and gloomy aspect: the summit is formed of two small heads, on each of which is a carnedd, of which that on the highest peak is pyramidal, and was perhaps intended as a beacon. Scattered around are patches of coarse grass, intermixed with heaps of loose stones and fragments of rock in the wildest confusion. From the highest points, which are frequented by numerous birds, such as herons, cranes, snipes, ravens, and plovers, is obtained a fine prospect of vast extent, comprehending on the south the hills of Cardiganshire and Radnorshire, on the west Cardigan bay and St. George's channel, on the north Cader Idris, and part of the Snowdon range of mountains, separating the counties of Carnarvon and Merioneth; on the north-east the Breiddyn hills in Montgomeryshire, and on the east part of the counties of Hereford and Salop. This mountain derives a considerable degree of interest from its giving rise to the rivers Severn, Wye, Rheidiol, and Llynant, of which the first is secondary only to the Thames in commercial importance, while the Wye and the Rheidiol surpass all other rivers in Britain for the picturesque beauty of their scenery. The Severn, here called by its ancient British name of Havren, rises on the northern side of the mountain, in a strong chalybeate spring, and is quickly joined and increased by numerous other springs rising near its source, and by several mountain torrents, before it reaches the town of Lanidloes. The Wye rises from two powerful springs on the south-eastern side of the mountain, and, after a long circuitous course, falls into the Severn below Chepstow. The Rheidiol has its source in a pool called Llŷn Llygad Rheidiol, and falls into the Irish sea at Aberystwith; and the Llynant issues from a pool called Glâs Llŷn. At Melin Velindre, on the route to Plinlim-

mon, is a romantic cataract; and near a sheep farm called Blaen Havren the Severn rolls its waters over a lofty ledge of slate rocks, in which they have formed gullies of various picturesque shapes. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of this parish amounts to £2056. 9.

LLANIESTYN (LLAN-IESTYN), a parish partly in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, and partly within the liberties of the borough of BEAUMARIS, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by N.) from Beaumaris, containing 313 inhabitants, of which number, 135 are in the former, and 178 in the latter, portion. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Iestyn, by whom it was founded towards the close of the sixth century. It is situated nearly in the centre of the promontory which separates Beaumaris Roads from the Irish sea, and comprises a small tract of land, the greater part of which is enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is distinguished by features rather of a bold than pleasing character; and the country adjacent is studded with eminences of considerable elevation. The distant views are interesting and extensive, reaching over the Menai strait on the south, and the Irish sea to the north. The living is a vicarage not in charge, with the perpetual curacies of Llangoed and Llanvihangel-Din-Sylwy annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Rev. Robert J. Hughes. The church, originally founded by St. Iestyn, at the close of the sixth century, was granted in 1243, by Prince Llewelyn, to the priory which he had recently founded at Llanvaes, to which establishment it belonged at the dissolution. Of the ancient church there are no other remains than the tomb of the founder, which has been carefully preserved, and is now deposited in the present church, a neat edifice of modern erection. This ancient monument is of curious workmanship, and is decorated with a figure of the saint in sacerdotal vestments, having a pastoral staff in the right hand and an open scroll in the left: round the waist is a broad girdle, from which hangs a cord and tassel similar to that worn by the monastic order of St. Francis. On the scroll is a mutilated inscription in ancient characters, which has been variously read by different antiquaries, and of which the following is the tenour, as given by the Hon. Daines Barrington, and adopted by Mr. Pennant: Hic jacet Sanctus Yestinus, cui Gwenllian, Filia Madoc et Gryffyt ap Gwilym, optulit in oblacoem istam imaginem p. salute animarum s." The inscription, however, is at present so much defaced, and so many of the characters obliterated, as to render it very difficult, if not impossible, to decypher it with any degree of accuracy. This monument is noticed by Rowlands, in his "Mona Antiqua Restaurata," and an account of it was read before the Society of Antiquaries, in 1776, and published in the fifth volume of the Archæologia. The income arising from a few small charitable donations and bequests, which have been vested in the purchase of land, producing a trifling rental, is annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £72.

LLANIESTYN (LLAN-IESTYN), a parish principally in the hundred of DINLLAEN, but partly in that of GAFLOGION, in the Lleyn division of the county of

CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W. by S.) from Pwllheli, containing 1115 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated at the head of a small valley opening towards the south, near the south-western extremity of the county, almost in the centre of the great headland which separates the bay of Carnarvon from that of Cardigan, and comprehends an extensive tract of arable and pasture land. The village is seated at the base of Carn Madryn, a lofty, barren, isolated hill, which was formerly one of the strong holds of Roderic and Maelgwyn, sons of Owain Gwynedd, to whom this part of the principality belonged. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and the distant views combine many features of interesting character and picturesque beauty. In the mountainous part of the parish are some appearances of lead-ore and nikel, but the veins are not of sufficient extent to promise remuneration to the mining adventurer, and no works have been yet opened. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Bôdverin, Llandegwining, and Penllêch annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £21.3.9., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Iestyn, is a spacious and handsome structure, partly in the later Norman, and partly in the early English style of architecture, consisting of a nave, south aisle, and chancel. The aisle is separated from the nave by a range of pentagonal pillars and circular arches, and is lighted by a series of elegant lancet-shaped windows; and some fragments still remain of the exquisitely carved oak screen which separated the chancel from the nave. The pulpit and the reading desk are singularly placed, the former being attached to the northern, and the latter to the southern, wall. There are two places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one for Presbyterians. The rental of a tenement bequeathed by Mr. Roger Jones, and now producing £13 per annum, is distributed among the poor of this parish at Christmas. The whole summit of Carn Madryn was anciently surrounded by a wall, still traceable in its whole circuit, and remaining in some parts to the height of several feet: within the area are foundations of circular buildings, and near the base of the mountain are the remains of numerous circular and quadrilateral buildings, of which the walls are in many instances tolerably perfect. The upper part of the mountain is supposed to have been occupied by the chieftains during their sojourn in this strong hold, and the base by their vassals and subsidiary forces, who during times of invasion came hither with their cattle for security. Cevn Amwlch, in this parish, at present the residence of C. G. Wynne, Esq., is said to have been the birthplace of Bishop Griffith. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £272.

LLANIGON (LLAN-IGON), a parish comprising the hamlet of Glynvâch, which separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of Talgarth, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (S. S. W.) from Hay, and containing 545 inhabitants, of which number, 478 are in the body of the parish, and the rest in Glynvâch. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church either to Eigen, a female saint, or to Eigion, the son of Caw, a saint who flourished in the sixth centure, is situated on the turnpike road leading from Hay to Talgarth, and comprises a considerable tract of land, of which the greater portion is arable, though much consists of excellent meadows in the valleys, and of elevated commons. The surface is finely varied; and the soil, though in some parts of the parish of a rocky nature, in the lower districts is tolerably fertile, affording good crops of grain and excellent pasturage for cattle and sheep, upon the rearing of which the farmers principally depend: one of the chief manures employed here is lime burned on the hills above. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in many parts beautifully picturesque; some of the vales and hills are richly clothed with wood; and the distant views are strikingly distinguished by features of grandeur and magnificence. Llanthomas, an ancient mansion in this parish, was occupied, during the reign of Henry VIII., by Walter Devereux, Earl Ferrers, Lord Chief Justice of South Wales, and in the following reign by William Thomas, one of the clerks of the council, and the principal instructor of the young King Edward VI., and who, in the reign of Mary, was arraigned and executed for treason. It is now the property of Thynne Howe Gwynne, Esq., and has been modernized with great taste, forming a handsome and prominent object in the scenery of the village, close to which it is situated. Upon a high bank to the south-east of the church is Penyrwrlodd, now a farm-house, originally built in 1651 by William Watkins, an active partisan and an officer in the army of the parliament during the reign of Charles I., and one of the principal agents of the propagators of the gospel in South Wales. In this mansion, in which he resided till his death, he left a great number of coats of mail and other armour, which were preserved here till the middle of the last century. From the grounds, and more especially from the well-wooded hill immediately above the house, is obtained one of the most magnificent views in South Wales, for grandeur, richness, and variety of picturesque beauty: in this splendid prospect are combined features of the most interesting and romantic character: hills of varied elevation and of diversified aspect recede in long succession towards the town of Brecknock, beyond which towers the majestic chain of the Beacons; and on the declivity of a barren hill, at the distance of seven or eight miles, the white-washed village of Llanvilo forms a conspicuous object. On the west and north-west are seen Maeslough castle, with the beautiful grounds by which it is surrounded; the numerous villas that enrich the scenery about Glâsbury; and the graceful windings of the river Wye, which, after a devious course through a tract of highly picturesque country, is at length lost among the majestic woods of Llangoed. Some small veins of lead-ore have been discovered at various times in the hilly parts of the parish, but not of sufficient value or extent to justify the establishment of any permanent works. The tram-road from Brecknock to Hay and Kington passes within little more than a mile of the village. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7.12.8½., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales: it is endowed with one-half of the great tithes, and the other half belongs to Viscount Hereford, who is lay rector. The church is a spacious and lofty edifice, though not distinguished by any architectural details of importance, and is situated on a gentle eminence, sheltered on one side by the hill above Penyrwrlodd, and on the other by an abrupt eminence called Wenallt: the belfry, containing three bells, is a kind of loft over the porch. In the hamlet of Glynvâch is a chapel, called Capel y fin, or the chapel of the boundary, which has been rebuilt within the last few years. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Lewis Watkins, in 1712, gave an estate in this parish, called Caer Bwla, now producing from £10 to £12 per annum, for the endowment of a free school, which is held in the chancel of the church, but only occasionally, by a master who regularly receives the rents. There is also a Sunday school, supported by subscription. Of the antiquities with which it has been said this parish formerly abounded there are but very few remains: on the hills are some circular intrenchments; and near the spot where the counties of Brecknock, Hereford, and Monmouth unite is a large barrow, called Twyn y Beddau, or the "Mound of the Graves," two hundred and seventy feet in circumference, and twelve feet high, which is supposed to have been raised to commemorate some battle fought here, and also as a place of interment for the warriors who fell in the conflict. In the hamlet of Cilônw, a little to the south-west of the village, are the ruins of an old chapel, said to have been dedicated to Celin, an eminent British saint, who flourished in the sixth century, from which circumstance the hamlet derived its name. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor, exclusively of the hamlet of Glynvâch, is £238. 17.

LLANILAR (LLAN-ILAR), a parish consisting of the Upper and Lower divisions, each separately maintaining its poor, in the upper division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 994 inhabitants, of which number, 482 are in the Upper, and 512 in the Lower, division. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated on the southern bank of the river Ystwyth, and near the high road from Aberystwith to Cardigan. Part of it is hilly, though some is flat and liable to be flooded: the soil is in general shallow and dry, but produces good crops of corn, hay, &c. The surrounding scenery is in some parts pleasingly varied: within the parish are situated Birch Grove, the seat of Lord Vaughan, and Castle Hill, that of J. N. Williams, Esq. Fairs are held on March 14th, May 13th, July 8th, and November 14th. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Hilary, and pleasantly situated on the bank of the river, near Aberystwith, is a low ancient structure in good repair, with a square massive tower at the west end: the body consists of a nave and chancel, formerly separated by an ancient carved screen of elegant design, which has been recently removed. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. Richard Jones, of the parish of St. Clement Danes, London, bequeathed £300 Bank Annuities, the dividends on which he directed to be paid to a proper person, being a member of the established church, for teaching six poor boys and six poor girls of this parish English, writing, and arithmetic: the same benefactor also left the interest of £200 to be distributed among the poor. The Rev. Mr. Edwards gave £40; the vicar of Marston upon Dove, in the county of Derby, in 1761, bequeathed £30; and, about the year 1756, Jenkin Philip gave £10, the interest of which sums is annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £248. 4.

LLANILID (LLAN-ILID), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Cowbridge, containing 119 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Ilid, an Israelite, who, having embraced Christianity, is said to have accompanied Brân ab Llŷr, the deposed prince of Siluria, from Rome, about the year 70, for the purpose of introducing the Christian faith into Britain. The parish is situated under the lofty ridge which extends from east to west through the county, and on the east bank of the river Ewenny, which has its source in the vicinity, and joins the Ogmore near its influx into the Bristol channel. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and the higher grounds command some fine views over the channel and the adjacent country. The land is all enclosed, and by far the greater part is in a state of good cultivation. Coal abounds in the parish, and in the northern part of it have been discovered some strata, which are about to be worked. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llanharan consolidated, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £7. 15. 7½., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is an ancient edifice, possessing no architectural claims to notice. Mr. Charles Price, about the year 1703, bequeathed £50; and Mr. William Thomas, in 1737, bequeathed £10, the interest of which, together with that of several smaller benefactions, amounting in the whole to about £120, is annually distributed among the poor. At the distance of about thirty yards to the north of the church are the remains of an ancient encampment, of which neither the origin nor the history is known. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £90. 12.

LLANILTERNE, or CHAPEL ILTERNE (LLAN-ILLTEYRN), a parochial chapelry in the hundred of DINAS POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the road from Cardiff to Llantrissant, 6 miles (W. N. W.) from Cardiff, containing 149 inhabitants. It is stated to have been separated from the parish of St. Fagan about the reign of Queen Elizabeth; but the inhabitants still contribute one-third to the repairs of the church and bridge of that parish. The living is consolidated with the rectory of St. Fagan's, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The chapel, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is a very small building, with a curious inscription, not wholly legible, at the south-western angle of the exterior wall, said to be to the memory of the wife of the renowned King Arthur. There is a place of worship for Independents. At Llanvairvawr, an ancient farm-house belonging to the Earl of Plymouth, lately destroyed by fire, are the ruins of a religious house, founded about the year 508, by St. Illtyd, as "a place for education in human learning, as well as religion:" the chapel is entire, and has been converted into a barn. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £157. 13.

LLANINA (LLAN-INA), a parish in the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (N. W. by W.) from Lampeter, containing 474 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shore of Cardigan bay, by which it is bounded on the south and south-east, and is intersected by a small river, which, formed by the union of two streams to the south of the parish, pursues a northerly course and falls into the bay of Cardigan, near the small harbour of New Quay. The lands are mostly enclosed and in a tolerable state of cultivation; the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and in some parts enriched with thriving timber; and the views, extending over the open bay, are not destitute of interest. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llanarth, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church, a neat edifice lately erected, is situated near the shore of the bay, at the extremity of a well-wooded dingle: it is dedicated to St. Ina, King of the West Saxons, who, devoting his life to religious pursuits, resigned the government of his kingdom to his kinsman Ethelred, and went on a pilgrimage to Rome; having passed the remainder of his life in retirement, he was canonized after his death. This parish contributes to defray a portion of the expenses of that of Llanllwchairn. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £82.

LLANIO, a township in the parish of LLANDEWY-BREVI, lower division of the hundred of PENARTH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. E.) from Lampeter, containing 125 inhabitants. It is traversed by the high road between Trêgaron and Lampeter, which passes along the vale of the Teivy, and contains so many remains of Roman antiquity, as leave no doubt of its having once contained a station of that people. The site of the Roman Loventium is placed by antiquaries between the right bank of the Teivy and the road, at a place still called Caer Castell, where numerous vestiges of foundations are discernible, and whence the Roman Via Occidentalis, or, as it has subsequently been termed, Sarn Helen, branched off in a northerly and a south-westerly direction. Three inscribed stones are still preserved, two of them built in the walls of two cottages, and the third, on which can be traced the words Cohors Secunda Augustæ Fecit Quinque Passus, (affording evidence that a cohort of the second Augustan legion erected a certain portion of the walls,) is used as a seat in the porch of one of them. One of the other stones is placed over the chimney, and is inscribed OVERIONT; and on the third, which is inserted in the wall, near the door of the second cottage, can be decyphered Caii Artii manibus (or memoria) Ennius Primus. Other vestiges of this people have been discovered in the neighbourhood at various times, such as coins, domestic utensils, bricks, &c., and on one occasion a large piece of unwrought lead. This township is divided into the Higher and Lower portions, and is separately assessed for the maintenance of its own poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £33. 15.

LLANISHEN (LLAN-ISAN), a parish in the hundred of KIBBOR, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, on the road from Cardiff to Caerphilly,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Cardiff, containing 393 inhabitants. Llanishen

House, now fallen to decay, was, for more than the last two centuries, the seat of the family of Lewis: it formerly belonged to the Vaughans, the heiress of which family was married to a younger son of the Lewises of the Vann, ancestors of the Earl of Plymouth. New House, the property of John Lewis, Esq., of the same family, is a handsome modern seat, pleasantly situated at the southern foot of a lofty ridge of hills running in a direction from east to west in this part of the county. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Earl of Plymouth and C. K. Kemeys Tynte, Esq., alternately. The church, dedicated to St. Isan, is a neat structure, in the English style of architecture. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In 1728, Mary Lewis gave by deed a rent-charge of £23, for teaching and apprenticing poor children of this parish and of the parish of Lisvane. Edward Morgan, by will in 1669, assigned a rent-charge of £2. 12., to be distributed in bread among the poor; and Thomas Lewis, Esq., in 1785, gave one of £4 to the paupers in the workhouse of this parish. According to Leland, Richard William, otherwise Cromwell, afterwards Earl of Essex, who was beheaded by order of Henry VIII., was born at the mansion of New House; but this circumstance is doubtful. The water of a spring, called St. Dene's Well, is considered efficacious in the cure of scorbutic complaints. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £291. 11.

LLANKILKEN, a township in the parish of KILKEN, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by N.) from Mold, containing 340 inhabitants. This township, in which the parish church stands, is situated in a valley surrounded by lofty hills, one of which, the stupendous Moel Vamma, separates it on the west and south from the Vale of Clwyd, which can only be approached from this place by the elevated passes in the mountains.

LLANLLAWDDOG (LLAN-LLAWDDOG), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. E. by N.) from Carmarthen, containing 770 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Llawddog, an eminent British saint, who flourished in the early part of the sixth century, is pleasantly situated nearly in the centre of the county, and upon the great turnpike road leading from Carmarthen to Lampeter: it comprises a very extensive tract of land, of which a considerable proportion is open and uncultivated. The surrounding country, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of feature, is agreeably diversified with hill and vale, in some of the latter of which are some interesting combinations of rural and picturesque beauty. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Aberguilly. The church, which is not remarkable for any architectural details, was formerly dependent upon that of Aberguilly, and annexed to it, but was separated from it by act of parliament. John David bequeathed a rent-charge of £1, and there are some smaller charitable donations and bequests, for distribution among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £242. 1.

LLANLLAWER (LLAN-LLAWEN), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Fishguard, containing 123 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the northern part of the county, and on the river Gwyn, which falls into Fishguard bay: it is only of small extent, and nearly one-third is mountainous, the remainder being enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, combining features of picturesque beauty with mountains of rugged aspect; and the distant views extend over a remarkably interesting tract of country. Court House, in this parish, the seat of Mrs. Gwynne, is a good family mansion, occupying a pleasant situation. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to that of Llanerchllwydog, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church is not remarkable for any architectural details. On the side of Llanllawer mountain, which terminates in a rocky point, and is hence called the Maiden's Breast, numerous Druidical relics and carneddau are profusely scattered, which are supposed to have been places of ancient sepulture; and adjoining is a mineral well, formerly in high repute for its efficacy in the cure of ague and other diseases, but now neglected. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £38. 9.

LLANLLÊCHID (LLAN-LLÊCHID), a parish comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD UCHÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E.) from Bangor, on the great road from London to Holyhead, containing 3075 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Llechid, an eminent female saint, who flourished in the beginning of the sixth century: it extends nearly thirteen miles in length, and three miles in breadth, and comprises a tract of about eighteen thousand acres, of which comparatively but a small portion is enclosed and cultivated. The surface is boldly undulated, and the houses of the inhabitants, scattered widely over the parish, have, from the diversity of their situations, a pleasing effect in its scenery, some of which is of a finely mountainous character, the parish comprising within its limits the lofty mountains of Carnedd Llewelyn and Carnedd Davydd, the former of which attains an elevation of three thousand four hundred and sixty-nine, and the latter of three thousand four hundred and twenty-seven, feet above the level of the sea. On the summit of each of these mountains, which form pre-eminent features in the surrounding scenery, are large heaps of loose stones, supposed to be the remains of ancient fortifications, raised respectively by the princes from whom they take their name. According to Geoffrey of Monmouth, a giant named Rhita was buried on the summit of Carnedd Llewelyn, which may not improbably have been the place of sepulture of some valiant chieftain, whose name has not been recorded. Near the base of this mountain is Fynnon Llugwy, a fine lake covering a surface of many acres, the source of the river Llugwy, which, after traversing part of this parish, falls into the Conway, near Bettws. The village of Llanllêchid is pleasantly situated in a fine open plain, in the north-western part of the parish; but the greater portion of the poorer inhabitants reside in the hamlet of Pant y Vriddlas, near the adjacent slate quarries of Penrhyn, in which they find employment. Several attempts have been made to procure slates in this parish, and some quarries have been opened for that purpose near the church; but the undertaking has not been carried on to any profitable extent, and the quarries are worked only on a very limited scale, affording but little employment to the poor of the parish, in comparison with the quarries of Penrhyn. The road from London to Holyhead runs for twelve miles through the parish, and that from Liverpool to the same place for about three miles, affording excellent facilities of communication with the neighbouring districts. A fair is held on October 29th; and at Talybont, a large village in the parish, others are held on May 7th, and August 11th.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £15. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor: the rector receives all the great tithes of the parish, except that of hay, for which a small modus is taken. The church is a long, low, ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a small chapel or oratory on the south side. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school was founded here in 1719, by the Rev. John Jones, Dean of Bangor, who endowed it with £100 for teaching twelve poor children of the parish to read the Welsh language. A National school was established in 1828, for which a school-house was built by subscription among the inhabitants, aided by a grant of £30 from the parent society in London. This school, in which sixty children of both sexes receive gratuitous instruction, is supported partly by subscription, and partly by the endowment given to the parochial school by Dean Jones, which, since its establishment, has been appropriated to its support. Dr. Williams, Bishop of Ossory, in 1672, bequeathed an estate in this parish, called Plâs Hwva, to the poor, directing its produce to be distributed at the discretion of the rector: the farm produces a rental of £13, exclusively of some land, whereon six dwelling-houses have been built, among the occupants of which the rent of the farm is annually distributed in food and clothing, according to the will of the testator. William Griffith bequeathed a rent-charge of £2. 16., and Robert and Catherine George the sum of £50, the former, as well as the interest of the latter, to be distributed in bread to the poor; Gwen Fletcher bequeathed £60, the interest to be distributed in articles of clothing among six of the poorest aged females in the parish; and Maurice Prichard and Pierce Williams £5 each, the interest of the former to be given to the poorest person in the Upper, and that of the latter to the poorest person in the Lower, division of the parish. Dr. Williams, Bishop of Ossory, was a native of this place; and Dr. John Williams, Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, and Archbishop of York, in the reign of Charles I., resided at Côchwillan, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £464. 16.

LLANLLEONVEL (LLNA - LLEON - VOEL), a parish, comprising the hamlet of Llanlleonvel, and a portion of that of Gwraig, each of which separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of

BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by S.) from Builth, and containing 226 inhabitants, of which number, 148 are in the township of Llanlleonvel. This parish, the name of which signifies the "church of Lleon the Bald," is situated in a hilly district in the north-western portion of the county, and on the rivers Irvon and Dulas, over which are three bridges within the parish, which are kept in repair at the expense of the hundred. The manor within which the parish is included is co-extensive with the hundred, and is distinguished for the prevalence of several peculiar customs, the origin of which is very obscure, and for certain singular payments. Of these latter the principal are the "Taldiestyn," the "Comortha," the "Vuwch Larder," the "Porthant herwyr," the "Maccwyn," and the "Mabryddiaeth," the two last of which are altogether inexplicable. From these payments certain inhabitants of the hundred are exempt: there are no copyhold tenures in the manor, and the chief-rents are collected for the lord by the officers of the parish. A presentment by a jury in 1646, of which Rees Gwyn, Esq., father of Marmaduke Gwyn, the Judge, was foreman, states the custom of the lordship to be, that no man's son dwelling within the lordship ought to be summoned to do fealty within the said court during the life of his father, if his father be seized of lands within the lordship. The parish comprises a considerable portion of arable and meadow land, the whole of which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, with the exception only of some of the hills, which afford good pasturage for sheep. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and enlivened by the windings of the rivers by which the parish is intersected; and the distant views, though not very extensive, from the obstruction of the mountainous elevations by which this part of the county is almost encircled, are, notwithstanding, interesting and diversified. The woollen manufacture is carried on in the village upon a very limited scale, affording employment only to a small number of persons. Baronial courts continue to be held at an inn in the village, called Maes-cevny-fordd.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of David Thomas and Rees Morgan, Esqrs., as lessees of the tithes under the prebendary of Llanwrthwl in the collegiate church of Brecknock: there is neither parsonage-house nor any glebe land attached to the living. The church, the dedication of which is unknown, is a small edifice, undistinguished by any architectural details, but pleasantly situated on a gentle eminence on the north-western bank of the river Dulas, about a mile to the north of the high road from Builth to Llandovery. There is a place of worship for Independents. A branch of the Sarn Lleon passed through this parish, connecting Maridunum, at Carmarthen, with the Roman station at Cwm in Radnorshire, and uniting at the latter place with the great Roman road which anciently led from Nidus at Neath, to Deva, now Chester. On an eminence opposite to the church is an ancient mansion, formerly the residence of the family of Gwyn, or Gwynne, of Garth, and now the property of E. F. Maitland, Esq. In a field below the church, and at no great distance from the river Dulas, is a mineral spring, resembling in taste and smell the water at Llanwrtyd, but not so strongly impregnated with sulphur. The poor of the two townships are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £64. 5., of which sum, £41. 16., is raised on the hamlet of Llanlleonvel.

LLANLLIBIO (LLAN-LLIBIO), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (E.) from Bodedern, containing 88 inhabitants. This parish, which takes its name from the patron saint to whom its church was dedicated, is situated near the old line of road from London to Holyhead, and consists entirely of a few farms, the produce of which, owing to the poor argillaceous quality of the soil, is chiefly oats, with a very small portion of wheat and barley. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llantrisant, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, which has been for many years desecrated, and suffered to fall into decay, has now entirely disappeared; and the churchyard has been ploughed up: the present rector has, notwithstanding, marked out the ancient boundaries of the churchyard, and has it in contemplation to rebuild the church. The inhabitants at present attend divine service in the church of Bodedern; but all ecclesiastical rites are performed at Llantrisant. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £38. 12.

LLANLLIGAN, or LLANLLUGAN (LLAN-LLUGAN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Llanvair, containing 361 inhabitants. This place is distinguished as the site of an ancient Cistercian nunnery, which, according to Bishop Tanner, was founded here prior to the year 1239, at which time the tithes of the parish of Llanvair Caereinion were given by Bishop Hugh to the "nuns of Llanllugan in Powys," to whom also the tithes of the parishes of Llanllwchaearn and Bettws were subsequently appropriated by Anian, Bishop of St. Asaph, in 1265. This establishment, of which the founder is not known, had, at the dissolution, a revenue estimated at £22. 13. 8.: the site was granted, in the 37th of Henry VIII., to Sir Arthur D'Arcy, Knt.: the only remains are some fragments of painted glass in the chancel window of the parish church. This parish, which is nearly in the centre of the county, is intersected by the small river Rhiw, which has its source in the immediate vicinity, and, after passing by the village, pursues its course in an easterly direction, and falls into the Severn at Berriew. It is about three miles in length, and a mile and a half in breadth, and a very large proportion of it is unenclosed and uncultivated. The surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified, and in some parts highly picturesque; and the views over the adjacent country embrace many interesting features. The road from Welshpool and Llanvair passes through the parish by Cevn Côch, to meet that from Newtown and Machynlleth, at Talerddig, in the parish of Llanbryn-mair. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Lord of the Manor, and other impropriators, who are owners of land in the parish. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated on the bank of the river Rhiw, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture. About a mile to the south-west of Cevn Côch, and to the right of the road from Newtown and Machynlleth, are the remains of a Druidical circle. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £131. 7.

LLANLLUAN (LLAN-LLWYN), a joint hamlet with Trê Castell, in the parish of LLANARTHNEY, hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $9\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. S. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. It lies near the northern declivity of the Mynydd Mawr mountain, and takes its name from an ancient chapel which formerly existed here.

LLANLLWCHAIARN (LLAN-LLWCHAIARN), a parish partly in the newly created borough, and partly in the upper division of the hundred, of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (N. E.) from Newtown, containing 2005 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the bank of the river Severn, over which is a stone bridge of three arches, completed in the year 1827, at an expense of £4000, which was defrayed by the county, and connecting those parts of the parish which are called Pen y gloddfa, Frankwell, and the Basin, with the town of Newtown, of which they are almost considered as forming part. This quarter of the parish has very much increased in population during the last seven years, within which period no fewer than three hundred houses, including several factories, have been erected. The manufacture of flannel is carried on to a very great extent, affording employment to a considerable portion of the inhabitants. The lands, about four thousand four hundred acres in extent, are all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. An act was obtained, in the 36th of George III., for enclosing the waste lands within the manors of Cedowain, Hopton, and Over Gorddwr, under the provisions of which about nine hundred acres were allotted to this parish, in 1824, and enclosed. The Montgomeryshire canal was extended, in 1819, from Garthmill to this parish, in which it terminates near Newtown: the basin, with the wharfs, lime-kilns, and other works connected with that line of navigation, is within its limits. The road from Welshpool to Newtown passes by it on the south, and that from Newtown to Machynlleth on the west. That part of the parish which is comprised within the boundaries of the new contributory borough of Newtown consists of the townships of Gwestydd and Hêndidley. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £7. 7. 6., endowed with the great tithes, which formerly belonged to Llanllugan nunnery, and with £100 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Llŵchaiarn, who flourished at the commencement of the seventh century, was erected on the site of the ancient structure, in the year 1816, at an expense of £1200: it is a neat edifice of brick, with a tower of the same materials, surmounted with pinnacles: the interior is neatly fitted up. Mr. Thomas Austin gave a rent-charge of £1; Mr. Richard Mytton, the sum of £40; and Mr. John Hughes £5; the produce of all which is annually distributed in bread to the poor. To the south of the turnpike road from Newtown to Welshpool are vestiges of a Roman road, which anciently communicated with Caer-Sws and the Gaer near Montgomery. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £573. 9.

LLANLLWCHAIARN (LLAN-LLWCHAIARN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 17 miles (N. W. by W.) from Lampeter, containing 1178 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of Cardigan bay, derives its name from the dedication of its church, and, from its advantageous maritime position, has risen into some degree of notice, and is rapidly increasing in population and importance. Soles, turbot, and oysters are found in great abundance and of superior quality on this part of the coast, and a herring fishery might be advantageously established here, if an adequate demand existed. The trade of the place has already increased so much as to give rise to the establishment of the small port of New Quay (described under its own head), which has already attained a considerable degree of celebrity, and maintains a regular intercourse with Bristol. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 7. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Llŵchaiarn, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, which are separated by a pointed arch: the font, which is of great antiquity, is square, and ornamented at each angle with a human head; and in the churchyard are the remains of a stone cross. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A small Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of the poor is supported by subscription. There are some trifling vestiges of an ancient earthwork, called Pencastell, in this parish. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £338. 1.

LLANLLWNY (LLAN-LLAWNŴY), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of CATHNOC, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. W.) from Lampeter, containing 848 inhabitants. The name of this parish is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Llonio, one of the congregation of St. Illtyd, an eminent preacher of Christianity, who flourished in the fifth century. It is pleasantly situated on the southern bank of the river Teivy, by which it is separated from the county of Cardigan, and is intersected by the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Lampeter: the land is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, and the soil in most parts is fertile: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and the distant views extend over a country abounding with picturesque beauty. Maes Criggie, an ancient family seat, now the property of Bowen Davies, Esq., forms an interesting feature in the scenery of the parish; and Perthyerllan, the residence of George Saunders, Esq., is agreeably situated under the shelter of some thriving plantations, on the edge of an extensive common. The living is a discharged vicarage, with Llanvihangel Rhôyscorn annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church is romantically situated on a rocky eminence overlooking the river Teivy, which flows at its base, and commanding a fine view of some interesting and picturesque scenery. There is a place of worship for Independents. A school-room has been erected by subscription, which is occasionally appropriated to the use of one of the Welsh circulating charity schools. On a farm called Maes Nonny, or the "Nuns' Field," in this parish, it is said there was anciently a nunnery, but nothing is known either of its foundation or its history. A tumulus, called Y Castell, still remains on this farm; and near it is a spring, called Fynnon Nonny, or the "Nuns' Well." Near the church are some remains of an ancient priory, called by the inhabitants "Hên Briordy:" it is said to have been a cell to the great abbey of Strata Florida, but neither the nunnery nor the priory is mentioned in Tanner's Notitia Monastica. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £261. 16.

LLANLLYVNI (LLAN-LLYVNI), a parish composed of the Upper and Lower divisions, in the hundred of UWCHGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (S. by W.) from Carnarvon, containing 1571 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from its situation on the river Llyni, which rises in the Nanlle lakes, in the upper part of the parish, and, after a short course, falls into Carnarvon bay. The parish extends from three to four miles in length, and from one to two miles in breadth, and comprises a tract of which a very considerable portion was formerly common and waste land, though a great part of it has of late years been enclosed, and many houses have been built upon the former wastes. The surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified; and in the upper part of the parish are two fine lakes, called Nanlle, one of which is more than half a mile in length and nearly a quarter of a mile broad; and the other, nearly adjoining it, is of equal breadth, but not quite so long. These lakes, which add greatly to the beauty of the scenery, formerly abounded with fish of superior quality; but the quantity has been greatly diminished by the influx of water from the copper-works in the vicinity. There are also two smaller lakes in the mountainous part of the parish, called respectively Llŷn Cwm Silin and Llŷn Cwm Dŷlyn, both of which afford better sport to the angler. One side of the parish is bounded by a fine range of mountains, the appearance of which is highly picturesque; and the lofty mountain of Snowdon, though eight miles distant, is seen with more strikingly romantic beauty from the parsonage-house, in this parish, than from any other point in the county. The village is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road from Carnarvon to Trêmadoc, from the former of which the inhabitants receive their letters. The parish, in common with the adjacent country, abounds with mineral wealth: beds of slate, intersected by veins of copper, extend through the whole of it, in a direction from south-west to north-east: manganese of superior quality has been recently discovered, and considerable quantities are shipped for Liverpool. The principal copper-works are those of Simdda Dylluan and Gwernoer; but the mines are not at present so extensively worked as formerly. The slate quarries were also worked some years ago, upon a very extensive scale, but the quantity of slates now procured is considerably less than formerly. A railroad, eight miles in length, has been laid down from the quarries to the port of Carnarvon, for the conveyance of the slates and other mineral produce to that port, where they are shipped for their several destinations.

The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7. 17. 6., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church is dedicated to St. Rhedyw, whose tomb within it was destroyed about fifty years ago; but his memory is still preserved in the name of a well called Fynnon Rhedyw, and in that of a stone called Eisteddva Rhedyw. It is a spacious cruciform structure, supposed to have been enlarged into its present form about the year 1032, which date was discovered above the east window of the chancel, while repairing it some years ago. Above the window of the Eithnog chapel, in this church, is an image of St. Rhedyw, which was formerly held in great veneration, but is now nearly defaced. There are two places of worship each for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. No Druidical monuments are actually remaining in the parish, but the existence of such within its limits at some former period is indicated by the names of various fields, such as Y Gistvaen, Cae y cynghor, Tâl y garnedd, &c. On the banks of the river Llyni are the remains of an ancient fortification, called Craig y Dinas, but whether of Roman or British origin it is not easy to determine: it is about a mile from Pont y Cern, and comprises an area of about two acres, inaccessible, owing to the precipitousness of the ascent, on the side next the river, and defended on the others by two walls of stone, with a fosse between them. In the upper part of this, and also in the neighbouring parishes, are numerous remains of the dwellings of the aboriginal inhabitants, commonly called Cyttian 'r Gwyddelod, or the "Irishmen's Huts:" they are either circular or elliptical in form, and generally from five to six yards in diameter: several of them are grouped together within a quadrangular area, enclosed by a single, and in some instances by a double, wall; and they also occur occasionally in concentric circles, and when cleared are generally found to contain great quantities of ashes. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £397. 5.

LLANMADOCK, a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 15 miles (W.) from Swansea, containing 240 inhabitants. This parish is situated on Whitford harbour, at the mouth of the Burry river. The most striking feature on its surface is Llanmadock hill, generally considered as the highest point in the peninsula of Gower, which is a well-known landmark to mariners off this part of the coast, and the view from which is extensive and magnificently grand, comprising the whole of the peninsula of Gower, the entire course of the Loughor or Burry river, from Pontardulas to its mouth, the luxuriant woods of Penrice castle, the lofty and precipitous cliffs which form the eastern side of Oxwich bay, with the vast expanse of sea beyond, the Devon and Cornish hills in the distance, and the coasts of Pembrokeshire and Carmarthenshire. The village extends about half a mile along the base of the hill: the land in the parish is chiefly enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. This place carries on a considerable trade in coal and limestone, in which about thirty vessels, varying in burden from twelve to twenty tons, are employed: in these vessels the coal is brought from Loughor and Llanelly, and the limestone conveyed to the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is dedicated to St. Madoc, the son of Gildas, a saint in Gower. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. On Llanmadock hill are traces of an ancient encampment, comprising a nearly circular area of about four acres, defended by triple ramparts, and commanding the entrance of the Burry river. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £19. 5.

LLANMAES, or LLANVAES (LLAN-MAES), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Cowbridge, containing 234 inhabitants. This parish is situated in a most fertile and salubrious part of the Vale of Glamorgan, and within two miles of the Bristol channel: it is watered by a small rivulet, which, passing by the churchyard, falls into the Bristol channel about three miles below it. The lands, which are almost entirely enclosed and in a high state of cultivation, are fertile and productive; and the environs abound with varied and pleasing scenery. The salubrity of the air is attested by several entries in the parish register of the burial of persons whose lives had been extended to an almost incredibly protracted period: among these, the most remarkable are the following, which have been extracted verbatim;—"Ivan Yorath buried a Sater-daye the XVII day of July anno doñi 1621 et anno regni regis vicessimo primo annoque ætatis circa 180. He was a Sowdiar in the fights of Boswoorthe, and lived at Lantwit Major, and he lived much by fishing. John Sherry was buried 8th of December 1624, aged 104 years. Thomas Watkin sepultus fuit octavo die Martii 1628, ætatis circa 100. Elizabeth Yorath wife of Edmund Thomas was buried the 13th of February 1668, aged 177." The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £10. 2.  $3\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute: attached to it are seventy-two acres of glebe land. The church is dedicated to St. Cadocus. A Sunday school is supported by the rector. Mrs. Susannah Thomas, in 1747, bequeathed a rent-charge of £1, and Mrs. Jane Thomas, in 1761, bequeathed a rent-charge of one bushel of wheat, Cowbridge measure, both which are annually distributed among the poor of the parish. Near the church are the remains, now inconsiderable, of the ancient castellated mansion of the Maliphants, which is noticed by Leland, in his Itinerary, as belonging to the crown, and at that time in a state of great dilapidation. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £124. 12.

LLANMEREWIG (LLAN-YR-EWIG), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Newtown, containing 201 inhabitants. This parish, which is said to have been formerly a chapelry within the parish of Llanllwchaiarn, is situated in a pleasant part of the county, near the river Severn, and is intersected by the river Mule, which flows through the eastern portion of it. It comprises about one thousand acres: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified; and the road from Abermule to Kerry, along the bank of the Mule, is highly picturesque. The soil is fertile, and the lands, which are all enclosed, are in a good state of cultivation: on the banks of the Mule are some corn-mills and a flannel-manufactory. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 9., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Llwlwchaiarn, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture. On the summit of a hill above the farm called Giant's bank, about half a mile from the road leading from Welshpool to Newtown, are the remains of a Roman camp, comprising a quadrilateral area, in which fragments of ornamented pottery, and part of a spear head have been found: from this camp are seen several of the principal mountains in North Wales. A Roman road leading from Caer-Sws, through the Vale of Severn, to the Gaer near Montgomery, and thence to Chester and Wroxeter, the ancient Ureconium of the Romans, may be traced in the lower part of the parish, near the river Severn. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £68. 18.

LLANMIHANGEL (LLAN-VIHANGEL Y BONT-VAEN), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. by W.) from Cowbridge, on the road to Lantwit-Major, containing 53 inhabitants. Llanmihangel Place, for many generations the seat of the family of Thomas, was sold to Sir Humphrey Edwin, lord mayor of London, some time in the seventeenth century: it was subsequently the residence for sixty years of the late John Franklin, Esq., one of the Welsh judges, and is now the property of Earl Dunraven. In the grounds belonging to it is the finest collection of evergreens to be met with in this part of the principality; and the yew trees, hollies, and cypresses, which are remarkable for the luxuriance of their growth, are perhaps unrivalled by any in the country. The living is a rectory not in charge, with that of Flemingston consolidated, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, and in the patronage of the Earl of Dunraven. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small edifice, not characterized by any remarkable architectural features. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £34. 11.

LLANMIHANGEL - RHÔSYCORN (LLAN-VIHANGEL RHÔS Y CORN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. E.) from Carmarthen, containing 683 inhabitants. It is situated in the northern part of the county, and comprehends, in addition to a considerable portion of mountainous and waste land, a large tract of enclosed arable and pasture land. The surrounding scenery is distinguished by features rather of bold and striking character than of pleasing and picturesque appearance; and the views from the higher grounds embrace extensive, and in some instances interesting, prospects over the adjacent country, which is finely diversified. Within the parish is Forest, formerly the residence of Lady Rudd, who, according to an inscription on the building, caused it to be erected in the year 1724, under the direction of Richard Gwynne, Esq., grandfather of the late Mrs. Elizabeth Hughes, of Tregib, near Llandilo-Vawr: it is now a farm-house, with some fine specimens of beech still remaining, which formed part of a noble grove of those trees, said to have extended to the church. The soil, though varying in different parts of the parish, is chiefly of a good quality on the cultivated lands. A woollen manufacture is carried on upon a limited scale, affording employment to a small number of persons. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Llanllwny, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's. The church is a small edifice, undistinguished by any architectural details; it occupies a dreary elevated situation, remote from all habitations. There is a place of worship for Independents. Of the sum of £2. 6. per annum, charged on an estate called Pentre, in this parish, £2 is appropriated to the minister for preaching four sermons quarterly, and the remainder is distributed in bread to the poor. In this parish is a spring called Fynnon Capel, near which is an ancient yew tree, from which circumstance, combined with the evidence afforded by its name, it is inferred that there was anciently a chapel at this place. Near the eminence on which the church stands is a turbarry of considerable extent. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £196. 10.

LLANNON (LLAN-NON), a parish in the hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (S. E. by S.) from Carmarthen, containing 1582 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated on elevated ground, in the south-eastern part of the county, and extends six miles in length from north to south, and four miles and a half in breadth, from east to west. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity, is pleasingly diversified; and the views from the higher grounds embrace some interesting and extensive prospects. The surface is varied, being in some parts mountainous: the lands, with the exception of a comparatively small portion, consisting of part of the Great Mountain, the Little Mountain, and Mynydd Sylan, are mostly enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation. The great turnpike road from Swansea to Carmarthen intersects the parish, and the mail coach through Bristol to Milford passes through the village: the tram-road from the works in the Great Mountain is continued through the parish to the port of Llanelly. Fairs, which are in general well attended, are held annually on July 6th and December 12th. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Rees Goring Thomas, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Non, the mother of St. David, the Patron of Wales, is not distinguished by any remarkable architectural details. Robert Williams, in 1761, bequeathed £50; and Pascal Parry, in 1747, gave £10 to the poor of this parish; the interest arising from which, together with the produce of some smaller benefactions in land and money, is annually distributed among them. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £418. 13.

LLANNOR, a parish chiefly in the hundred of DINLLAEN, but partly in that of GAFLOGION, in the Llein division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W.) from Pwllheli, containing 1137 inhabitants. This parish, which is very extensive, is situated in the south-western portion of the county, and nearly in the centre of the great promontory which separates Cardigan bay from the bay of Carnarvon. The village, which is small, is beautifully situated near the junction of two small streams, in a fine and extensive plain, open to the sea on the one side, and sheltered on the other by a range of mountains. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, and in many parts strikingly picturesque; and the distant views embrace numerous objects of interesting character and romantic appearance. Bodegroes, the ancient seat of the Glynne family, occasionally the residence of Bishop Glynne, and of his brother Geoffrey Glynne, Dean of the Arches, and founder of the free grammar school at Bangor, and now the property of his descendant, William Glynne Griffith, Esq., is an elegant mansion, beautifully situated in grounds tastefully laid out, and comprehending much varied and beautiful scenery. Fairs are held on April 12th, and October 18th and 29th. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Denio annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £12, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to the Holy Cross, is a long edifice in the later style of English architecture, with a small tower at the west end, and contains some windows of good design, enriched with tracery. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A parochial school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is supported by subscription; and, as there is no school-room, part of the church is appropriated to its use. The produce of various charitable donations and bequests is annually distributed among the poor at Christmas, according to the will of the several benefactors; and a large distribution of bread is made weekly to the poor frequenting the church, for which purpose Mr. John Evans bequeathed £104, now paid by the proprietor of Bodegroes. In a field called Maen Hir, near Beudymynydd, in this parish, a very curious grave was recently discovered, containing some remains of human bones: the body appeared to have been deposited on the gravel with the feet towards the north, and on each side was a slab of chert-stone, six feet long, curiously wrought: on these stones, forming the eastern and western sides of the grave, are inscriptions in rude Roman characters, and above them was a flat stone covered with soil. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £391. 2.

LLAN-OETHIN, an extra-parochial district, locally in the parish of Llanarvan, hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E. S. E.) from Cowbridge. The population is returned with Llanarvan. This district is situated near the left bank of the river Ddaw, and contains within its limits the farms of Llanbithou, Caer Maen, and Velin Vâch, which are exempt from church, poor, and county rates; but those of Treguf, Carn Llwyd, Laucadle, and Llanbythery, are each subject to a modus. A chapel formerly existed here.

LLANPYMP SAINT (LLAN-Y-PUMSAINT), a parish in the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (N.) from Carmarthen, containing 548 inhabitants. This parish, the name of which signifies the church of the five saints, is traversed on the east by the turnpike road leading from Carmarthen to Lampeter, and is intersected by the small river Guilly, which has its source in the neighbourhood, and falls into the river Towy at Aberguilly. It comprises a large tract of land, of which by far the greater part is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, but not distinguished by any peculiarity of features; and the views of the adjacent country are interesting and extensive. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Aberguilly, within which parish this was formerly a chapelry, but separated from it by act of parliament. Thomas Lloyd bequeathed a rent-charge of £2, and Elizabeth Jones £20 in money, the former of which, together with the interest of the latter, is annually divided among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £197. 4.

LLANREITHAN (LLAN-RHIDIAN), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Solva, containing 141 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated in the north-western part of the county, and comprises some fertile tracts of land, which are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery, though in general pleasing, is not distinguished by any peculiarity from that which prevails generally in this part of the principality. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Subchanter and Minor Chapter of the cathedral church of St. David's, to whom the tithes of the parish are appropriated. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £64. 15.

LLANRHAIADR IN KINMERCH (LLAN-RHAIADR-YN-NGHYMMEIRCH), a parish partly within the limits of the borough of DENBIGH, and partly in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. E.) from Denbigh, containing 2066 inhabitants. This very extensive parish is fourteen miles in length, and on an average three miles in breadth: it abounds with limestone, of which there are several quarries in various parts, great quantities being procured to be burnt for manure in several kilns here, and for building. In the rock immediately under Cader-yr-Arglwyddes, an eminence about a quarter of a mile to the west of the church, large masses of silex are discovered imbedded in the limestone, which, when broken, are found to contain agate, jasper, crystallized sulphate of lime, and chalcedony: the agate and the chalcedony are very pure, and exceedingly beautiful. From the summit of this eminence, the name of which signifies "the Peeresses' Chair," a most extensive and richly varied prospect is obtained, comprehending the whole Vale of Clwyd between Denbigh and Ruthin, diversified with woods, meadows and corn-fields; and a fine view of Denbigh castle, of which the walls and towers are seen to great advantage. Several attempts have been made to obtain copper-ore, but it has not been found in sufficient quantity to remunerate the adventurers. The village is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road from Ruthin to Denbigh; and courts leet and baron, with view of frankpledge, are held at Easter and at Michaelmas by the steward of the Bishop of Bangor, for his lordship's manors of Llêch and Llan, which are in this parish. A fair is held on October 17th. The living is a vicarage, within the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £28. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop: there is also a sinecure rectory, rated in the king's books at £30, which was annexed to the bishoprick by act of parliament in the reign of James II.; the whole of the tithes are equally divided between the bishop and the vicar. The church, dedicated to St. Dyvnog, is chiefly remarkable for its lofty east window of five lights, a fine composition in the decorated style of English architecture, and embellished with a beautiful specimen of stained glass: the subject is the Root of Jesse, and occupies the three central compartments of the window, on each side of which are some of the most distinguished patriarchs of the Old Testament, and underneath is the date M.CCCCXXXIII. There are some neat monuments, among which is a handsome effigy of Maurice Jones, Esq., in white marble, in a kneeling posture under a canopy supported by weeping figures. In the churchyard are the tombs of Captains Wynne and Salusbury, who were both killed during the siege of Denbigh castle, in 1646. A parochial school, in which children of both sexes are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription. Jane, widow of Maurice Jones, Esq., founded eight almshouses for as many poor persons of this parish, and endowed them with lands near Corwen: these houses, to each of which is attached a small garden, were thoroughly repaired and greatly improved by William Lord Bagot, grandnephew of the founder, in 1829. Each of the almshouses receives a weekly allowance of five shillings, with a supply of coal and clothing, and an additional sum of £1 at Christmas. There are several charitable donations and bequests, producing in the aggregate more than £72 per annum, which is distributed among the poor according to the directions of the testators. Near the church are the remains of an ancient bath, called Fynnon St. Dyvnog, which was formerly supposed to operate miraculous cures, and was much resorted to by patients, whose votive offerings were partly employed in decorating the east window of the church. The water, rising in great force from under the limestone rock, was long thought to be a remarkably copious spring; but it has since been ascertained to be a stream, which rises in the hilly part of the parish, in the township of Prion: the two branches of this stream, after flowing for nearly half a mile, sink into the rock, and pursue a subterraneous course for two miles, emerging at this spot. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £1680. 13.

LLANRHAIADR YN MOCHNANT (LLAN-RHAIADR-YN-MOCHNANT), a parish composed of the Lower division, in the Cynlleth and Mochnant division of the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, and the Upper portion, in the upper division of the hundred of LLANVYLLIN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 12 miles (W. by S.) from Oswestry, and containing 2344 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises an extent of about eight thousand acres, of which four thousand six hundred are in the Lower, and three thousand four hundred in the Upper, division, is intersected by the river Moch, in English signifying "Rapid," which here separates the counties of Denbigh and Montgomery, and in the former of which, at the distance of four miles from the village, it forms the much admired waterfall called Pistyll Rhaiadr, which renders this place, especially during the summer months, the resort of numerous visitors on their route through this part of North Wales. The perpendicular height of this fall is two hundred and forty feet; and the scenery around it, though in some places sterile and destitute of wood, is strikingly grand and picturesque. The river, flowing through a narrow valley which terminates in a precipitous and bold declivity of the Berwyn mountains, after gliding over a shelving rocky projection for a short distance, precipitates itself with great impetuosity down a steep descent of more than one hundred and fifty feet, and, being interrupted in its fall by a projecting mass of rock, through which it has worn a channel, forms a second fall beneath a lofty arch to the base of the mountain: the road leading from the village to this cataract has been greatly improved. The river pursues its course from Pistyll Rhaiadr through the village into the Tanat, a large stream descending from the hills above Pennant, and flowing through an extensive valley commencing at Llangynog, and continued through the parish to Pen y Bont, below Llangedwin: in this parish the Tanat is also joined by another tributary, called the Twrch. The Vale of Tanat, through which is an excellent turnpike road from Oswestry, through Llangynog, to Bala, is remarkable for the fertility of its soil, and the beauty and variety of its scenery, and is much admired by tourists, as affording a succession of interesting features. The lands bordering upon the Tanat are subject to inundation, but the rest of the parish, which has every where an uneven surface, is chiefly elevated: the soil is various, but for the most part gravelly. Coal has been discovered at Cevn Côch, a township in this parish, not far from the village, but no works have yet been established: several attempts have been made to procure ore, which is thought to abound in the parish, but they have not hitherto been attended with success. Near Pistyll Rhaiadr is an extensive slate quarry, the property of the Earl of Powis, and worked under the superintendence of Messrs. Foulkes and Co.: the slate is of good quality, but no great quantity has been obtained, the works not being yet in full operation. The manufacture of woollen cloth is carried on to a small extent, and several of the inhabitants are employed in the making of shoes. A small market is held here under a building which is called "the town hall;" and fairs are held annually on the first Friday in March, May 5th, July 24th, September 28th, and November 8th. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: the sinecure rectory, rated in the king's books at £18. 16. 0½., was appropriated by act of parliament of the 29th and 30th of Charles II., on the death of the rector, the facetious Dr. South, to the maintenance of the choir, and the repairs of the cathedral church, of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Dogvan, and situated in that portion of the parish which is in the county of Denbigh, is an ancient and spacious structure, but not distinguished by any particular architectural features. Llanarmon-Mynydd-

Mawr, formerly an integral part of this parish, has been separated from it and now forms a distinct parish. The neighbouring churches of Llanadwaladr, Llangedwin, and Llanwddyn, were originally also dependent chapels on the mother church of Llanrhaiadr, from which they are respectively distant nine, four, and eight miles. There are places of worship in the village for Independents, and for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The parochial school, held in a building adjoining the church, was founded, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, by Mr. John Powell, who, in 1730, bequeathed £210 in money, and lands then producing £24 per annum, for the instruction of children and for the relief of the poor: of the produce of this bequest, £23 per annum is paid as a salary to a schoolmaster for teaching the English language, writing, and arithmetic; and the remainder is appropriated to the purchasing of clothes, the apprenticing of children, and the relief of the poor; to which purposes are also applied the produce of £100, bequeathed by Dr. South, the last rector of the parish; £120 by Mr. Charles Edwards, and several smaller sums by different benefactors for distribution among the poor. Dr. Morgan, author of a translation of the Bible in the Welsh language, for which he was rewarded by Queen Elizabeth with the bishoprick of Llandaf, from which see he was translated to that of St. Asaph, in 1601, was at one period vicar of this parish. Dr. Lloyd, afterwards Bishop of Bangor; Dr. Langford, Archdeacon of Merioneth; Dr. Powell, Dean of St. Asaph; Dr. Worthington, Prebendary of York and of St. Asaph; Dr. Williams, Prebendary of St. Asaph, and examining chaplain to Shipley, Bishop of St. Asaph; and several other eminent divines, have also been vicars of Llanrhaiadr. The poor of the entire parish are maintained by an average annual expenditure of £979. 2.

LLANRHIDIAN, or LLANRIDIAN (LLAN-RHIDIAN), a parish in the hundred of SWANSEA, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH-WALES, 11 miles (W. by N.) from Swansea, consisting of a Higher and Lower division, which separately maintain their own poor, and containing 1445 inhabitants, of which number, 1033 are in the Higher, and 412 in the Lower, division. This parish, which is situated in the peninsula of Gower, abounds with coal and iron-ore, but of these minerals no strata are at present worked within its limits. The village is pleasantly situated on the south bank of the river Burry, immediately opposite to the town of Llanelly, in the county of Carmarthen. The manufacture of woollen cloth is carried on, though upon a very confined scale, employing no more than from six to eight persons. At the village of Penclawdd, in the Higher division of the parish, were formerly extensive copper-works belonging to the Cheadle Copper Company; but they are now neglected, that company possessing numerous others in more convenient situations, and are going to ruin. A canal, called the Penclawdd canal, in connexion with which are some short rail-roads, opens a communication between the coal districts of Swansea, Loughor, and Llangyvelach, and joins the Burry river at Aberkiddy, in this parish. A fair is held here on Palm-Monday. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £12. 13. 4., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John Morgan, Esq. The church is dedicated to St. Illtyd. In the Higher division of the parish is a chapel of ease, in which divine service is performed once a month by the incumbent, who also solemnizes marriages, christenings, and burials at this chapel, which is four miles distant from the parish church. In this division also there are places of worship for Baptists, a congregation in the late Countess of Huntingdon's connexion, and Independents; and in the Lower division, another belonging to the Countess of Huntingdon's connexion. Sunday schools, connected with the established church and the several dissenting congregations, are supported by subscription.

Within a quarter of a mile of the river, and near the western extremity of the parish, are the ruins of Weobley castle, occupying an eminence commanding the navigable river Burry, and affording an extensive view of the adjacent country: it appears to have been anciently of great strength and extent, having formed the head of a considerable manor, and formerly belonged to Lord Mansel: part of it has been converted into a farmhouse. On Manselford farm is a strong intrenchment in a very perfect state, which appears to have been thrown up to defend the passage of two valleys leading up to the castle. Several other intrenchments are visible within the parish, but by whom they were constructed is not known: one of these occupies the summit of a lofty hill just above the village, and is supposed to have been thrown up by Ivor ab Cadivor, a chieftain of Morganwg, about the year 1110, during his wars with the English, from which circumstance it has obtained the name of Cil Ivor, or "Ivor's Retreat." On the summit of Cevn Bryn is a large cromlech, called Arthur's Stone, a vestige of Druidical antiquity, which Camden and other writers describe as being composed of a different species of stone from any found in this part of the country: this, however, appears to be erroneous, as it is the common pudding-stone, or millstone grit, of the country; and, within the recollection of persons still living, a huge fragment, which had been broken off with great labour, by means of wedges, and intended for a millstone, was found totally unfit for that purpose, from the cavities left in the surface by the falling out of the pebbles of which it consisted. The principal, or covering stone, is eleven feet in length and six feet and a half in its greatest breadth: it rests on twelve supporters, for fixing which the earth appears to have been excavated, and by the side of the cromlech lies the mass above noticed. A supposed miraculous well beneath this monument, which was said to ebb and flow with the sea, appears to be nothing more than a collection of water, after heavy rains, in the cavity formed for the insertion of the supporters, which fluctuates according to the weather, and which, as attested by intelligent persons residing near the spot, is frequently dry in hot summers. This cromlech is supposed to be alluded to in the historical triads of Wales, as one of the three Herculean labours. There are several mineral springs in the parish, to which medicinal properties are ascribed: of these, the most celebrated is Holy Well, on Cevn y Bryn mountain, to which, in former times, miraculous efficacy was attributed: it was generally frequented on Sunday evenings during the summer season by numbers of persons, who drank the water, and, according to an ancient custom, threw in a pin as a tribute of their gratitude. On Llanrhidian salt-marsh a spring has been discovered within the last ten years, strongly impregnated with iron, and perhaps also with sulphur, and of a foetid smell, to which the inhabitants have given the name of the Stinking Well: it instantly discolours silver, and is thought to possess very powerful medicinal efficacy. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £416. 5., of which sum, £227. 2. is raised on the Higher, and £189. 3. on the Lower, division.

LLAN RHÔS, or LLANVAIR YN RHÔS, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES. — See EGLWYS-RHÔS.

LLANRHÛDD (LLAN-RHÛDD), a parish partly within the limits of the borough, and partly in the hundred, of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (E.) from Ruthin. The village is pleasantly situated in a fertile vale near the Clwydian mountains, and the neighbourhood abounds with pleasing and finely varied scenery. That portion of the parish called the township of Llanrhudd Uchâv is comprised within the limits of the contributory borough of Ruthin. The rectories of Llanrhudd and Ruthin were appropriated, in 1590, by Dr. Gabriel Goodman, Dean of Westminster, to the endowment of Christ's Hospital in Ruthin, and are now held by the warden and pensioners of that institution: the warden appoints a curate for each of the parishes, but is occasionally required to perform duty at each of the churches himself: both parishes are within the sole jurisdiction of the consistory court of the Bishop of Bangor, and the wardenship is in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. The church, dedicated to St. Meugan, is a small ancient edifice, forming a picturesque object in the vale: it contains an ancient monument to the memory of John Thelwall, Esq., and his wife Jane, whose effigies are represented in a kneeling posture, with ten of their sons and four daughters. In a niche near this monument is a well-executed bust of Ambrose, their ninth son, steward to Lord Verulam, Lord High Chancellor of England, and afterwards Yeoman of the robe to James I. and Charles Prince of Wales: he died on August 5th, 1653, aged eighty-two years. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The poor children of this parish are admissible to the free grammar school of Ruthin, and also to the National school established in that borough. Mrs. Dorothy Myddelton bequeathed £20; Mr. Parry, in 1714, bequeathed £20; and Mr. Jones £20; which sums, with other benefactions amounting to about £105, have been invested in the funds of the Llandegla and Mold turnpike trusts, and the interest, together with a rent-charge of £8, left by Mr. Edward Griffith, is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. A chalybeate spring, dedicated to St. Peter, was formerly in high repute for the supposed miraculous medicinal efficacy of its waters, but is at present neglected: it is strongly impregnated with some mineral, and, if due care were taken to prevent its admixture with other waters, it might still be found highly beneficial. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £320. 2.

LLANRHWYDRUS (LLAN-RHWYDRYS), a parish in the hundred of TALY BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N. W.) from Llanerch-

medd, containing 178 inhabitants. This parish is situated at the north-western extremity of the Isle of Anglesey, on a headland projecting into the Irish sea, on the north, and forming on the east the boundary of Camlyn bay. It derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Rhwydrus, by whom it was originally founded in the sixth century, and contains a large portion of enclosed and well-cultivated land. The surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified, and in some parts highly picturesque; and the views along the coast and over the adjacent country are interesting and extensive. About two miles north-westward from the main land is Ynys y Moelrhoniaid, or the "Isle of Seals," commonly called the Isle of Skerries, a long island composed entirely of craggy pointed rocks, in which are great numbers of rabbits, and which, during the breeding season, is the resort of puffins and razor-bills. A lighthouse, exhibiting a steady light, was erected on the highest point of this island, in 1733, by the Corporation of the Trinity House, to facilitate the navigation of this part of the channel, and for the preservation of the numerous vessels employed in the trade between Liverpool and Dublin: it has been of material use in the preservation of life and property, but the want of a superior elevation to render it visible at a greater distance has much tended to diminish the benefits which it might otherwise have afforded to vessels navigating this dangerous part of the channel. A more eligible situation might be found on the main land, at a point called Cader Rhwydrus, where the light would have an elevation of nearly a hundred feet above that which it has in its present situation. The Isle of Skerries anciently belonged to the monks of Bangor, and was the principal fishery appertaining to that see, the prelates of which, by neglect, having suffered it to be usurped by the family of Griffith, of Penrhyn, Bishop Dean, in 1498, exerted himself for its recovery, and, after a considerable struggle, succeeded in procuring its restoration to the see. The living is annexed to the rectory of Llanrhyddlad, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church is a small ancient edifice, situated nearly in the centre of the headland projecting into the sea, near the small island called the West Mouse. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A small parochial school, in which a few poor children are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription. John Hughes, in 1778, bequeathed £50 to the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £143. 18.

LLANRHYCHWYN (LLAN-RHYCHWYN), a parish in the Uchgorvai division of the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (W. by N.) from Llanrwst, containing 565 inhabitants. This parish, which is exceedingly mountainous, contains an abundance of pyrites, worked by a company from Liverpool, who ship the produce at the adjoining quay of Trêvriw, on the river Conway, which forms the eastern boundary of the parish, and is navigable from its mouth below the town of Aberconway to Trêvriw. There are also three extensive slate quarries within its limits, at the distance of about one mile and a half from the shipping-place, in which upwards of one hundred persons are employed: lead-ore has likewise been obtained here, and some small veins are now being worked. Numerous varieties of quartz crystals are found, some of them of a beautiful amethystine colour, and of considerable value. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Trêvriw, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Rhychwyn, is situated among barren mountains, at a considerable distance from any houses, and, from the rudeness of its architecture, appears to be of great antiquity: it is vulgarly observed of this simple structure that it was erected prior to the invention of the saw and plane, since no indication of the use of these instruments can be discovered in any part of the edifice: in the east window are the remains of some handsome stained glass, with a mutilated date, which seems to have been MCCCCXXII. Near Capel Curig, at the extremity of the parish, is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Taliesin, the celebrated British bard, who flourished about the middle of the sixth century, is stated to have resided in this parish, near a small lake, or pool, called Llŷn Geirionydd. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £121. 18.

LLANRHYDDLAD (LLAN-RHÛDDLAD), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N. W. by W.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 628 inhabitants. This parish, which is of small extent, is situated on the shore of the Irish sea, which washes the western side of it: the surface is boldly varied, and the views from the higher grounds are extensive, embracing an interesting prospect over the sea and the adjacent country, which abounds with pleasing, and in some parts with picturesque, scenery. The village, which is small, is situated at the foot of Moel Rhyddlad, one of the highest mountains in the island, and for that reason selected by Colonel Mudge as one of his principal stations in making the trigonometrical survey of North Wales. Considerable quantities of manganese, and some copper-ore, have been found upon this mountain; but no mines have yet been opened. The living is a discharged rectory, with Llanvlewin and Llanrhywdrus annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £14. 11. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The tithes of the ancient parish of Llandogvael are received alternately by the rectors of this parish and Llanvechell. The church, dedicated to St. Rhyddlad, is a small edifice, not distinguished by any architectural features of importance. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest of several small charitable donations and bequests, two of which are small portions of land, is annually distributed among the poor at Christmas. Sir William Williams, Speaker of the House of Commons in the reign of Charles II., was born in this parish, of which his father, Dr. Hugh Williams, founder of the families of Wynnstay, Bodelwyddan, and Penbedwr, was rector from 1633 till 1670. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £208. 11.

LLANRHÛSTID (LLAN-RHÛSTYD), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. by W.) from Aberystwith, on the road to Cardigan, containing 1525 inhabitants. This place, though at present of little importance, has been distinguished in history from a remote period of antiquity. In 987, its church was demolished by the Danes, in one of their descents upon South Wales. The castle of Llanrhŷtid, called also Dinerth castle, was, in 1080, at which period it belonged to Iestyn ab Gwrgan, Prince of Glamorgan, sacked by Rhŷs, Prince of South Wales: it was destroyed in 1135, by Owain Gwynedd and his brother, aided by Hywel ab Meredydd and Rhŷs ab Madog ab Ednerth. Having been re-erected, it was besieged and taken, in 1150, with several other fortresses, by Cadell, Meredydd, and Rhŷs, the sons of Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, Prince of South Wales, who, enraged at the spirited resistance of its defenders, whereby they lost some of their bravest troops, put the garrison to the sword. It was fortified by Roger Earl of Clare, in 1158, and, about the close of the same century, was besieged and taken by Maelgwyn ab Rhŷs, who slew the garrison left to defend it by his brother Gruffydd, and in 1204 rased it, with several others, to prevent their falling into the hands of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth. The present village, which is situated near the influx of the small river Gwyre into the bay of Cardigan, consists only of a few cottages, indifferently built. Fairs are held here on the Thursday before Easter and the Thursday before Christmas; and at Lluest Newydd others are held on September 23rd, October 8th, and the second Friday after the 10th of the same month. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Rhystyd, occupies an elevated situation above the village, and is of considerable antiquity. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Dissenters. Leland mentions the remains of a large edifice here, which some supposed to have been a nunnery; but there are now no vestiges of it, nor any authentic account of such an establishment having existed here: there is, however, within the limits of the parish, a farmhouse called Mynachty, signifying "monastery," which probably occupies the site of a religious house. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £368. 8.

LLANRIAN (LLAN-RHIAN), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. E.) from St. David's, containing 715 inhabitants. This parish is situated near the north-western extremity of the county, and on the coast of St. George's channel, by which it is bounded on the west and north: the surrounding scenery is pleasing, and the views over the channel and the adjacent country are interesting and extensive. It constitutes a prebend in the cathedral church of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £19. 9. 7., and annexed to the archdeaconry of Carmarthen. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 11. 3., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Rheanus, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. Near the church are some Druidical remains, consisting of many large stones, most of which are now broken: they were formerly erect, and, in their arrangement and general appearance, formed in miniature, according to Mr. Fenton, a tolerably correct representation of Stonehenge. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £264.

LLANRŪG, or LLANVIHANGEL YN RŪG, a parish in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Carnarvon, on the new line of road to Capel Curig, containing 1204 inhabitants. This parish is separated from that of Llandeiniolen by the river Seiont, which forms its northern boundary. It contains no village, and the church, which is far detached from any dwelling, is situated on a beautiful eminence, commanding extensive prospects of the sea and the country adjacent, embracing the Snowdon range of mountains on the east, and the bay of Carnarvon on the west; and in certain states of the atmosphere even the Irish hills are distinctly visible from this place. There are several good mansions in detached situations, inhabited by opulent families, among which are the beautiful small villa of Glangwnna, deeply embosomed in woods on the sloping bank of the river Seiont, the property of the daughters of the late Thomas Lloyd, Esq., of Shrewsbury; Plâs Tirion, the seat of John Rowland, Esq.; Tŷn y Coed, the residence of Major Jones; and Plâs Gwynn, the seat of Major Creighton, about to be occupied by Mr. Swainson, of Liverpool, who, with other gentlemen, has taken the slate quarry on the farm of Tŷ-Dû, in the parish of Llanberis. The land is for the greater part enclosed and in a state of good cultivation: an act of parliament for enclosing the waste lands was obtained about the year 1809. The farms are small, the largest seldom comprising more than a hundred acres; and such of the inhabitants as are not engaged in agriculture are employed in the quarries and in the neighbouring mines. The parish abounds with slate of a reddish hue, or of a brown colour, of a very durable substance, and not apt to open or crack when exposed to the weather. There are quarries both on the mountain called Cevn Dû and on a farm called Glynn Rhonwy, in this parish, belonging to Lord Newborough: on the latter they are numerous, and are worked to a considerable extent under the superintendence of Mr. Roberts of Carnarvon, who rents them under his lordship. These quarries afford employment to more than two hundred men, and the slates are brought down the Llanberis lakes in boats, and thence conveyed by carts to Carnarvon. There are indications of copper-ore on Gaer Cwm y Glo, and also on a mountainous rocky farm called Llwyncoed: some small veins have been actually laid open; and in a rock near the lake, close to the new road, and on the same farm, a vein of asbestos, or amianthus, has been found. At a short distance higher up, and near the boundary of the farms called Llwyncoed and Glynn Rhonwy, is a vein of white soapy clay, resembling fullers' earth, which dips into the lake and may be taken up from a boat. Numerous curious specimens of fossils, minerals, and crystals, are found in the mountainous district of this parish.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £5. 12. 6., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small but venerable cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture, without tower or steeple, but having at the west end a pointed arch, rising above the roof and surmounted by a small cross, under which a bell is suspended: from its elevated situation it is seen from a great distance in every direction, and it has been rendered more conspicuous by being whitewashed all over, not even excepting the roof. There are two places of worship for Calvinistic, and one for Wesleyan, Methodists; and a dwelling-house has been recently converted to the use of a congregation of Presbyterians. Two school-houses have been erected by the Calvinistic Methodists, where Sunday schools are held, as also in each of their places of worship. Mr. John Morris, in 1710, bequeathed two tenements in this parish, called Drws-Dangoed and Caer Weddus, for apprenticing poor boys of this parish and that of Llanbeblig: two or three boys are annually placed out according to the will of the testator, and the benefit is enjoyed by both parishes alternately. In several parts of the parish are numerous remains of cottages, or huts, probably the residences of the aboriginal inhabitants at some period of very remote antiquity: they are generally in clusters of eight or ten each, and appear to have formed distinct villages. They are called Cyttiau'r Gwyddelod, or "the Irishmen's huts," and are generally circular in form: two stones on one side of each seem to mark out the entrance, and a large upright stone probably points out the fire-place: the walls, which are about two feet high, and three in thickness, are composed of small stones without mortar. Near these huts are frequently found remains of the "quern," or stone handmill, consisting of two stones, one concave and the other convex, with a place for an iron handle; and stone and brass celts have also been found in the vicinity of these ancient habitations, which are generally distributed through the parish, and of which the number of circular foundations exceeds three hundred. Davydd Thomas, the celebrated Welsh bard, better known as "Davydd Ddû o Eryri," was interred at this place; and Dr. Edwards, who accompanied Commodore Anson in his voyage round the world, and held the office of surgeon on board the Tamer frigate, was a native of this parish, and son of one of its rectors: he also lies buried in the churchyard. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £211. 15.

LLANRWST (LLAN-RWST), a market town and parish, comprising the township of Gwydir, which maintains its own poor by a separate assessment, in the hundred of NANTCONWAY, county of CARNARVON, but chiefly in the Uchdulas division of the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 20 miles (W. by S.) from Denbigh, 26 (W. by N.) from Ruthin, and 217 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 3601 inhabitants. This town is of very great antiquity, and in the year 952 was the scene of an important battle in the contests maintained at this period, for the sovereignty of Wales, between the sons of Hywel Dda and those of Edwal Voel, when the former, assembling their forces in South Wales, laid waste the territory of North Wales as far as the river Conway, but were opposed by the latter at the town of Llanrwst, where, after an obstinate conflict, in which many of considerable rank were slain on both sides, the sons of Edwal Voel were victorious, and pursuing their enemies into South Wales, they retaliated upon their territories for the ravages which had been inflicted on their own.

The town is pleasantly situated on the eastern bank of the river Conway, which here forms the boundary between the two counties, four miles to the north of the road to Holyhead, and in the spacious and beautiful Vale of Llanrwst, environed by majestic and well-wooded hills, the land at the foot of which is well watered and exceedingly productive: it is large, well built, and amply supplied with water, but consists principally of small houses and shops: the streets are spacious and well paved. Over the river is an elegant bridge of three arches, built about the year 1636, under an order from the privy council of Charles I., from a plan by Inigo Jones, who is erroneously stated to have been a native of this place: the expense of its erection, amounting to about one thousand pounds, was conjointly defrayed by the two counties which it connects: two of the arches are exceedingly handsome; the third, having been rebuilt in 1703, is somewhat inferior: the centre arch, which forms a much larger segment of a circle than the other two, is nearly sixty feet in span. Excellent roads have lately been made, communicating with the London, Liverpool, and Holyhead roads, and also with Denbigh and St. Asaph, the improved state of which has caused a considerable increase of visitors, during the summer months, to the picturesque and much admired scenery of this neighbourhood. Llanrwst was formerly noted for the making of harps: at present the spinning of woollen yarn, and the knitting of stockings, constitute the principal branches of trade, the town being situated at the north-western extremity of the hosiery district of North Wales, and, next to Bala, the principal market for that article. The river Conway is navigable from its mouth to Trêvriw, three miles from this town, for vessels of sixty tons' burden, which bring coal, lime, timber, and grocery, for the supply of the inhabitants of Llanrwst and the neighbourhood, and carry back the produce of the slate quarries and mines of the adjoining parishes. The market, which is on Tuesday, is well supplied, particularly with corn, which is not sold by sample, but in small quantities, suitable to the circumstances of the purchaser: it is the general mart for the inhabitants of the surrounding district, to a distance of twenty miles in every direction. Fairs, chiefly for the sale of cattle, corn, and wool, are held on the first Tuesday in February, March 8th, April 25th, June 21st, August 10th, September 17th, October 25th, December 11th, and the second Tuesday after that day: at the June fair a great quantity of wool is sold to the clothiers in Yorkshire, and at the September and October fairs great numbers of cattle are sold to the English drovers. The market-place is a spacious square area, in the centre of which stands the town-hall, a plain substantial structure, erected at the expense of Maurice Wynne, Esq., of Caer Melwr, as appears from a stone over the principal entrance, bearing the arms of the Wynnes, and the initials of the founder, with the date 1661: above this is a clock, with a cupola containing the market bell, and surmounted by a large gilt eagle. The general quarter sessions for the county were formerly held in this hall, which practice has been discontinued since the removal of the assizes from Denbigh to Ruthin. The petty sessions for the Uchdulas division of the hundred of Isdulas are held here; and Llanrwst has, by the late Boundary Act, been made a polling-place in the election of knights for the shire.

The parish is upwards of forty miles in circumference. The living comprises a sinecure rectory and a discharged vicarage, united by act of parliament passed in 1678, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, the former rated in the king's books at £12, and the latter at £6. 5. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Grwst, Rhystyd, or Restitutus, is a small edifice, situated close to the margin of the river: it is said to have been originally erected on ground given by Rhun, son of Nevydd Hardd, one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales, to expiate the murder of Prince Idwal, a son of Owain Gwynedd, by order of Nevydd, to whom Owain had entrusted him to be fostered, according to the custom of the country. The present structure is supposed, from its style of architecture, to have been erected early in the fifteenth century. Adjoining it, on the south side, is the Gwydir chapel, a handsome square castellated edifice, the interior of which is decorated with a profusion of carved work: it was built by Sir Richard Wynne, from a design by Inigo Jones, in 1633, as a burial-place for his family, the deceased members of which had previously been interred in the chancel, and contains several elegantly engraved brasses, exhibiting portraits of several of this family: it has a carved and fretted roof, which is said once to have belonged to the conventual church of Maenan abbey, situated about three miles distant. On the eastern wall is a slab of white marble, recording the pedigree of the founder, and tracing his ancestors to Owain Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales. On the southern wall is a mutilated monument to the memory of Sir John Wynne, Bart., a learned antiquary, and an indefatigable gleaner of materials for the illustration of Welsh history, which were published under the title of the "History of the Gwydir family;" also to that of his father Meredith, and his wife Sidney, daughter of Sir William Gerard, Chancellor of Ireland. In the centre of the chapel, upon the floor, lies the stone coffin of Llewelyn the Great, who died in 1240, and was interred in the abbey which he had founded at Aberconway, thence removed to Maenan, and from that place, at the dissolution, the coffin was brought to the old parish church of Llanrwst, where it remained obscured by rubbish until placed in its present more appropriate situation. The same attention has likewise been paid to another piece of antiquity, placed near it, viz., a recumbent armed effigy of Howel Coytmor, grandson of Davydd, brother to Llewelyn ab Gruffydd: he was owner of the Gwydir estate, which was sold by one of his descendants to the family of Wynne. At Garthgarmon, three miles distant, there is a chapel of ease; and at Gwydir, half a mile off, is a private chapel belonging to Lord Willoughby de Eresby. There are in the parish eleven places of worship for dissenters, of which four are in the town, belonging respectively to the Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, each, except the Wesleyan chapel, having a burial-ground attached.

Divers benefactions of considerable amount have been made for the benefit of the poor of this parish, which are judiciously managed, the proceeds being regularly distributed among the most deserving objects annually on St. Thomas's day. The neighbourhood of the town is delightfully picturesque, being ornamented with several mansions of noblemen and gentlemen, the principal of which are, Gwydir, the seat of Lord Willoughby de Eresby; the Abbey, that of Lord Newborough; Cyfdŷ, that of Mrs. Davies; Belmont, that of the Rev. J. Nanney; Plâs Madoc, that of Wm. Lloyd Jones, Esq.; Penloyn, that of Peter Titley, Esq.; the Cottage, the property of Robert Read, Esq.; Hêndre House, the seat of the late William Edwards, Esq.; Oaklands, that of — Blackall, Esq.; Beaver Grove, the property of Mrs. Davies, of Cyfdŷ, now in the occupation of the Rev. Maurice Hughes; and Tan y celyn, a neat residence newly built on the banks of the river Conway, the property of G. N. Wright, Esq., of St. Albans. The ancient mansion of Gwydir, beautifully situated amidst extensive woods of oak, which clothe the rocks projecting between the rivers Conway and Llugwy, near the foot of a lofty precipice called Carreg y Gwalch, or "the rock of the falcon," was erected, according to some initials and a date over the gateway, by John Wynne ab Meredydd, in 1555, and comprised an extensive, but somewhat irregular, pile of building, ranged in a quadrangular style, and consisting of an inner and an outer court: this edifice was taken down in 1816, since which time the present structure, on a much smaller scale, has been built: a small portion of the former mansion still remains, and is now being fitted up in an antique and elegant style. Above this stood another edifice, called the Upper Gwydir, erected in 1604 by Sir John Wynne, which was pulled down several years ago. The Vale of Llanrwst, which is neither so widely extended as the Vale of Clwyd, nor so contracted as that of Llangollen, is regarded by the admirers of picturesque scenery as exhibiting the most varied assemblage of beautiful features which the pencil could delineate. The prospect of the dense woods and towering hills which enclose it on each side is enlivened by the sparkling waters of the sportive Conway, which every where present an animated scene, either of small vessels arriving at and departing from the village of Trêvriw, or of the diminutive boats called coracles, which are used in fishing for salmon and smelts, considerable quantities of which are caught in their respective seasons. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the entire parish amounts to £1833. 2.: exclusively of the township of Gwydir, it is £1668. 18.

LLANSADWRN (LLAN-SADWRN), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W.) from Beaumaris, containing 371 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the eastern part of the county, and within four miles of the Menai bridge, comprises a moderate portion of land, of which the whole is enclosed, and the greater part in a state of good cultivation. The houses of the inhabitants are scattered over the parish in detached situations, not forming any village; and the surrounding scenery, though not characterized by any peculiarity of feature, is pleasingly rural. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7. 6. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Sadwrn, from which circumstance the parish derives its name, is a small but neat edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north transept, and was thoroughly repaired at a considerable expense in 1829. In the transept, projecting from one of the walls, is the head of an ecclesiastic, well executed in stone; and outside the same part of the edifice is the head of a bear, with a muzzle and chain, also curiously carved in stone. A fragment of stone has been found, which is now placed within the transept under the head above mentioned, bearing part of a mutilated inscription in Roman characters, in which the word "Saturninus," still legible, seems to shew that it was part of the monument of that saint, by whom the church is supposed to have been founded about the year 603. The farms of Bryn Eryr and Rhôs Owen, left by Dr. Rowlands for the support of his almshouses at Bangor, are in this parish. Rowland Jones, in 1715, left a tenement called Gorslâs, the rent of which he appropriated in equal shares to the poor of this parish and that of Pentraeth; and Mrs. Roberts, in 1756, bequeathed £150, the interest of which sum she directed to be given in equal shares to three of the poorest and most deserving housekeepers of Llansadwrn. In a field adjoining Trevor, in this parish, are the remains of two ancient cromlechs; the larger, which was supported on two upright stones more than ten feet high, fell down in 1825. There are some remains of an ancient fortress, near an old family mansion called "Castellior," which, from several relics of antiquity discovered in the immediate vicinity, is supposed to be of Roman origin. In the marsh near the base of Llwydiart mountain, fossil oak trees, acorns, and nuts are found, several feet below the surface, retaining all their original freshness. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £137. 10.

LLANSADWRN (LLAN-SADWRN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (N.N.W.) from Llangadock, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, each of which separately supports its poor, and containing 1221 inhabitants, of which number, 657 are in the Upper, and 564 in the Lower, division. This parish, which is pleasantly situated in the north-eastern part of the county, is intersected by the turnpike road from Llandilo-Vawr, by the ford, to Llandovery, and by a small rivulet tributary to the river Towey. The surface is varied, comprising a mountainous district of considerable extent, and a large portion of common land, with the exception of which the grounds are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The scenery is finely diversified, and the views from the higher grounds are extensive, embracing a rich prospect over the surrounding country. Abermarlais, the seat of Vice-Admiral Sir Thomas Foley, is a handsome modern mansion, erected by the present proprietor, on the site and from the ruins of an ancient mansion, which originally formed the baronial residence of Sir Rhys ab Thomas, and is noticed by Leland: the present edifice is beautifully situated in grounds finely varied and comprehending much picturesque scenery. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Llanwrda annexed, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 10., endowed with £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Admiral Sir Thomas Foley, G. C. B. The church is dedicated to St. Sadwrn. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Sir Thomas Foley pays to the poor of the parish forty gallons of barley per month, charged on the estate of Abermarlais, also £5 per annum for instructing poor children, and £5 per annum for apprenticing them: the children of this parish are also entitled to admission into the endowed free school at Llanwrda. Lady Letitia Cornwallis, in 1739, bequeathed £400 for teaching poor children, and £779. 19. 11. for purchasing lands for charitable uses: these sums not having been applied to the purposes prescribed by the will of the testatrix, a decree for the payment of them was obtained from the Court of Chancery, towards the close of the last century. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £313. 3., of which sum, £161. 1. is raised on the Upper, and £152. 2. on the Lower, division.

LLANSADWRNEN (LLAN-SADYRNIN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLÛS, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (S.W.) from Laugharne, containing 234 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated on the bay of Carmarthen, and is but of small extent: the land is enclosed and in a tolerable state of cultivation. Limestone is found in the rocks near the coast, but the inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied; and the views, extending over the bay and the adjacent country, are interesting, and combine some features of picturesque character. The living is a rectory, annexed to the vicarage of Laugharne, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. In this parish are the remains of Broadway House, an ancient mansion, formerly the residence of John Powel, Esq., Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Keeper of the Great Seal in the reign of James II.; he was one of the judges who sat on the trial of the seven bishops that were committed to the Tower by order of that monarch, in 1688, and by his inflexible integrity they were absolved of the charge laid against them: he died in 1696, aged sixty-three, and was buried in the chancel of the church of Laugharne, where a monument was erected to his memory, bearing an inscription eulogising his conduct on that memorable trial. In the limestone rock near the coast is a curious and beautiful cavern of large dimensions, which was formerly a retreat for smugglers. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £127. 14.

LLANSAMLET (LLAN-SAMLED), a parish in the hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3½ miles (N.E. by N.) from Swansea, comprising the Higher and Lower divisions, which separately maintain their own poor, and containing 3187 inhabitants, of which number, 1076 are in the Higher, and 2111 in the Lower, division. One of the most picturesque features of this parish is Glanbrane, the seat of Capt. W. Jones, a good house situated near the summit of a lofty eminence, and commanding a fine marine view over Crymlyn hill, the grounds surrounding which are very tastefully laid out. Gwernllwynwith, formerly the property of the Morgans of Birch Grove, is a substantial mansion, the residence of C. H. Smith, Esq. The lands of this parish, which is intersected by the river Tawy, and by the turnpike road from Swansea to Neath, are, with the exception of a small portion, enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. Here are some extensive collieries, the principal of which, belonging to C. H. Smith, Esq., afford constant employment to about five hundred men. There are also, in the Lower division of the parish, three copper-works upon an extensive scale, belonging to three several companies, affording employment to a great number of persons: their produce is conveyed to the port of Swansea by a canal and tram-road which pass through the parish, and by the river Tawy, which is navigable to the works. A large portion of the parish is included within the new limits of the borough of Swansea. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Samled, is a small edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, neatly fitted up for divine service. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A school-room was erected, and a school is supported, at the expense of the three copper companies, for the gratuitous instruction of the workmen's children. Mr. Lewis Thomas, in 1708, bequeathed a sum of money to the poor, now producing £2 per annum, which, with another trifling benefaction by Mr. John Jenkin, is annually distributed among them. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1025.12., of which sum, £489.3. is raised on the Higher, and £536.9. on the Lower, division.

LLANSANNAN (LLAN-SANNAN), a parish in the Higher division of the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W.) from Denbigh, containing 1383 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Sannan, the intimate friend and companion of the father of St. Winifred, who lived here in religious seclusion, and was buried near the remains of the latter at Gwytherin. The village is pleasantly situated at the head of the narrow vale of the river Aled, which rises in Llŷn Aled at no great distance, and in its course through the vale forms some interesting and picturesque cascades. The parish comprises a very considerable tract of arable and pasture land, of which by far the greater portion is enclosed; the soil, though various, is tolerably fertile. The surrounding scenery is almost totally devoid of natural beauty, and the country adjacent presents little more than an uninviting prospect of dreary wastes and mountainous ground. In the small vale near the village stands Dyfryn Aled, the seat of Pierce Wynne Yorke, Esq., a splendid mansion, built by his mother, the heiress of the estate: it is situated on the slope of a hill opposite the old house, which was for several generations a seat of the Wynne family. Fairs, chiefly for the sale of cattle, horses, sheep, and wool, are held annually on May 18th, August 17th, October 26th, and November 30th. The living consists of a rectory in two comportsions, and a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph; each portion of the rectory, of which one was united to the vicarage by act of parliament in the 29th and 30th of Charles II., is rated in the king's books at £6.10.5.; and the vicarage is rated at £5.0.10.; and both are in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is an ancient edifice, occupying a somewhat romantic situation, but possessing no architectural details of importance. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by the vicar, and there are at present twenty boys and twenty girls in it. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £973.4.

LLANSANNOR (LLAN-SAN-NWR), otherwise THAW, a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N.) from Cowbridge, containing 184 inhabitants. This place is situated on the river Thaw, which rises in the parish, and, proceeding by Cowbridge, in its course to which place it occasionally forms the boundary between Llansannor and Penllyne, falls into the channel, about six miles distant, where it forms the little harbour of Aberthaw. The soil is chiefly sandy, and the parish, which comprises about twelve hundred acres, is for the most part flat: the lands are, with the exception of a very small portion, enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. Llansannor House, formerly the residence of the lord of the manor; and Brigam, the property of Sir Charles Taylor, are both now in a greatly dilapidated condition, and in the occupation of tenants: near the latter are the remains of an ancient castle, formerly of some note in this part of the principality. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £7.15.7½., and in the patronage of J. F. Gwyn, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Senewyr, is a small ancient edifice: at the south end of the chancel is an ancient recumbent effigy of a warrior clad in armour, with a sword and shield, the head resting on a lion, and at the feet a dog. Mr. Edward Thomas, of Argoed, in this parish, bequeathed to the poor half the rent of a house and croft in the parish of St. Mary Hill, now producing £4 per annum. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £130.17.

LLANSANTFRAID (LLANSANTFREAD), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S.E.) from Brecknock, containing 190 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Fread, an Irish female saint, who appears to have been so highly venerated in Wales, that no fewer than nineteen churches in the principality have been consecrated to her memory. The western part of the parish obtained the appellation of Skethrog, by which it is at present distinguished, from Brochwel Ys-cythrog, Prince of Powys, to whom it descended by inheritance from his mother, who was a daughter of Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog. It does not appear that Brochwel ever resided upon this lordship, although tradition states that he was buried in the neighbouring parish of Llandeivailog-Vâch, where a rudely carved stone of very ancient character commemorates the interment of some British warrior. After the conquest of the ancient Brycheiniog by Bernard Newmarch, the lordship of Skethrog was conferred on one of his followers, named Miles Pitcher, or Pychard, by whom, or by one of his immediate descendants, a castellated mansion was erected on the bank of the river Usk, which was subsequently called the Tower, and of which there are still some remains incorporated with a farm-house of that name, which has been built upon the site. The parish is pleasantly situated on the north bank of the river Usk, by which it is bounded throughout its whole length, and is intersected, in the same direction, by the turnpike road from Brecknock to Crickhowel and Abergavenny. The lands, with the exception of a comparatively small portion, are enclosed, and in a good state of cultivation; and the soil is in general fertile and productive. The adjacent country abounds with richly varied and pleasingly picturesque scenery; and the views from the higher grounds comprehend many objects of interest and beauty. Among the most prominent of these may be noticed, in the foreground, the fertile and romantic Vale of Usk, with the river winding through a long succession of varying scenery, having richly wooded eminences on its opposite banks; and, in the distance, the majestic range of the Brecknockshire Beacons, with which the softer aspect of the vale is finely contrasted. Buckland, a spacious mansion originally erected about seventy years ago, by the late Roger Jones, Esq., then member for the county, and now, by marriage with the daughter of the late Thynne Howe Gwynne, Esq., whose father purchased it from the devisees of the original proprietor, the property of James Price Gwynne Holford, Esq., is beautifully situated on the banks of the river Usk, and sheltered by a lofty mountain, barren towards the summit, but having the acclivities, near its base, richly clothed with wood: the house has two fronts, of which that towards the river commands an extensive view down the Vale of Usk, and the other a more confined but romantic view of the mountains which enclose the vale on the south.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6.4.7., and in the patronage of the Earl of Ashburnham. Previously to the Reformation, the advowson was vested in the lord of the manor of Skethrog: it was subsequently granted to Roger Vaughan of Porthaml, from whom it descended to its present proprietor. A portion of the tithes, anciently appropriated to the free chapel of Pencelly, are now held by the lord of the manors of Buckland and Skethrog. The church, which was rebuilt in 1690, is a small edifice, consisting only of two low aisles, with a cupola at the west end, and is situated close to the road side: a gravestone to the memory of David Watkins, of Skethrog, who died on the 2nd of November, 1618, aged eighty-eight, records that he, his father, and his grandfather, lived in this parish for three hundred years: probably it may signify, only, that they were severally living in three different centuries. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Some small bequests have been made for the benefit of the poor, but having been neglected, they are now entirely lost. The Roman road from Caerlleon to the Gaer near Brecknock passes through the parish, from Cathedine on the east to Llanhamllèch on the west; and about half a mile from Skethrog, on the side of the London road, is a cylindrical stone, rising about three feet and a half out of the ground, bearing an inscription in Roman characters, of which only the letters VICTORINI are legible, and supposed to commemorate the interment of a son of Victorinus. The walls of the castellated mansion erected by Miles Pychard, and the small remains of which are incorporated in the walls of a farm-house, as above noticed, appear to have been from two to three yards in thickness; and a stone near the farm-house is said to bear a date, now covered with whitewash, of from seven to eight hundred years old: traces of a moat are still visible. Just above the turnpike road is a good house, called Skethrog, the property of Sir William Keppel, which, though not kept up as a family seat, is superior to many in the principality. The Rev. Thomas Vaughan, a man of eccentric habits, but of great genius, was a native of this parish, of which he was rector: he was ejected from his living during the usurpation of Cromwell, and subsequently became eminent for his skill in experimental philosophy, chemistry, and oriental literature; he was also a respectable Latin and English poet: a catalogue of his numerous publications has been preserved by Wood, in his "Athenæ Oxonienses." His brother, Henry Vaughan, Esq., M.D., author of the "Olor Iscanus," and several other poems, resided for some time in the parish, where he died in 1695, and was interred in the churchyard. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £110.16.

LLANSANTFRAID (LLAN - SANT - FRAID), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (S. by W.) from Aberystwith, containing 1206 inhabitants. The village, which is situated on the road from Cardigan to Aberystwith, consists only of a few houses of mean appearance: the parish is noted for its abundant produce of barley. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6.13.4., endowed with £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, is a commodious edifice, agreeably situated near the shore of Cardigan bay. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. Leland has recorded the existence here of a large building, but he was unable to determine whether or not it was the abbey of Llanfride, of which mention is made in the book "De Dotatione Ecclesiæ S. Davidis." Giraldus also speaks of Llansanfride nunnery, but it is equally uncertain whether this was situated here. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £304.5.

LLANSANTFRAID-CWM-TOYDDWR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES.—See CWM-TOYDDWR.

LLANSANTFRAID-GLÂN-CONWAY (LLAN-SANT-FRAID), otherwise DISERTH, a parish in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. E. by E.) from Aberconway, containing 1306 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the pleasant Vale of Conway: the village stands on the eastern bank of the river, on the road from Aberconway to Llanrwst, within five miles of the Irish sea. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £7.6.8. and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, is a spacious edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and south aisle, with two good east windows, containing some elegant remains of ancient stained glass. There are two places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one for Baptists. Four poor boys, the sons of parishioners, are instructed, in a school-house in the village, from an endowment of £2 per annum, being the interest of several small sums left for that purpose, amounting in the aggregate to £45. In a wood near Bryn y Pobty is an entire cromlech of considerable size; and in the farm-yard at that place is a copious spring of water, strongly impregnated with saline particles, and, within a few feet of it, a strong chalybeate spring, which deposits also a considerable quantity of sulphur on the sides of the well. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £495. 17.

LLANSANTFRAID-GLYN-DYVRDWCY (LLAN-SANT-FRAID-GLYN-DYVRDWCY), a parish in the hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (E.) from Corwen, containing 60 inhabitants. This parish, which was anciently a chapelry to that of Corwen, is pleasantly situated in the north-eastern extremity of the county, bordering upon that of Denbigh, and upon the banks of the river Dee. It comprises only four hundred and fifty acres, consisting of enclosed arable and pasture land, the whole of the waste lands within its limits having been enclosed by private agreement among the landholders, in the year 1807: the soil is principally stony and argillaceous. The surface is for the most part hilly, only a small tract on the margin of the Dee being subject to inundation: the Dee, which bounds the parish on the south, is here joined by a little rivulet called the Morwynion, which descends along its eastern border. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, and in many parts beautifully picturesque. From Tŷ'n y Caerau, above Rhagatt, in this parish, is a fine view, extending over the fertile vale of Edeyrnion, through which the Dee, in its numerous windings, appears and disappears amidst flourishing woods and plantations, assuming the appearance of small lakes scattered through the vale, in which the town of Corwen forms a prominent and interesting feature, and beyond which the Berwyn range of mountains is seen with peculiar advantage. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £1. 17. 1., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Fraid, or St. Bride, who flourished about the middle of the seventh century, is a neat and ancient edifice, in the early style of English architecture, and appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service: in the churchyard are three ancient yew trees of remarkably fine growth. In the village is a small building, now a dwelling-house, called Carchardy Owain Glyndwr, or "Owain Glyndwr's Prison House," in which that renowned chieftain is said to have confined the captives whom he took in battle. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £22. 7.

LLANSANTFRAID-GLYNN-CERIOW (LLAN-SANT-FRAID-GLYN-CEIRIOW), a parish in the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. S. W.) from Llangollen, containing 543 inhabitants. This parish, as the name implies, is situated on the river Ceiriog: the village occupies a low and very retired situation, entirely encompassed by lofty mountains. It contains slate of excellent quality and in abundance, in procuring which some extensive quarries are now being worked with much profit to the proprietors. The manufacture of flannel is carried on to a considerable extent; and on the stream of the Ceiriog are two fulling-mills, to which extensive bleaching-grounds are attached. Fairs are held on February 14th, May 1st, August 1st, and November 1st. The living is a perpetual curacy, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Viscount Dungannon. The church, dedicated to St. Bridget, has been recently rebuilt in the Grecian style of architecture: it is a handsome edifice, with a small square tower, and is situated on an eminence at some distance from the village. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school has been established for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of the parish, but it has no endowment, and is supported solely by subscription. A chalybeate spring in this parish, formerly in great repute for its medicinal efficacy, is now nearly lost by drainage. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £239. 17.

LLANSANTFRAID IN ELVEL (LLAN-SANT-FRAID YN ELVAEL), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. E. by E.) from Builth, containing 343 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road from Builth, through New Radnor, to Kington in the county of Hereford, and is surrounded by mountains of various elevation, interspersed with fertile tracts of land and denuded eminences. The surface is boldly undulating, and the hills present a singular, and in some instances a fantastic, variety of form and aspect. The lands, with the exception of the more hilly parts, are enclosed and in good cultivation: the soil in the lower grounds is of a clayey nature, but not unproductive; and the acclivities of the hills afford pasturage for sheep. The surrounding scenery, though in some parts pleasingly varied, is distinguished rather by features of wildness than of beauty. Within less than a mile of the church is a neat house, the residence of Hugh Vaughan, Esq., pleasantly situated, and forming a pleasing object in the scenery of the place. Colwyn, in this vicinity, has recently been made a polling-place in the election of a knight for the shire. This parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, valued in the king's books at £1. 6. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5. 14. 9½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Fread, or St. Bride, is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a tower at the west end, the upper part of which, having fallen, has been replaced by a slanting roof: the churchyard, which contains some fine old yew trees, has a very picturesque appearance, and commands a fine view of the surrounding mountains. A Sunday school is supported under the superintendence of the vicar of the parish and a few of the principal inhabitants, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children. An estate called Forest Colwyn, which is partly in this parish, and partly in that of Caregrina, adjoining, forms part of the endowment of the Boughrood charity, bequeathed by the Rev. Rees Powel, for the apprenticing of poor children and other charitable uses. There are but slight vestiges of Colwyn castle, erected here in 1242, by Ralph Mortimer, on the site of an ancient encampment supposed to have been of British origin, for the protection of his newly acquired lordship of Maelienydd, from which fortress the circumjacent hundred derived its name: they consist chiefly of the ancient lines of defence, and of a mound now covered with underwood and fir trees. A barrow near the site of this fortress, on being opened a few years ago, was found to contain a rude urn with burnt bones, &c. Near a stream in this parish, called Cam-nant-Rhôs, which is tributary to the river Edw, is a mineral spring, of which the water is strongly impregnated with sulphur. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £169. 5.

LLANSANTFRAID YN MECHAN (LLAN-SANT-FRAID-YN-MECHAIN), a parish partly in the upper division of the hundred of DEYTHUR, and partly in the lower division of the hundred of POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (E. by N.) from Llanvyllin, containing 1365 inhabitants, of which number, 808 are in the main body of the parish, on the northern side of the river Vyrnwy, and the remainder in the several townships of Collvryn, Llanerchilla, Tredderwen-Vawr, and Trewylan, on the southern side of the same stream: the portions in the several hundreds maintain their poor by a separate assessment. The parish is beautifully situated in a very picturesque part of the Vale of Vyrnwy, and is divided into two parts by the river which gives name to that rich and fertile vale: it comprises a very extensive tract of rich arable and pasture land; and in some parts of it is found abundance of peat, which forms the principal fuel of the inhabitants. The surrounding scenery is beautifully varied, and from the higher grounds the extensive vales of Salop and the Severn, with the lofty hills by which they are bounded, are pleasingly conspicuous. The turnpike road from Shrewsbury, through Llanvyllin, to Bala passes through the village, in which fairs are annually held on the Tuesday before Easter, May 22nd, and October 3rd. The living consists of both a rectory and a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph: the rectory, which is a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £14. 6. 8., and the vicarage, which is discharged, at £5. 17. 6.: both are in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, which appears to have been built at different periods, is a neat structure, principally in the early style of English architecture, and contains some good monuments: the interior was greatly improved in 1830, by the removal of the old benches and the substitution of regular pews. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school is supported by subscription, and from sixty to eighty children are at present gratuitously instructed in it. There are remains of several ancient British camps in this parish. In the hamlet of Trewylan, in a meadow of which the situation is very low, and has the appearance of having once been a morass, is a post corresponding exactly with the description given by Cæsar of the ancient British posts: it is seen very distinctly from the Meivod road, about a quarter of a mile from Pont y pentre. On the hill called the Voel, on the Llanvyllin road, are the remains of an old British camp, the site of which is in some degree concealed by the partial plantation of the hill; but the fosse and dyke are clearly discernible from Pont y pentre and the Llangedwin road. There was also a post on the latter road, occupying the summit of Winllan hill, of which the intrenchments, though not so clearly defined, may still be traced. About two miles distant are the remains of an ancient encampment, called Clawdd Côch, which from its form is supposed to have been of Roman construction. The situation of this post near the confluence of the rivers Tanat and Vyrnwy, and commanding the entrance into the vales of the Severn and Tanat, and also into that of Llsantfraid, was highly advantageous for the defence of the mines of Llanymynech, which are supposed to have been worked by the Romans. Being so close to the river Vyrnwy, it has suffered some demolition, part of the intrenchment on that side having been washed away by the river. This post, which is but little known, has been thought by some antiquaries to be the Mediolanum of Antoninus; but its relative distance from Heriri Mons, or Tommen y Môr, on one side, and from Rutunium and Uriconium, on the other, does not agree with that mentioned in the Itinerary. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £636. 9., of which sum, £253. 6. is raised on that portion of the parish which is in the hundred of Deythur, and £383. 3. on that which is in the hundred of Pool.

LLAN-SANT-SIOR, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES.—See KEGIDOCK.

LLANSAWEL (LLAN-SAWEL), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (N.) from Llandilovawr, on the road to Lampeter, comprising the hamlets of Edwinsford with Glynn, and Wen with Genol, separately supporting their own poor, and containing 1024 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the small river Cothy, and is intersected by a tributary of that river, which falls into it near the village: over each of these streams is a neat bridge. The lands are for the greater part enclosed and in a state of good cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified with wood and water, and from some of the higher grounds are fine prospects extending over a tract of well-cultivated country. Edwinsford, called in Welsh "Rhŷd Odyn," the seat of the family of Williams, whose ancestors have represented the county in parliament for several ages, and now the seat of Sir James Hamlyn Williams, Bart., is in this parish. It is beautifully situated on the eastern bank of the river Cothy, and is approached by a stately avenue of lofty trees: the mansion appears to have been formerly of greater magnitude; the grounds, which are extensive and judiciously disposed, comprehend much beautiful scenery. Upon one of the highest hills, a structure, erected by an ancestor of the present proprietor, probably as a fortress, though subsequently used as a place of amusement, and which formed a conspicuous object in the view, has long since been suffered to fall into decay. A market, which was formerly held here, has been for many years discontinued; but fairs are still held annually on the first Friday after the 12th of May, July 15th, October 23rd, and on the first Friday after the 12th of November. By the late Boundary Act this has been made a polling-place in the election of a knight for the shire. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Cayo, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's. There is a place of worship for Methodists. A school is partly supported by subscription. William Jones bequeathed £10, directing the interest to be divided annually among the poor communicants of this parish. John Thomas Philipps, preceptor to William Duke of Cumberland, and other members of the Royal Family, and author of some well-known Latin Epistles, was a native of this parish, to which he bequeathed £60 per annum for the support of a school for the gratuitous instruction of the children of the poor inhabitants, but, dying before his will was duly signed, the legacy was lost. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the entire parish is £344. 16.

LLANSILLIN (LLAN-SILIN), a parish principally in the Cynlleth and Mochnant division of the hundred of CHIRK, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, extending also into the English county of SALOP, in which it comprises the township of Sychdin, or Soughton, which separately maintains its own poor, 6 miles (W.) from Oswestry, and containing 1951 inhabitants, of which number, 1704 are in that part of the parish which is in the county of Denbigh. This parish, which is eight miles in length and averages about seven miles in breadth, is finely situated on the river Cynlleth: the lands are enclosed and in a high state of cultivation, and the soil is fertile and productive: the surrounding scenery is richly varied, and the views over the adjacent country abound with interest and variety. Glâscoed, an ancient seat of the family of Kyffin, afterwards conveyed by marriage to Sir William Williams, Speaker of the House of Commons, and now the property of his descendant, Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., forms an interesting feature in the scenery of the place. Plâs Newydd, formerly the seat of a branch of the Myddeltons of Chirk Castle; and Pen y Bont, at one period the property of the family of Maurice, are also within the parish. Here was likewise an old residence of Owain Glyndwr, called Sycharth, which was seated on an eminence and surrounded by a park, containing fishponds, deer, &c., the beauties of which are described by his bard, Iolo Gôch, in a poem still extant. It was occupied by this chief before his removal to Glyn-Dyvrwy, or the Valley of the Dee, between Llangollen and Corwen, where Sycharth has commonly, but erroneously, been supposed to have stood. The court of the manor of Cynllaith Owain was kept in the parlour of the mansion, until towards the close of the last century: at present there are scarcely any remains of the building. Above the house are the ruins of a keep, or castellet, surrounded with a high mound and deep ditch. The manufacture of flannel is carried on to a considerable extent, affording employment to many of the inhabitants, and on the river Cynlleth is an extensive fulling-mill. Fairs, chiefly for the sale of live stock, are annually held in the village on Easter Tuesday, July 10th, and October 2nd. The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £8, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Giles, is a spacious and handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a low tower. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Watkin Kyffin, in 1700, bequeathed £52, the interest of which he directed to be distributed in bread to the poor. Sir W. Myddelton, Bart., in 1717, gave £20; Sir William Williams, in 1740, bequeathed £200; Mrs. Ann Myddelton bequeathed £42; and Mr. Pryce Maurice, in 1775, gave £27, the interest of which sums, together with the produce arising from some portions of land severally bequeathed by Edward ab Thomas, in 1657, Edward Maurice, in 1732, Mrs. Rogers, and others, is annually distributed among the poor. This parish is incorporated with the adjacent one of Chirk and with nine or ten others in the county of Salop, for the common support of their poor in the house of industry at Oswestry: the average annual assessment upon it amounts to £350. 4.

LLANSPYTHID, or LLANSPYDDID (LLAN-SPYDDYD), a parish comprising the hamlets of Llan-spythid, or the "Church Hamlet," Modrŷdd and Penpont, each of which separately maintains its own poor, in the hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, and containing 514 inhabitants, of which number, 204 are in the hamlet of Llan-spythid, 2 miles (W.) from Brecknock. The name of this place, originally "Llan y Spitty," of which its modern appellation is said to be a corruption, is derived from an ancient hospitium, formerly supported here by the priory of Malvern, in the county of Worcester, to which establishment Milo Fitz-Walter granted the manor and advowson. The parish is bounded on the north by the river Usk, over which are three bridges, situated respectively at Aber Brân, Abercamlais, and Penpont: of these, the first was built and is kept in repair at the joint expense of the hundreds of Devynock and Merthyr-Cynog, and the other two, which are private property, are repaired by the proprietors of the lands in which they are situated. In the eastern part the parish is bounded by the river Tarell, which falls into the Usk near Brecknock; and in the lower part it is intersected by the turnpike road from Brecknock to Carmarthen, from which, near the former town, a branch leads through the upper part of the parish to Merthyr-Tydvil. The village is beautifully situated on the south bank of the river Usk, embosomed in a luxuriant grove of stately trees: the surrounding scenery is highly picturesque, and the views over the Vale of Usk and the adjacent country are rich in every variety of romantic beauty. From the village towards Aber Brân the vale is exceedingly narrow; but the view of the river below Venni-Vâch wood, with the richly wooded heights which enclose the vale, is beautifully picturesque, to which the church of Aberyscir forms a pleasing addition. Beyond Aber Brân the vale expands considerably; and the river is seen winding its devious course through the fine grounds of Penpont, the seat of Penry Williams, Esq., situated in the hamlet of that name, which is noticed under its own head, and in which it forms an interesting and highly ornamental feature. Abercamlais, the seat of the Rev. John Williams, and the remains of Aber Brân, the ancient seat of another branch of that family, are also in the hamlet of Penpont; and all three are situated within a mile of each other, on the south bank of the river Usk.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5.17.8½., and in the patronage of Marquis Camden, who is impropiator of the great tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Cattwe, and situated near the high road, is a long low building, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a small belfry at the west end: the churchyard is planted with yew trees, several of which have attained a prodigious growth, but are now beginning to decay: one of these, which are considered to be some of the finest in the county, is twenty-seven feet in girth: in the cemetery was formerly an ancient stone, inscribed with a rude cross, which is said to have commemorated Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog, or his father. The vicarage-house, to which about five acres of glebe land are attached, is a very indifferent building, situated in the village. In the hamlet of Penpont is a chapel called Capel Bettws. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists, the latter of which is in the hamlet of Mordrydd. Mr. Tobias Williams, in 1657, bequeathed a small portion of land, the produce to be distributed in bread to the poor of this parish; and Mrs. Catherine James, in 1721, bequeathed the sum of £260, since laid out in the purchase of land, the produce to be distributed in bread, in equal proportions, among the poor of the parishes of Llanspythid and St. David's, and of the chapelry of St. Mary's. On a hill above Aber Brân are the remains of a small encampment, called the Gaer, apparently of British origin: it is nearly of an oval form, and is defended by a single rampart: this fortification, which crowns the summit of the hill, commands a magnificent view of the Vale of Usk, with the windings of the river, on the opposite bank of which, and immediately in front of the Gaer, is another eminence, crowned with a similar intrenchment. In the vale, near the influx of a small rivulet into the Usk near Penpont, was a castle, built by Einon Sais, a Welsh chieftain who attended Edward III. in most of his wars, and was present at the memorable battles of Cressy and Poitiers: this castle afterwards descended to Sir David Gam, but not a vestige of it is now distinguishable. At some distance to the south-west, at a place called Blaengwithid, are traces of the "Sarn Lleon," a Roman road, originally extending from the station Deva (Chester) to Nidum (Neath); but after passing an artificial mound, supposed to have been the site of an exploratory station, and subsequently of a fort, or keep, probably constructed in the reign of John, by Maud de St. Valeri, wife of William de Breos, it is lost in its course into the Vale of Usk, where it crossed the Via Julia Montana from Caerlleon, by the "Gaer" near Brecknock, to Maridunum. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £401.1., of which sum, £153.15. is assessed on the hamlet of Llanspythid.

LLANSTADWELL (LLAN-STADWELL), a parish in the hundred of Rhôs, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E. by S.) from Milford, containing 733 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the northern shore of Milford Haven, comprises a considerable tract of fertile and well-cultivated land, with some portions of hilly ground, which, from its steepness, is but ill adapted to repay the expense and labour of cultivation. At Nayland, which is situated within its limits, it was once in contemplation to construct a dock-yard, for which purpose some lands in the vicinity were purchased, on both sides of the harbour, on which to erect works for its security and defence. Considerable progress had been made in the erection of one of the fortresses on the opposite side of the haven, but upon the death of the late Sir John Philipps, father of the late Lord Milford, who was the principal promoter of the design, the plan was abandoned, after two ships of war only had been built, both of which, the "Prince of Wales," of seventy-four guns, and the "Milford" frigate, were built by contract. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, combining the fine expanse of water in the haven on the south, and the spacious open channel on the west, with extensive tracts of richly cultivated country on the north and east. In the vicinity are several good houses, of which there are within the parish, Jordans-ton, the property of the Rev. Thomas Wilson; Hays-ton, the residence of R. Matthias, Esq.; and Newton, a dilapidated old house on a valuable estate belonging to Lewis Child, Esq. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7.17., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lewis Child, Esq., to whom two-thirds of the great and small tithes were impropriated, the remaining third belonging to the vicar. Mr. Child has recently disposed of the greater part of his tithes to the respective proprietors of the lands. The church, dedicated to St. Tudwal, is an ancient structure in good repair, pleasantly situated on the margin of the haven, in the southern part of the parish. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. Some remains of two ancient British encampments, comprising each an area of about one acre, are visible; one is situated at the north-eastern extremity of the parish, nearly opposite the village of Rhôsmarket, and the other at its south-western extremity, on a point on the shore of Milford Haven. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £267.13.

LLANSTEPHAN (LLAN-STEPHAN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. S. W.) from Carmarthen, containing 1274 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Stephen, was distinguished at a very early period for a fortress of great strength, erected on the summit of a bold eminence projecting into the bay of Carmarthen, and defending the entrance of the river Towy, which falls into the bay at this place. By whom, or at what precise time, it was founded is unknown. Cadell, Meredydd and Rhŷs, sons of the late Gruffydd ab Rhŷs, Prince of South Wales, having, in 1143, possessed themselves of Carmarthen castle, were encouraged to appear before that of Llanstephan, the relief of which was attempted by a large body of Anglo-Normans; but success still attending the arms of the Welsh chieftains, these forces were defeated, and the fortress was taken. Meredydd, to whom its custody was entrusted, was here vigorously assailed by the Normans, who soon after laid siege to it. The Welsh commander suffered them to complete their preparations for the attack; the scaling ladders were fixed and manned; but just as the assailants were gaining the battlements he brought certain engines, which he had contrived for that purpose, to bear upon the enemy, and precipitated them to the ground. The Normans, frustrated in their attempt upon the castle, raised the siege and retired; but after a short time renewing their attempts, they ultimately obtained possession of it. In 1216, it was taken and destroyed by Llewelyn ab Iorwerth; and after being rebuilt, it was successfully attacked, in 1254, by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd.

The parish is beautifully situated on the shore of Carmarthen bay; an excellent turnpike road leads from the village to Carmarthen, and a ferry across the river Towy communicates with the village of Ferry-side, on the opposite shore, in the parish of St. Ishmael's. The waste lands were enclosed by act of parliament obtained in 1807, under the provisions of which a very considerable portion was allotted to the respective landowners. The appearance of the village is peculiarly interesting; but, from its retired situation, being distant from any great thoroughfare, it is not much frequented by visitors: it unites all the advantages of a maritime situation with the tranquil retirement of an inland village, and has a greater number of opulent families resident in it than any other village in the neighbourhood of Carmarthen. The surrounding scenery is highly pleasing, and, in many parts of the parish, beautifully picturesque; the views over the fine open bay are interesting and extensive; and the course of the river Towy, with its richly wooded banks, still further enlivens and diversifies the prospect. Within the parish are some elegant seats and handsome residences, which add greatly to the beauty and to the variety of the scenery. Llanstephan Place, the seat of George Mears, Esq., is an elegant modern mansion, built upon an estate formerly belonging to the family of Lloyd: it is beautifully situated in a richly wooded demesne, with a fine open lawn sloping gradually from the front of the house to the margin of the Towy. Laques, the seat of William Lloyd, Esq., descended from the ancient family of that name, the former proprietors of Llanstephan Place, is a substantial family residence, now much neglected, in a very sequestered part of the parish, containing some pleasing rural scenery. Llanstephan Cottage, the residence of Thomas Morris, Sen., Esq., is finely situated near the river, sheltered in the rear by rising grounds covered with young plantations: the grounds, which are tastefully disposed, open upon the sands, which are peculiarly fine, and in summer afford to the inhabitants an interesting and agreeable marine promenade. The living, rated as a vicarage in the king's books at £8. 13. 4., is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £1500 parliamentary grant, and in the joint patronage of Messrs. Morris, bankers of Carmarthen, and William Lloyd, Esq., of Laques, who are impropiators of the tithes. The church is dedicated to St. Stephen. In the hamlet of Llanybree was formerly a chapel of ease, which, in ancient records, is called the Marble Church, and is now appropriated to the use of a congregation of Independents. There is also another place of worship for Independents, and one each for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. There are some remains of the ancient castle, consisting chiefly of the shell, which is tolerably entire, especially the principal entrance: from the towers, which are still accessible by means of the ancient staircase, though greatly dilapidated, may be obtained a fine marine view, embracing a portion of the Glamorganshire and Pembroke-shire coasts. St. Anthony's well, in this parish, was anciently in very high repute for the many miraculous cures effected by the water, under the auspices of its patron saint; but it is now entirely neglected. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £709. 15.

LLANSTEPHAN (LLAN-STEPHAN), a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by N.) from Hay, containing 268 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is situated upon the river Wye, which here forms the boundary line between the counties of Radnor and Brecknock, and is separated by the small river Bâchwy from the adjacent parish of Llandeilo-Graban. The greater portion of the land is unenclosed and uncultivated; and the surrounding scenery, though pleasingly varied, and enlivened by the meandering Wye, is not characterized by any peculiarity of feature. An elegant cottage residence, built by the late W. Wilkins, Esq., of Maeslough, and now the property of Miss Elizabeth Walker, forms an interesting object in the scenery of the place. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Brecknock, to whom the tithes are appropriated. The church, dedicated to St. Stephen, and situated on the summit of a rocky eminence of considerable elevation, is not distinguished by any architectural details. A Sunday school is supported by subscription, and gratuitously superintended by a few individuals of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £160. 4.

LLANSTINAN (LLAN-STINAN), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. by W.) from Fishguard, containing 168 inhabitants. The name appears to be derived by contraction from the name of the saint (Justinian) to whom the church is dedicated. The parish is pleasantly situated near the source of the Western Cleddy river, by which it is separated from that of Fishguard, and comprises a large portion of enclosed arable and pasture land: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and the views from the higher grounds embrace extensive prospects over the adjacent country, which abounds with interesting features. The ancient mansion of the family of Symmons, which had been suffered to remain in a neglected state for some time, has been modernized or rebuilt, and is now the handsome seat of Col. Owen, eldest son of Sir John Owen, Bart., lord-lieutenant of the county. The turnpike road from Haverfordwest to Fishguard passes through the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir John Owen, Bart., who is lessee of the tithes under the subchanter in the cathedral church of St. David's. The church is not distinguished by any interesting architectural details. The annual average expenditure for the support of the poor is £50. 4.

LLANTHETTY, or LLANDDETTY (LLAN-DDETTI), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N.W.) from Crickhowel, near the road to Brecknock, consisting of the hamlets of Dyfryn and Vro, which separately support their own poor, and containing 579 inhabitants. This parish extends from the south bank of the river Usk, which forms its northern boundary, to the confines of Glamorganshire: it is separated from the parish of Llangynidr, in the hundred of Crickhowel, by the river Crawnnon, and from the parish of Llanvigan by the river Carvanell. The surface of the surrounding country is irregular, and agreeably diversified with wood and water: the river Usk, the banks of which are in many places richly wooded, forms several pleasing waterfalls in its progress over its rocky channel: several of the adjacent hills are lofty and clothed with wood, and from some of them are obtained extensive prospects. From that called Tâf-Voel it is said that portions of thirteen counties may be seen: on the north are the Black Mountains of Talgarth, and to the east the Sugar Loaf mountain, on the border of Monmouthshire. Llanthetty Hall, beautifully situated in a very secluded part of the Vale of Usk, being embosomed in lofty hills clothed with luxuriant woods, is the neat mansion of Mrs. Overton: the grounds are pleasing, and the views from them, though not extensive, are very beautiful. The village of Llanthetty is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Usk, on the opposite side of which runs the turnpike road from Brecknock to Crickhowel and Abergavenny. On the banks of the Carvanell, just above its confluence with the Usk, two miles eastward from the church, stands the considerable village of Tâl y bont. Here is a carding-mill, connected with the manufacture of the coarse woollen cloth of the country. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal passes through the parish from north-west to south-east, affording means for the exportation of the coal and limestone procured in the neighbouring parishes, and the importation of articles of merchandise from Bristol and Newport. On its banks, at Tâl y bont, are some limekilns and coal wharfs, to which the above-mentioned minerals are brought by an iron railroad, which, from the mountains to the south, has branches to the Tredegar, Romney, and Bute iron-works. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. 7½., and in the patronage of James Gwynne Holford, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Detta, is a neat structure, in the later style of English architecture, consisting only of a small nave and chancel, with a low tower at the western end, and is appropriately fitted up for the accommodation of the parishioners: it is situated within a few yards of the Usk, in the township of Dyfryn. In that of Vro is the chapel of Tâf-Vechan, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rector of Llanthetty. The Rev. John Davies, rector of the parish in 1727, charged certain lands with the annual payment of the interest of £20, for the instruction of poor children of this parish, in the Catechism of the Church of England, and to teach them to write their name, but the bequest has been rendered unavailable through neglect. In constructing that part of the Brecknock and Abergavenny canal which passes through this parish, a Roman sacrificial instrument, called a secespita, was discovered; and in digging for the same purpose in a wet and marshy wood several trees were found, at the depth of four or five feet below the surface, entirely black, and of a peculiarly hard consistency. The Roman road from Tibia Annis, near Cardiff, to the station at Caer Bannau, near Brecknock, traverses the parish from south to north, inclining to the eastward as it descends into the Vale of Usk and crosses the river Carvanell. Maes-mawr, in this parish, of which he was a native, was once the residence of Jenkin Jones, a colonel in the parliamentary army during the civil war of the seventeenth century, who distinguished himself by his republican principles and determined hostility to the established church: so violent were these that, on being informed of the landing of Charles II., at the Restoration, he is said to have mounted his horse, ridden through the churchyard, and, discharging a pistol at the church door, in which the perforation made by the ball is still shown, he exclaimed aloud, "Ah! thou whore of Babylon, thou'lt have it all thy own way now." The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £327. 13.

LLANTHEW (LLAN-DDEW), a parish partly in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, and partly in that of PENCELLY, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 1½ mile (N.N.E.) from Brecknock, containing 323 inhabitants. This parish, which takes its name from the saint to whom the church is dedicated, was anciently a residence of the Bishops of St. David's, who had a castellated mansion here, which was in ruins in the time of Leland, who also speaks of a house belonging to the archdeacon of Brecknock, which had likewise fallen into decay. During the Interregnum, the manor was seized by the parliament, and sold to David Morgan, Esq., but was recovered to the see of St. David's after the Restoration. The village is pleasantly situated on the river Honddû, about a mile and a half above its confluence with the Usk at Brecknock, and within half a mile of the high road from Brecknock to Hay, which intersects the parish: it compactly surrounds the church, the cemetery attached to which commands a delightful view of a rich landscape, bounded by the bold eminences on the northern side of the Vale of Usk, and by the heights enclosing the woody glen through which the Honddû flows, the whole for the most part presenting a scene of high cultivation. The Bishop of St. David's holds a court leet annually, at which his steward presides, and anciently a court baron was also held here, but this has long been discontinued. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Mr. Phillpotts, as lessee of the tithes under the Archdeacon of Brecknock. The church, dedicated to St. Dewi, or David, and one of the oldest religious edifices in the county, is a cruciform structure, in the early style of English architecture, anciently spacious, but now greatly dilapidated: from the intersection rises a low tower having a conical roof, erected in 1621: the windows are lancet-shaped, and appear to have been originally surmounted with handsome freestone mouldings. There are some remains of the chapel of the ancient episcopal mansion, consisting of the side walls, in which are three pointed windows, and also of portions of the end walls, in which are windows of the same form: there are likewise slight vestiges of other portions of the edifice, chiefly of outer walls. In 1188, Archbishop Baldwin, accompanied by Giraldus Cambrensis, when on his tour through Wales to preach the crusades, passed a night at this castle. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £166. 7., of which sum, £62. 13. is raised on that portion of the parish which is in the hundred of Merthyr-Cynog, and £103. 14. on that which is in the hundred of Pencelly.

LLANTHOYSAINT (LLAN Y DDEUSANT), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Llangadock, comprising the hamlets of Blaen-Sawdde with Maes y Fynnon, and Quarter Mawr with Gwydre, each separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 1006 inhabitants. This place is beautifully situated in the south-eastern part of the county, on the confines of Brecknockshire, from which it is separated by the chain of hills called the Black Mountain, of which a considerable portion is within the parish: the lands, with the exception of this mountainous district, are enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified, combining features of picturesque and rural beauty with objects of bold and romantic grandeur. That part of the Black Mountain which is within the parish forms the loftiest elevation in the county; and near the base of its highest summit, called the Van, or "Beacon," is a fine lake of beautifully clear and transparent water, in the form of a parallelogram, nearly a mile in length, and about sixteen fathoms deep. The majestic grandeur of the precipitous rocks which impend over this lake, and the wild character of the surrounding objects, give to this extensive sheet of water a strikingly romantic appearance, which is finely contrasted with the scenery by which the lower grounds in its vicinity are distinguished. Though its situation is so elevated that the snow remains unmelted upon its border for the greater part of the year, yet its waters abound with trout of superior quality, and with eels of extraordinary size. The river Sawdde has its source in this lake, and, after traversing the parish, falls into the river Towy, near Llangadock. A fair is annually held in the village on the 10th of October. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Llangadock, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Simon and St. Jude, is not remarkable for any architectural details. There is a place of worship for Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £193. 13.

LLANTRISAINT (LLAN-TRISANT), a parish partly in the hundred of MENAI, but chiefly in that of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (W.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 537 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the western part of the island, and is intersected by the small river Alaw, comprehends a tract of about four thousand four hundred and sixty acres of arable and pasture land, of which the greater portion is enclosed. The surface is boldly undulated, rising into abrupt eminences of various elevation and aspect: the soil is for the most part poor, consisting chiefly of a hungry clay, fit only for the cultivation of oats. Copper-ore has been found in considerable quantities upon Meinir farm; but no mines of it have hitherto been opened.

The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Ceidio, Gwredog, Llanllibio, and Llêcheyn-varwydd annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £15, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Avran, St. Ieuan, and St. Sanan, from which circumstance the parish derives its name, signifying the church of three saints, was originally founded in the year 570. The present is a good modern edifice of comparatively recent erection: it contains a neat plain monument to the memory of Dr. Hugh Williams, founder of the families of Wynnstay, Bodelwyddan, and Penbedw. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A small parochial school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children was founded in 1822: it has an endowment of £8 per annum, for which ten children are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic: the instruction of others is paid for by subscription. Three poor men from this parish are eligible to the almshouses at Beaumaris, under the will of the founder, David Hughes, who endowed them with the farm called Meinir, here situated, and with various other lands for the support of the inmates. The same benefactor, by his will, dated December 30th, 1609, after providing for the maintenance and support of the school and almshouses at Beaumaris, directs that any surplus should be distributed among the poor of this parish; but although a considerable surplus has been accumulating for many years, no distribution has yet been made. The affairs of the charity are at present under the investigation of the Lord Chancellor, and it is expected that a very considerable distribution will eventually be made among the poor, according to the tenour of the will. The above-named David Hughes was a native of this parish, and having by persevering industry amassed a very ample property, thus charitably appropriated a considerable portion of it for the benefit of the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £293. 13.

LLANTRISSENT (LLAN-TRI-SAINT), a borough, market town, and parish, in the hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 10 miles (N. W. by W.) from Cardiff, and 169 (W.) from London, containing 2789 inhabitants. This place, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to three different saints, is distinguished by few historical events of importance. At what time or by whom its castle was originally built, is not accurately known; but it is enumerated among those for which Gilbert de Clare, commonly called "the Red," Lord of Glamorgan, did homage to Edward I., on his accession to the titles and estates of his family, after the death of his father, towards the end of the thirteenth century. Edward II., with his favourite the younger Spencer, was taken prisoner near this town, by the queen's forces, and conveyed to Hereford. The town is romantically situated, on the road from Cowbridge to Merthyr-Tydvil, in a pass over a mountainous ridge, between two lofty hills, and is irregularly and indifferently built; but its whitewashed houses, with the dismantled tower of its castle, form a conspicuous and interesting feature in the scenery on approaching the mountains. The vicinity is indescribably beautiful and highly picturesque; and the views embrace a tract of country abounding with features of romantic character and almost unrivalled magnificence. The prospect from the brow of the hill on which the town is built embraces the whole of the Vale of Glamorgan, from its eastern extremity to the influx of the river Ogmore into the Bristol channel: among the numerous interesting objects which this extensive tract of country exhibits are the rich woods about Hensol, Glan-elay, and Lanharan; beyond which is discerned the Bristol channel, with the distant hills on the English coast, and in other directions the lofty mountains which bound it on various sides. To the north of the town the appearance of the country becomes more rugged, and assumes a wilder aspect, which is in some degree enlivened by the pleasing appearance of Castella, an ancient seat of the family of Traherne, now the property and residence of Major Smith, which forms a lively and cheerful object in a landscape of which the prevailing character is that of sombre magnificence. At the entrance to the town is a substantial stone mansion, called Llantrissent House, the seat of Richard Fowler Rickards, Esq.

The parish abounds with coal, which is worked to a very great extent for the supply of the great iron-works in the neighbouring districts, and for exportation. Ores of iron and lead have also been found in great quantities, and works have been established here for procuring those minerals; but they have not been conducted with a sufficient degree of profit to remunerate the adventurers, and have consequently been discontinued. The principal of these was the Park mine, about a mile to the south of the town, the ore obtained in which was of the species called galena, or potters' ore, lying in a vein extending from east to west, and contained in a matrix of spar, in magnesian limestone resting upon coal. Some years ago an ancient colliery, not properly filled up, was accidentally discovered by R. F. Rickards, Esq., when a young man, who, by falling into it, was burnt to the bone on the fore part of the foot and leg: it contained a large quantity of pyrites, which had ignited, and had been in a state of combustion for a very long period: it is still burning, and probably will continue to burn, so long as any inflammable matter may remain. A rail-road has been constructed from the Dinas colliery, which communicates with the Cardiff and Merthyr canal at Newbridge. The market, which is only for provisions, is on Friday: the corn market has been removed to Newbridge, five miles off. Great cattle fairs are held on February 13th, May 12th, August 12th, and October 29th. It has not been precisely ascertained at what time the town received its first charter of incorporation: it has a charter dated the 20th of Edward III. The corporation consists of the constable of the castle, a portreeve, twelve aldermen, and an unlimited number of burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, serjeant at mace, and other officers: the portreeve is annually elected from among the aldermen, who fill up vacancies in their number by a majority of their own body. Llantrissent is one of eight contributory boroughs, namely, Cardiff, Llantrissent, Cowbridge, Aberavon, Kenfig, Neath, Swansea, and Loughor, which returned one member to parliament: the right of election was in the burgesses at large, at present about four hundred and twenty in number. By the late act for amending the representation of the people, the boroughs of Cardiff, Cowbridge, and Llantrissent have been constituted a separate district, returning one member; and the right of voting has been vested in the resident burgesses, ninety-eight in number, and in those within seven miles, in number one hundred and twelve, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act; also in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act directs: the present number of tenements of this value, within the limits of the borough, which extend about a mile from the town in every direction, comprising the whole of the town hamlet and parts of other hamlets, and are not altered by the late boundary act, is seventy-two, most of which are occupied by burgesses. The freedom is inherited by all the children of a burgess, and is acquired by servitude of seven years' apprenticeship to a resident freeman, by marriage with a freeman's daughter, and by election of a jury of twelve burgesses upon paying double fees on admission. The corporation are empowered by their charter to hold a court of record for the recovery of debts, but it has been for many years discontinued. The petty sessions for the hundred of Miskin are held in this town every Friday. The town-hall and the market-place are of modern erection, and are neat buildings well adapted to their uses.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £26.14.2., endowed with the vicarial tithes of the parishes of Aberdare, Lantwit Vairdre, Llanwonno, and Ystradyvodog, and in the patronage of the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Gloucester. The church, dedicated to St. Dyvnog, St. Iddog, and St. Menw, is a spacious and ancient structure, in the Norman style of architecture, occupying the summit of the hill above the town. There are two chapels in this parish, one dedicated to St. John the Baptist, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £1000 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Mrs. Pritchard. The other, called Tâl y garn, after being long suffered to fall gradually into decay, has been recently repaired through the instrumentality of Dr. Lisle, who has a summer residence at this place: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford. The Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, have each one place of worship in the town; the Independents have also additional places of worship at Cymmer and Crossvaen; and the Methodists one at Velin Vawr within the parish. A National school for the gratuitous instruction of children of both sexes is supported principally by the Marquis of Bute, who contributes fifty guineas per annum, and by subscription among the gentry resident in the neighbourhood. The school is well conducted under the auspices of the Marquis, at whose expense six boys, who are selected as teachers, and clothed with two suits in the year, are apprenticed, when at a proper age, with a premium of £10. Mr. Gibbon, of Newton House, in the parish of Llanblethian, bequeathed £4.19. per annum, to be distributed among the poor of this parish, at the discretion of the vicar; and, under the will of Sir Leoline Jenkins, £20 is distributed in clothing, every fourth year, by the master of Cowbridge school, among the poor of this parish, of whom the vicar nominates such as he thinks the most deserving.

There are but small remains of the ancient castle, which originally consisted of two wards, and appears to have been a place of great strength: these consist principally of a portion of one of the towers, which, from its elevated situation, forms a very conspicuous and interesting feature in the scenery of the place. In 1829, in clearing away the rubbish which had accumulated about the foundations, the workmen discovered the dungeon which, according to Leland, had anciently formed the prison for the territories of Miskin and Glin Rhondda. At a short distance from the town, to the right of the road leading to Llandaf, are some remains of an ancient religious house, said to have been a monastery dedicated to St. Cawrdav, son of Caradoc Vraichvras, regulus of Brecknock, about the end of the fifth, or the beginning of the sixth, century. Within the limits of the parish are several ancient camps, of which the most important is that called Caerau, or "the fortifications," supposed to have been constructed by the Danes. Castella, the ancient family mansion of the Trahernes, appears also from its name to have been built upon the site of some ancient fortification, which may probably have been an outpost to the castle of Llantrissant. There are chalybeate springs in several parts of the parish. Sir Leoline Jenkins, who, in the reign of Charles II., was eminently distinguished as a jurist, diplomatist, and statesman, was born in this parish, and was buried in the chapel of Jesus' College, Oxford, to which he had been so munificent a benefactor as to be in some degree regarded as its second founder: he endowed the grammar school at Cowbridge, and bequeathed the principal part of his estates to charitable uses. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1288. 15.

LLANTRITHYD (LLAN-TRYDDYD), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E. S. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 221 inhabitants. On the conquest of Glamorgan by Robert Fitz-Hamon, and its subsequent division, the castle and manor of Llantrithyd were assigned to Hywel ab Iestyn ab Gwrgan, with the privilege of exercising jura regalia therein. The castle was demolished, in 1151, by Meredith, great grandson of Rhys ab Tewdwr. The village, which stands about a mile to the south of the road between Cardiff and Swansea, occupies a secluded situation in a well-wooded valley, which is watered by a small rivulet. Llantrithyd House, formerly the seat of the Bassets, and subsequently of the Aubreys, is now in ruins: it was a fine specimen of the style that prevailed in the reign of Henry VI., with later additions, and is stated by tradition to have afforded an asylum, during the Commonwealth, to many great and learned men of the Church of England, by whom academical degrees were here conferred. On a rising ground above the village is pleasantly situated Tŷvree, a cottage ornée, the residence of Henry Seymour, Esq., who is proprietor of a considerable part of the parish, and to whom also belongs an extra-parochial farm of about one hundred and twenty acres, called Caer-main, together with twenty-four acres contiguous, also tithe-free. Limestone abounds in the parish, in which also a considerable quantity of lead-ore is found. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £8.13. 4., and in the patronage of Sir Thomas Aubrey, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Illtyd, is a respectable edifice, containing a few ancient monuments, among which may be particularly noticed a stately one to the memory of a knight and his lady, of the Basset family, in the best character of the style which prevailed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. In the churchyard is a remarkable yew tree, which, at the height of six feet from the ground, measures twenty-six feet in girth, and near the root, little less than forty feet. The ancient hall, wherein the manorial courts were held, still remains, and having been applied, since the abolition of the independent jurisdictions of the lordships marcher, to the reception of the poor, it is now called "the Church House." Here is a mineral spring, the water of which is said to be efficacious in the cure of fluxes. The poor of this parish are entitled to the produce of two acres of land in the parish of St. Hilary, purchased with £45, the bequest of an unknown benefactor, and to the interest of £50, bequeathed, in 1744, by Mrs. Lougher. The average annual expenditure for their support is £76. 7.

LLANTYD (LLAN-ILLTYD), a parish in the hundred of KILGERRAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S. W. by S.) from Cardigan, containing 281 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Illtyd, an eminent teacher of Christianity, who died about the close of the fifth century. It is pleasantly situated in the north-eastern part of the county, near the separation of the two great roads leading respectively from Cardigan to Fishguard and Haverfordwest, and comprises a large tract of arable and pasture land, of which the whole is enclosed. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing; and the views over the adjacent country are agreeably diversified. The living is a vicarage not in charge, annexed, with that of Monington, or Eglwys Wythwr, to the vicarage of St. Dogmael's, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 royal bounty. The church is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. John Jones, in 1729, bequeathed a small sum of money towards the relief of poor persons of this parish not receiving parochial aid, the interest of which is annually distributed according to the will of the testator. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £77. 18.

LLANTYSILLIO, or LLANDYSILIO (LLANTYSILIO), a parish in the hundred of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (N. W. by W.) from Llangollen, containing 842 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Tysilio, a canonized prince of Powys, who was descended from St. Pabo, called Post Prydain, "the Pillar of Britain," and who, having devoted himself to a life of religious seclusion, flourished as a writer till the middle of the seventh century. It is pleasantly situated on the river Dee, which forms its southern boundary, and is skirted on the north by the small river Mer Enion; on the west it is bounded by the parish of Corwen; and on the east by a small river running through the Vale of Crucis, by which it is separated from the parish of Llangollen. The surface is boldly undulated, and in some parts mountainous: the soil, though various, is in general fertile, and the surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified, and in many parts beautifully picturesque. A chain of mountains of romantic appearance and rich in mineral wealth runs through the centre of the parish, which is also intersected by the turnpike road leading from Llangollen to Ruthin. Slate is found in abundance, and some extensive quarries are now being worked, in which about seventy men find constant employment. Lime-works upon a large scale are also carried on adjacent to the canal, and on the banks of the river Dee, which in this part of its course flows over a rocky and rugged bed between two lofty crags, which scarcely afford a breadth of channel sufficient for the passage of its stream. By means of a weir this river is here made to afford a feeder for the supply of the Ellesmere canal, which is carried along the northern bank of the Dee to the main canal at Pont y Cyssyltau, a distance of six miles, throughout the whole of which it is navigable, affording great facilities for bringing in coal for the supply of the neighbourhood, and for conveying the slates from the quarries and the produce of the lime-works to their several destinations. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £1500 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart. The church is a small edifice, with a cupola, possessing no architectural claims to notice: the walls of the interior are thickly covered with plates, inscribed with the names of persons who have been buried there, and affixed opposite to the several pews of the families of which they were members.

About a mile to the north-east of the village, but within the parish, and in a highly romantic portion of the Vale of Eglwyseg, are the venerable and picturesque ruins of the ancient abbey of Llan Egwest, or Valle Crucis. This beautiful edifice was originally founded about the year 1200, for brethren of the Cistercian order, and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, by Madoc ab Gruffydd Maelor, lord of Bromfield, and of the neighbouring fortress of Castell Dinas Brân, who so richly endowed it, that a native Welsh poet of the fifteenth century, in celebrating the hospitality of the abbot, describes him as living in the most sumptuous style. At the dissolution its revenue was estimated at £214. 3. 5.: it continued in the hands of the crown till the 9th of James I., when the site and remains were granted to Edward Wotton. The present remains consist principally of part of the abbey church, originally an elegant cruciform structure, chiefly in the early style of English architecture, though erected at different periods, and consequently containing portions of the decorated and later English styles; and also of a small portion of the conventual buildings, now occupied as farm offices. Among the most entire parts of this interesting ruin is the west front of the church, remarkable for the beauty of its finely arched entrance, surmounted by a decorated window of elegant design, enriched with flowing tracery, above which is a marigold window of still more exquisite workmanship. The east end of the church is also in good preservation, forming an elegant specimen of the early English style, with narrow lancet-shaped windows. The interior is overgrown with grass, and some stately ash and sycamore trees have taken deep root within the walls of the roofless edifice. The pilasters of the interior are clustered, and have elegantly carved capitals: the transept contains a small cloister of two arches, and a mural sepulchral arch. A portion of the abbey has long been converted into a farm-house; and in one part of the conventual buildings, now occupied as a cow-shed, is a fine Norman arch, near which is a beautifully pointed window; other portions of the remains also exhibit some elegant specimens of the more highly finished and later periods of the Norman, verging into the earlier period of the early English, style. In front of the inhabited portion is a large pointed window reaching to the ground, with mullions and elegant tracery; and a room which once formed the dormitory is supported by three rows of groined arches, resting on circular pillars. The various buildings are chiefly composed of the schistose materials which every where abound in the vicinity; but the doorways, window frames, and other decorated portions are all of freestone brought from a considerable distance. Within the abbey were interred its founder, his son Gruffydd ab Madoc, and several of its abbots; but their tombs can no longer be distinguished among the mouldering ruins of this once stately and still venerable pile. At no great distance from these highly picturesque and interesting remains, opposite the second milestone from Llangollen, is a monumental pillar of very remote antiquity, raised upon a small tumulus, in which, on its being opened, was discovered a kistvaen, or stone chest, containing human bones: it is commonly supposed to have been erected as a cross, and from it the abbey of Valle Crucis most probably derived its name. This singular piece of antiquity, commonly called the pillar of Eliseg, appears, from an inscription now obliterated, but which was transcribed by Edward Llwyd, the celebrated Welsh antiquary, while it was still legible, to have been erected by Concen, to the memory of his great grandfather Eliseg, the sixth in descent from Brochmael, Prince of Powys, who was slain in a battle fought with the Saxons near Chester, in the year 607. During the civil commotions in the reign of Charles I., this monument was broken and thrown down, and the only legible inscription which it now bears is a modern one in Latin, stating that T. Lloyd, Esq., of Trevor Hall, having found it in that ruined state, restored it in the year 1789. It consists of a round column, standing on a square plinth with a richly carved, but greatly mutilated, capital: the original height is said to have been twelve feet, though at present its elevation is only eight feet two inches. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £400. 4.

LLANUWCHYLLÛN (LLAN-UWCH-Y-LLÛN), a parish in the hundred of PENLLÛN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S. W. by S.) from Bala, on the road to Dôlgeley, containing 1178 inhabitants. This parish, which is very extensive, comprises a large tract of mountainous and uncultivated land, including PenllÛn, the highest peak of the Aran mountains; and abounds with scenery of picturesque beauty and romantic grandeur, of which one of the most remarkable features is Bwlch y Groes, or "the pass of the cross," one of the most difficult and arduous in North Wales, environed by precipitous mountains, occasionally relieved with verdant hills and narrow sheepwalks: the pass itself is a dreary flat, to which is an ascent by a steep narrow tortuous path, terminating at the crucifix from which it took its name. Near it is a beautiful cascade formed by the Twrch, an impetuous mountain torrent rushing from the Arans, and precipitating itself with violence over huge masses of broken rock, which, heaped on each other in its bed, arrest its violent progress: the water, diverted from its course, forces itself through the fissures in the rocks, which are occasionally interspersed with various plants that have taken root in the crevices, and descends with renewed violence into its channel, which crosses the road. A craggy perpendicular cliff, rising from the margin of the stream, about a quarter of a mile above this fall, adds another romantic feature to the scene. From the summit of Aran Penllyn are obtained fine views of other mountains of North Wales, and of many in the southern part of the principality. The village is pleasantly situated on the public road, near the south-western extremity of Bala lake, called by the Welsh "Llyn Tegyd," and by the English "Pemble Mere." Slate is quarried in the parish, and peat and turf are found in abundance. Fairs are held here, chiefly for cattle, horses, and sheep, on April 25th, June 20th, September 22nd, and November 22nd. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart: the rectory, rated in the king's books at £8. 10. 2½, is in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Deiniol, is an ancient structure, and was newly pewed and seated in 1820: on the north side of the chancel is the effigy of an armed warrior, with the following mutilated inscription, as read by Mr. Pennant:—"Hic jacet Johannes ap **** ap Madoc ap I-eth, cujus animæ pr-etur Deus. Amen. anno Domi. MCCC. V. 88. In the churchyard is a yew tree of remarkably fine growth. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. The Rev. Maurice Vaughan, one of the canons of the Royal Chapel of Windsor, in 1721, erected almshouses here for three aged men and the same number of aged women, which he endowed with two tenements in the parish, and with £200 for keeping them in repair. Mr. Thomas Owen of Talardd bequeathed £5 per annum for the instruction of poor children of this parish, which sum he ordered to be applied every third year to the instruction of children of the adjoining parish of Llanymowddwy. The sum of £5 per annum is also paid out of the estate of Glân Llyn, for apprenticing one poor boy, bequeathed for that purpose by a former proprietor. A school for children of the Independent congregation is endowed with the moiety of an estate, given by the Rev. Daniel Williams, for teaching twenty children, and for apprenticing two or three of them annually, according to the state of the funds. This parish is supposed to have been known to the Romans; and Camden conjectures that an ancient fortress called Caer Gai, on the north side of the small river Lliw, supposed to be Roman, from the number of coins found there, was originally erected by a Roman commander named Caius—an opinion formed from its name. Among the coins which have been found here at various times were some of the emperor Domitian, discovered within the last few years; and a stone has also been dug up, bearing the inscription Hic jacet Salvianus Bursocavi Filius Cupetian. The Welsh attribute the origin of this fortress to Cai Hir, foster brother of King Arthur, and his companion in arms; and Spencer, who appears to have been well versed in the traditionary legends of his time, makes this place the seat of the early education of that renowned hero, under his foster father, who lived at the foot of the Aran mountain, and to whom the poet gives the more classical name of Timon. In the vicinity of this station are vestiges of roads resembling those of the Romans, leading from the station Eryri Mons, at Tommen y Môr near Festiniog, and from Castell Prysor, in the parish of Trawsvynydd, to the ancient Mediolanum, probably near Meivod. Within the area enclosed by the fortification was erected, several centuries ago, a large mansion subsequently belonging to Rowland Vaughan, Esq., a zealous royalist, which was burnt in 1645, by the parliamentarians, and the outer walls of which, with more modern additions, now form a large farm-house. On the opposite bank of the river, and occupying the summit of a rocky eminence, are the remains of a fortress called Castell Corn Dochen, of the foundation of which no authentic particulars are on record: it was of considerable extent, built of mortar made of sea shells mixed with gravel, and faced with freestone. Mr. Pennant thinks it not improbable that this was the castle of Ririd Flaidd, lord of the hundred of Penllyn, whose armorial bearings decorate an effigy in the church: the other armorial bearings, with which that monument is adorned, the same writer considers to be those of Cunedda Wledig, a Cumbrian prince, whose sons, after his defeat by the Saxons, established themselves in various parts of the principality, and from whose grandson Meirion is derived the name of the county. Rowland Vaughan, who translated into Welsh Bishop Bailey's "Practice of Piety," and Dr. Brough's "Manual of Prayer," resided at Caer Gai, in the latter part of the seventeenth century. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £560.

LLANVABON, a parish in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. S. E.) from Merthyr-Tydvil, containing 853 inhabitants. This parish comprises a surface of about five thousand acres, in general mountainous: it is bounded on the west by the river Tâf, and on the east by the Romney: the soil consists of gravelly clay and peat. A colliery belonging to Sir C. Smith, Bart., from which a tram-road communicates with the Glamorganshire canal, affords employment to about twenty men. The parish is intersected by the road from Cardiff to Merthyr, which passes about two miles and a half westward from the church, and by the Glamorganshire canal, on the banks of which, within its limits, is situated the Navigation House, where this important line of communication is joined by the Aberdare canal, and by the tram-road from Merthyr-Tydvil: at this point of junction is a spacious quay. The living is consolidated with the vicarage of Eglwysilan, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf. The church is dedicated to St. Mabon. There are two places of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, and one for Wesleyan Methodists. James Thomas, in 1730, gave by will a rent-charge of £2 for the benefit of the poor of this parish.

LLANVACHRETH (LLAN-VACHRETH), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. W. by N.) from Bôdedern, containing 424 inhabitants. This parish is situated in a fertile district, near the eastern shore of Holyhead bay, and is bounded on the south by the little river Alaw: it contains a considerable portion of enclosed and well-cultivated land, and formerly derived advantages from its proximity to the old Holyhead road, which, since the construction of the new line of road, have been materially lessened. The living is a discharged rectory, with the perpetual curacies of Llan-enghenedl and Llanvigael annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £14. 2. 1., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Machraeth, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, of which it exhibits some good details, and is ornamented with an east window of elegant design. There are places of worship for Independents, and for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Numerous charitable bequests have been made to the poor of this parish, but many, and the most important of them, have long been lost. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £110. 10.

LLANVACHRETH (LLAN-VACHRETH), a parish in the hundred of TALYBONT and MOWDDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 3½ miles (N. N. E.) from Dôlgelley, containing 948 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, occupies a sequestered situation nearly in the centre of the county, and extends about nine miles in length and six in breadth. The surface is boldly varied, rising in some parts into rocky eminences and mountainous elevations, the latter affording pasturage for young cattle and sheep, for which they are more adapted than for agricultural purposes, though in the lower parts of the parish considerable portions of arable land are in a good state of cultivation. An act of parliament was obtained in 1806, under the provisions of which nine thousand eight hundred and ninety-six acres of waste and common land were enclosed; and a considerable part of it has since been brought into cultivation. The surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified, combining features of rugged grandeur with objects of rural and picturesque beauty, and enriched with some well-wooded hills and extensive plantations: the numerous farm-houses, built of stone in the ancient English style, which are scattered through the parish, have a very pleasing effect on the general appearance of the scenery; and the stream issuing from the waterfall of Pistyll Mawddach, of which a description is given in the article on DÔLGELLEY, forms one of the natural boundaries of the parish. Nannau, for many years the venerable seat of the ancient family of Nanney, and now the property and residence of Sir R. W. Vaughan, as an inheritance from his paternal grandmother, is a handsome and substantially built mansion of stone, and has been recently repaired and greatly enlarged by the present proprietor. It is finely situated about two miles and a half from Dôlgelley, on elevated ground, more than seven hundred feet above the level of the sea; and on the road leading to it from Dôlgelley, which is an uninterrupted ascent, was formerly an ancient and venerable oak, called Derwen Ceubren yr Ellyll, "the Goblin's Hollow Tree:" this tree, which measured twenty-seven feet and a half in girth, and in which an aperture had been worn by time, in the form of a pointed arch, fell down in July 1813, from natural decay. The park contains some fine old timber, and is remarkable for its small but excellent venison. Within its limits may be seen the remains of the house of Howel Sele, kinsman of Owain Glyndwr, who, while pretending to shoot at a deer in the park, in company with Owain after a professed reconciliation had taken place between these two chieftains, who had previously been at enmity with each other, turning suddenly round, aimed his arrow at the breast of Glyndwr, whom he must have killed, but for the armour which he wore under his clothes. Owain, enraged at the perfidy of Howel, seized him on the spot, and, having burnt his house, hurried him away from the place, nor was he again heard of, till about forty years afterwards, when a skeleton resembling Howel Sele in stature was discovered in the oak above mentioned, and is generally reputed to have been his: this tragical event, the recollection of which was afterwards preserved by tradition in the family of Vaughan, gave rise to a belief among the peasantry that the spot was haunted by the ghost of the murdered Sele, and the tree was accordingly popularly denominated "The Haunted Oak." Close to the remains of Howel's house Sir R. W. Vaughan has erected a handsome Gothic lodge; and behind the mansion is a beautiful mountain lake, called Llŷn Cynwch, round which a fine carriage road has been recently made by the proprietor, who has also greatly improved the vicinity, by the construction of many miles of excellent roads through the parish, and the erection of stone walls for enclosures and fences, of which, within a period of twenty years, he raised an extent of more than fifty-five miles.

The parish abound with peat, which is dug as the principal fuel of the inhabitants. Copper-ore is supposed to exist in abundance in the mountainous parts of it, and considerable quantities have been obtained in a very singular manner. A gentleman residing in Dôlgelley, learning that the ashes of peat procured near Dôlvrwynog, in this parish, could not be applied with advantage as a manure, but had the effect of injuring the land, applied a chemical test to them, by which he discovered that they contained a considerable proportion of copper. He then employed men to cut and pile up in stacks the peat from which these ashes were produced, and shipped it to Swansea, where, upon being smelted, it was found to yield copper of very excellent quality. The surrounding mountains are from this circumstance supposed to be richly impregnated with copper-ore, which, through the medium of springs or otherwise, has saturated the peat in the hollows with a solution of sulphate of copper, from which many thousand tons of excellent metal have been produced. The village is in a very retired situation, remote from any turnpike road, and chiefly inhabited by families employed in agricultural pursuits. Fairs are held on April 22nd, June 30th, and August 15th, and at Drws y Nant, in the neighbourhood, on October 23rd. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir Robert Williams Vaughan, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Machreth, is a neat stone edifice, with a low square tower, surmounted by a spire, and consists of a nave, chancel, and south transept, the two latter of which were built, in 1820, by Sir R. W. Vaughan, in testimony of his respect for the memory of his Majesty King George III., as expressed on two tablets, one inscribed in Welsh, and the other in English: the more ancient portion of the edifice was newly seated, roofed, and otherwise thoroughly repaired in the year 1800. There are three rent-charges of £2 each left by unknown benefactors, bequeathed in trust to the minister and churchwardens for distribution among the poor of this parish. Above the seat of Nannau is a lofty rock, the summit of which is encircled with a rampart of loose stones: it is called Moel Ofrwm, "the hill of sacrifice." There is an old house in this parish, called Cynmarch, or Cae March, which is surrounded by a moat, but of which little is known. At Cwmeisen is a chalybeate spring, called Fynnon Gôch; and there is also, in the parish a spring of excellent water, called Fynnon Capel. Rice Jones, a noted Welsh bard, author of a work called "Gorchestion y Beirdd," who was a native of this parish, lived and died at Tŷ ucha Blaenau, and was buried in the church of this place. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £415. 9.

LLANVAELOG (LLAN-VAELOG), a parish in the hundred of LLVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (W. by S.) from Llangenvi, containing 615 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the bay of Carnarvon, which abounds with soles and turbot, of which considerable quantities are taken during the summer: the shore is rocky and difficult of access. The soil is generally good and in a state of cultivation. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanbeulan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Maelog, is a very ancient structure, supposed to have been built in the early part of the seventh century. There are places of worship for Independents and for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Several charitable donations and bequests have been made to the poor of this parish by various benefactors; but many of them are lost. Not far from the church, on an elevated spot of ground, is a large cromlech, consisting of five upright stones, supporting a large stone nearly in a horizontal position, about twelve feet long, beneath which is a small cell or cavity. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £167. 11.

LLANVAELRHÛS (LLAN-VAELRHÛS), a parish in the hundred of COMMITMAEN, Llyn division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 14 miles (S. W.) from Pwllheli, containing 258 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of St. George's channel, at the southern extremity of the great promontory of Llyn, is but of inconsiderable extent, and is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, or connected with any events of historical importance. The views embrace an extensive prospect of the adjacent country, which is finely diversified, and of the channel, by which it is bounded on the south and south-east. Manganese has been found within the parish, but no mines of it have yet been opened. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Abêrdaron, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. MaelrhÛs, is a very small edifice, and in a very dilapidated condition. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A circulating charity school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children, is held in the village every fourth year, in turn with the parishes of Aberdaron, Brÿncroes, and Rhiw, for the support of which a tenement was bequeathed in the parish of Brÿncroes. There are some small charitable donations and bequests for the relief of the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £57. 18.

LLANVAES, a parish in the hundred of TYNDATHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (N. N. E.) from Beaumaris, containing 271 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of the Menai strait, is supposed to have derived its name, which signifies "the church of the field," from a memorable battle said to have taken place here, early in the ninth century, between Egbert, King of the West Saxons, who had effected a landing in Anglesey, near the site of the present town of Beaumaris, and a body of Welsh forces, whom he totally defeated in a sanguinary engagement; and although he was shortly after compelled by Mervyn Vrych, the sovereign of North Wales, to retreat into England, this victory ensured to him so long possession of the entire island, that its ancient name of Mona was abandoned by the Anglo-Saxons for its present appellation, signifying "the Englishmen's Isle." In 1237 died Joan, wife of Llewelyn ab Iorwerth, Prince of North Wales, and daughter of John King of England, who was buried, agreeably to her own desire, on the sea-shore at this place. Llewelyn, either to do honour to the English monarch, her father, or as a tender memorial of regard to her memory, erected over the grave of this princess a monastery of Franciscan friars, which was consecrated by Howel, Bishop of Bangor, prior to the year 1240, in which occurred the decease both of this prelate and of Llewelyn himself. It was dedicated to St. Francis, and became the place of interment of many barons and knights slain in the Welsh wars: the conventual chapel was erected over the tomb of the princess Joan. During the insurrection of the Welsh under Madoc, in the reign of Edward I., this house was burned to the ground by the insurgents, and lay in ruins until restored by Edward II., who, in consideration of the misfortunes sustained by the friars, remitted to them the annual payment of £12. 10., which they had made to the crown previously to this war. The monks of Llanvaes favoured the insurrection of Owain Glyndwr against Henry IV., who, in revenge for this conduct, in his first march against Owain, plundered the convent, put several of the friars to the sword, and carried away the rest prisoners. He afterwards, however, set them at liberty, and made restitution to the priory of its ancient privileges and possessions; but at the same time he placed in it monks of English birth. It appears after this either to have suffered further molestation, or to have fallen into decay, for it was again restored by patent of Henry V., who ordained that the establishment should consist of eight friars, of whom only two were to be natives of Wales. From this period it continued to flourish till the dissolution, at which time its revenue was estimated at £96.13.2. The site was granted by Henry VIII., in the 32nd year of his reign, to Nicholas Brownlow, and was afterwards purchased by the family of White, now extinct, who erected an elegant mansion on the spot, which has been greatly enlarged and modernized by its present proprietor, Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart., who occasionally makes it his residence. This mansion, which is spacious and handsome, is called the Friary, from its situation on the site of the ancient priory: over an arched gateway in the inner court is a shield charged with the armorial bearings of Collwyn ab Tagno, lord of Eivionydd and Ardudwy, founder of one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales, and ancestor of the family of White: the date underneath (1623) probably refers to the time of the erection of the original mansion by that family.

The rich and fertile vale in which the parish is situated abounds with pleasingly diversified and beautifully picturesque scenery, and is enlivened with several handsome seats, of which Baron Hill, near the town of Beaumaris, and the Friary above-mentioned, now the residence of Lady Williams, are the principal: besides these, it contains also the seats of Hênllŷs and Cichle. The parish is of small extent: the soil is fertile, and on the whole well cultivated, consisting of rich meadows and corn-fields, with a few acres of woodland. The greater portion of the parish is within the limits of the borough of Beaumaris. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir R. B. Williams Bulkeley, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Catherine, is an ancient and spacious structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower, surmounted with pinnacles, which was built in 1811, at the sole expense of Lord Viscount Bulkeley: the interior is well arranged, and the chancel, which is spacious and lofty, has a good east window of elegant design. Here is an almshouse for ten poor old men, founded by Mr. David Hughes, about the year 1610. Lady Bulkeley bequeathed £1000 in trust to the archdeacon of Anglesey and the minister of Llanvaes, to distribute the interest annually among the poor of this parish: this sum has been invested in the purchase of stock, the dividends on which are distributed half-yearly among the poor, according to the will of the benefactress. The remains of the ancient conventual buildings of the priory consist only of a portion of the walls of the chapel, forming part of a building situated about a furlong south of the church, and now used as a barn, the details of which show it to have been originally a stately edifice in the early style of English architecture. The stone coffin in which the princess Joan was originally interred, after the dissolution, was placed near a small brook on the farm, and for more than two centuries and a half used as a watering trough for horses, till the late Lord Bulkeley directed it to be removed, and placed under an arch in the grounds of Baron Hill, where it still remains. At a short distance from the village is Castell Aber Llienawg, a small quadrilateral fortress, with the remains of a circular tower at each angle, and surrounded by a fosse, from which a hollow way extends to the shore, where there is a mound of earth thrown up to defend the landing. This fortress was founded by Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, and Hugh Earl of Shrewsbury, in 1098, when they made an invasion of North Wales, and committed the most barbarous outrages on the inhabitants of this part of the principality. During the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., this fort was garrisoned for the parliament, but was taken by Colonel Robinson, in 1645, and kept for the king. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £124.8.

LLANVAES, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES.
—See LLANMAES.

LLANVAETHLU (LLAN-VAETHLU), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Bôdedern, containing 433 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very considerable extent, is pleasantly situated on a tract of rising ground above Holyhead Roads, and commands an extensive view over the Irish sea, by which it is bounded on the west. It is supposed to have been known at a very early period to the Romans, who are thought to have had a smelting place here, for the ore of the Parys mountain. This supposition is confirmed in some degree by the discovery of a cake of copper-ore, weighing fifty-four lb., and stamped with a mark resembling the Roman letter L, about the year 1757, and by the quantities of charcoal and scoria of copper which are frequently turned up by the plough in tilling the land upon the higher grounds. The surface is enclosed, and, with the exception only of a small proportion, in a good state of cultivation: the soil is in general fertile. The immediate neighbourhood is enlivened with some handsome seats. Within the parish is Carreg Llwyd, the ancient family mansion of the Griffiths, by whom it has been occupied for centuries: the grounds are extensive, and ornamented with well-grown timber, and within them is a lake of considerable size. Near this spot is a signal station, communicating with Holyhead on the west and Llanellian on the east, and forming a link in the chain of posts between Holyhead and Liverpool. Fullers' earth of very superior quality abounds in the parish, and the procuring of it would be attended with considerable advantage. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llanvwrog annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £16.17.1., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Maethlu, and situated on a lofty eminence overlooking the Irish sea, is a spacious and handsome structure of modern erection; and the interior, which is one of the neatest in the island, is ornamented with a good east window of three oge-headed lights, embellished with modern stained glass: on the south side of the church are some ancient monuments to the memory of deceased members of the family of Griffith. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A charitable bequest of £38 was made to the poor by an unknown benefactor, besides which there are several smaller donations, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £212.9.

LLANVAGDALEN, or LLANVAGLAN (LLAN-VAGLAN), a parish in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Carnarvon, containing 156 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Baglan, is situated on the Menai strait, near its southern extremity, and comprises only a few farms and widely scattered dwellings. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llanwnda, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor: the great tithes are appropriated to the Principal and Fellows of Jesus' College, Oxford. The church, situated in the centre of a large field, to which there is no public road, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a spacious chapel on the north side: the eastern gable is ornamented with the remains of an ancient cross, curiously sculptured. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £68. 13.

LLANVAIR (LLAN-VAIR), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile (S.) from Harlech, containing 385 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the western part of the county, on the road from Barmouth to Harlech, and upon the shore of Cardigan bay, over which it commands a fine and extensive view, and was visited, towards the latter part of the twelfth century, by Archbishop Baldwin, accompanied by Giraldus Cambrensis, in his tour to preach the crusades through the principality, who passed one night at this place in his way from Towyn to Nevin. In 1810, an act of parliament was obtained for enclosing the common and waste lands in the parish, under the provisions of which two thousand six hundred and fifty-nine acres have been enclosed, and of this extent a great part has been brought into cultivation. The surface of the parish is strikingly varied with mountainous eminences, but the scenery is marked rather with features of bold grandeur than of pleasing or picturesque beauty. The distant views present several objects of interest and variety, among which, as seen from the higher grounds, are the remains of Harlech castle, occupying a commanding eminence overlooking the fine open bay. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6. 10. 10., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient edifice, romantically situated in a very retired spot under the shelter of some precipitous mountains, which rise immediately behind it to a considerable height. Samuel Pool, in the year 1664, bequeathed a portion of land; Griffith Rowlands, in the year 1732, bequeathed £20 in money; and William Wynne, in the year 1761, and William Morgan, in the year 1778, bequeathed £10 each, to the poor, for whose benefit also several smaller charitable donations and bequests have been made. On the farm of Gwerneinion, in this parish, are the remains of a cromlech. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £216. 11.

LLANVAIR, or LLANVAIR CAER-EINION (LLAN-VAIR-CAER-EINION), a market town and parish, in the lower division of the hundred of MATHRAVAL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W.) from Welshpool, 16 (N. W.) from Montgomery, and $183\frac{1}{2}$  (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 2687 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Mary, and its distinguishing adjunct from an ancient encampment said to have been constructed, in the latter part of the fourth century, by Einion Yrth, tenth son of Cunedda Wledig, King of Cumbria. The town is pleasantly situated on the declivity of an eminence rising from the south bank of the small river Banwy, which falls into the Vyrnwy, and on the turnpike road leading from Welshpool to Machynlleth and Dôlgelley. It consists principally of two streets, intersecting each other nearly at right angles, and is neatly built and of prepossessing appearance. The manufacture of flannel is carried on to a moderate extent: the market, which is abundantly supplied with corn and provisions of all kinds, is on Saturday; and fairs are held annually on Shrove Tuesday, Saturday before Palm Sunday, May 18th, July 26th, October 3rd, November 1st, and on the Friday before Christmas-day, for horses, cattle, sheep, and wares. The town is under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, and the petty sessions for the lower division of the hundred of Mathraval are occasionally held here. The town-hall is a plain, but neat and commodious, building, and the large room over it is appropriated to the use of a school. Llanvair has been made, by the late Reform Act, one of the polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire. The parish extends seven miles in length and six in breadth, and comprises a large tract of arable and pasture land: all the remaining wastes were enclosed under an act of parliament obtained in the year 1810, for the division and enclosure of the waste lands of this parish, and those of Llangyniew and Castle Caer Einion, including all in the manor of Caer Einion is Coed; and considerable portions have been brought under cultivation in this parish, of the entire surface of which, prior to that time, not more than two-thirds had been enclosed. The ground is boldly undulated, rising in some parts into lofty eminences; and the entire district is pleasingly diversified, combining also many features of picturesque beauty, and numerous objects of interest to the antiquary.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £10, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, containing some old monuments, among which is one, under a window on the southern side, bearing the effigy of a knight in armour, well executed in stone. There are five places of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, four for Independents, two for Wesleyan Methodists, and one for Baptists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of children, held in the room over the town-hall, is partly supported by a rent-charge of £2 on the farm of Derwdege, in the hamlet of Rhiw Hiriaeth, given by William, Mary, and Elizabeth Edwards, for the instruction of ten poor children, and partly by subscription; and there are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Evan James, of Gelligason, in this parish, bequeathed, in 1687, the sum of £50, directing the interest to be appropriated to the apprenticing of poor children of that hamlet and of the hamlet of Penarth; and there are some other trifling benefactions to the poor. The Roman road from Caer-Sws to Mediolanum, Banchorium, and Deva, passed through the hamlets of Penarth and Rhiw Hiriaeth, and traces of it may still be discerned near Ystrad, about two miles south of the town. In a field near the river Banwy, a Roman urn was dug up, in 1740, containing a great number of copper coins of several Roman emperors: the urn was broken, but many of the coins are at present in the possession of Mrs. Jenkins, of Crosswood. On the summit of the hill above Rhiw Hiriaeth House are the remains of an ancient encampment, said to be the fortress constructed by Einion, from which the parish derives the distinguishing adjunct to its name. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £1173. 18.

LLANVAIR AR Y BRÛN (LLAN-VAIR-AR-Y-BRÛN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a mile (N. E.) from Llandovery, comprising the hamlets of Rhandir Abbot, Rhandir Canol, Rhandir Isâv, and Rhandir Uchâv, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, and containing 1485 inhabitants. The name of this parish, signifying "the church of St. Mary on the hill," is derived from the situation of its church on an eminence within the lines of a Roman station in the adjoining parish of Llandingat, and which has been already described in the article on that parish. The parish is situated on the turnpike road from Llandovery to Builth. In the hamlet of Rhandir Abbot are some extensive lead mines, the property of Earl Cawdor, situated near Pwll Pradog, a spot remarkable for the romantic scenery by which it is surrounded. These mines, which are among the principal in South Wales, have at different times afforded employment to from one hundred to two hundred workmen; but the number is now materially diminished, owing to the long and laborious land carriage to the port of Llanelly, where it was smelted in works erected early in the present century, expressly for that purpose. The surface of the parish is boldly undulated, and in some parts even mountainous. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llandingat, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated in the parish of Llandingat, nearly a mile from its own parish, is an ancient edifice, consisting of one large aisle, with a tower; but it presents no interesting architectural details. In the hamlet of Rhandir Abbot is a neat chapel, called Nant y Bai, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor: the original chapel was at Ystrad Fîn. There are three places of worship for Independents, and one for Calvinistic Methodists, connected with which are Sunday schools affording instruction to one hundred and fifty children of both sexes. The Roman road called the Sarn Helen may be distinctly traced in several parts of its course through this parish to the station Loventium, at Llanio, in the county of Cardigan. The

LLANVAIR CLYDOGAU (LLAN-VAIR-Y-CLY-WEDOGAU), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. E. by E.) from Lampeter, containing 385 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the upper part of the Vale of Teivy, and on the eastern bank of that river, at a short distance from the turnpike road from Lampeter to Trêgaron, bordering on the county of Carmarthen. The surrounding scenery is characterized generally by those features which prevail in this part of the principality, and the views from the higher grounds embrace extensive prospects over a richly diversified tract of country: the soil, though various, is in general fertile, and the substratum abounds with mineral wealth. A valuable mine of lead-ore, containing a considerable proportion of silver, and in which also are found quartz, spar, and a small quantity of copper-ore, has been worked for the last twenty years with considerable success, though in dry seasons during that period the works have been frequently suspended from want of water sufficient to give motion to the machinery employed: these works are at present carried on at a depth of two hundred and fifty feet below the surface, and offer sufficient encouragement for the continuance of the operations: the average produce of this mine, which is the property of Lord Carrington, is twenty-five tons of ore per annum, each ton of which contains upon an average from seventy-five to eighty ounces of pure silver. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of the Earl of Lisburne and Lord Carrington, to whom the tithes of the parish are jointly appropriated. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small and very ancient structure, not possessing any architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists: a Sunday school is supported by subscription. Contiguous to the lead mines was an ancient family mansion of the Lloyds, one of whom represented the county in parliament in the reign of Charles I., but vacated his seat upon the condemnation of the unfortunate Strafford: a contemporary historian describes Mr. Lloyd as a "gentleman and a scholar, nobly just in his deportment, and naturally fit to manage the affairs of his country." This mansion latterly belonged to the family of Johnes of Hâvod, and was the residence of the father of the late lord-lieutenant of the county till his marriage, after which time it was suffered to fall into a state of decay. It was a building of very great antiquity: the walls were in some parts five yards in thickness, and in several parts of the building there was the date 1080: it is now a ruin, having fallen down within the last few years. On the hills in some parts of the parish are the remains of ancient earthworks, but not of sufficient interest to require minute description. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £99. 2.

LLANVAIR-DYFRYN-CLWYD (LLAN-VAIR-DYFRYN-CLWYD), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S.) from Ruthin, on the road to Wrexham and Llangollen, containing 1238 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Clwyd, at the upper extremity of the spacious vale to which it gives name, and abounds with interesting and beautifully varied scenery. It formerly contained a great number of ancient family mansions, occupied by opulent and highly respectable families; and upon one occasion the grand jury for the great sessions of the county of Denbigh consisted entirely of persons chosen from and resident in this parish. But by far the greater number have been deserted by their owners, and converted into farm-houses; those which are still occupied by their proprietors are Eyarth, Brÿnyfynnon, and Pläs-Newydd. The substratum of the parish is limestone, of which great quantities are procured for building, and also burnt into lime: the quarries and limekilns are very extensive, and afford employment to a considerable portion of the population. Courts leet and baron, with view of frankpledge, are held at Easter by the Bishop of Bangor, who is lord of the manor, at which also all the parish officers are appointed: a small portion of the parish is within the limits of the borough of Ruthin. Llanvair forms a prebend in the cathedral church of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £29. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The living is a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Jesus' Chapel annexed, within the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £13. 3. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious and handsome structure, in the later style of English architecture: the internal decoration is rich, and in the east window are some fine specimens of ancient stained glass, with the date MCCCCIII., at which time it is supposed the church was built: there are some elegant monuments, among which is an altar-tomb of great antiquity, surmounted with a richly carved canopy of foliage, in the centre of which is a shield bearing the figure of a griffin, and round the border the inscription Hic jacet David filius Madoc, requiescat in pace, in Saxon capitals. In the township of Eyarth is Jesus' Chapel, a neat small edifice, founded in 1619 by Mr. Rice Williams, Verger of Westminster Abbey, London, a native of this township, who endowed it with an annual stipend for the minister "to preach in the chapel and to teach school therein:" it was consecrated in 1623, and was conveyed by deed to trustees, in 1626, by the founder. The living is a perpetual curacy, endowed originally with a rent-charge, which has been augmented with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the trustees appointed by deed of the founder. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school, established by Mr. Rice Williams, in 1619, is kept in a house adjoining Jesus' Chapel: about eighty children are gratuitously instructed: it is chiefly supported by subscription in aid of the original endowment by the founder, which is very small. A tenement called Bwlch y Llÿn, in the parish of Llanverras, now producing a rental of £25; another in the parish of Llanarmon, producing £21 per annum; and several rent-charges, with a bequest of £100 by Mrs. Catherine Wynne, and also £100 bequeathed by Mr. John Jones of Chester, are appropriated to the relief of the poor, the produce being annually distributed among them at Christmas, according to the intentions of the several benefactors. On the summit of Craig-yr-adwy-wynt are some ancient intrenchments, extending in the form of a crescent, and terminating at each extremity in an abrupt precipice: the area of this camp, which is called Y Caerau, "the fortifications," comprises about seven acres, and is defended by huge masses of unhewn stone, rudely put together without cement. Symwnt Vychan, an eminent bard of the sixteenth century, resided at Tŷ-brith, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £759. 5.

LLANVAIRISGAER (LLAN-VAIR-ÎS-GAER), a parish in the hundred of ISGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. N. E.) from Carnarvon, containing 379 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Mary, and its position below an ancient fortress, is situated on the Menai strait, and on the high road from Bangor to Carnarvon. The Romans under the conduct of Agricola are said to have forded the Menai from the shore of this parish to that of Llanidan, on their march to the reduction of Anglesey: there are still some remains of a Roman intrenchment, and vestiges of the road formed by that general may be clearly traced within the parish. The regularity of the surface is boldly broken by abrupt and rocky eminences; the lands are partially enclosed and cultivated, and the soil, though varied, is not unproductive. The surrounding scenery is strikingly bold; and the views from the higher grounds, embracing a tract of richly varied country to the east, and the fine bay of Carnarvon on the west, are interesting and extensive. Copper-ore is found throughout the whole of the rocky district of the parish, but not in quantities sufficient to induce any adventurer to open mines, or to establish any regular works for procuring it. The situation of this place is highly advantageous for commerce: within the parish is Port Dinorwig, the shipping-place for the produce of the slate quarries in the adjoining parish of Llandeiniolen, from which it is brought to this place by a railroad seven miles in length. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, which occupies a beautiful and sequestered spot on the eastern bank of the Menai, though small, is a neat and venerable structure, in the later style of English architecture, and is kept in good repair. The interest arising from several charitable donations and bequests, amounting in the aggregate to £147, is annually distributed in winter clothing to the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £175. 16.

LLANVAIR MATHAVARNEITHAV (LLAN-VAIR-MATHAVARN-EITHAV), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 9 miles (N. W. by W.) from Beaumaris, containing 739 inhabitants. This parish, which is not of very great extent, is situated on the shore of the Irish sea: the greater part is in a good state of cultivation, and the common lands have been recently enclosed and several houses erected on them. Black, grey, and variegated marble are found within its limits, the last of which is of very superior quality, and, from the variety and brilliancy of its colours, and the high degree of polish of which it is susceptible, is in very great estimation, and is sent in considerable quantities to various parts of Great Britain. The quarries being near the coast, the produce is shipped without much difficulty; and the procuring of the marble affords employment to a considerable number of the inhabitants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanddvyndan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church is dedicated to St. Mary. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest arising from some small charitable benefactions, the principal of which is one-third of the rental of a farm in this parish, let at £75 per annum, is annually distributed among the poor. In a small cottage in this parish the celebrated bard Goronw Owen was born, on the 1st of January, 1722. He obtained in the free school of Bangor the rudiments of an education which he afterwards completed at Jesus' College, Oxford, and was appointed by the Bishop of Bangor curate of his native parish. He afterwards removed to Oswestry, and subsequently to Northolt in Middlesex; but meeting with no preferment in the church adequate to the support of his family, he obtained from the Cymrodorion Society a sum of money, with the assistance of which he emigrated to Williamsburg in Virginia, of which church he was appointed minister, where he died in 1769. His discourses were eminently distinguished for originality and brilliancy of conception, and his acquirements in classical and oriental literature were of no ordinary extent: his "Search after Happiness," and his "Day of Judgment," are said to be unrivalled by any similar production of the last century. A sum of money has been raised by his countrymen for the purpose of erecting a monument to his memory. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £169. 4.

LLANVAIR NANTGWYN (LLAN - VAIR - Y - NANT-GWYN), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. by W.) from Cardigan, containing 237 inhabitants. This parish, which is pleasantly situated in the north-eastern part of the county, derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Mary, and its distinguishing adjunct probably from the abundance of white quartz stones scattered over the lands and in the bed of a brook by which it is watered. It comprehends a tract of about one thousand four hundred acres of rather flat but dry land, the whole of which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the soil, though light, is in general fertile, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture: the surrounding scenery is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, but from the higher grounds are some good prospects over the adjacent country. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Major Bowen. The church, dedicated to St. David, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Baptists. John Jones, in 1729, bequeathed a rent-charge of ten shillings to the poor of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £68. 5.

LLANVAIR NANTY GOVE (LLAN-VAIR-NANT-Y-GOV), a parish partly in the hundred of DEWISLAND, and partly in that of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S.) from Fishguard.

This parish is pleasantly situated in the northern part of the county, on the river Gwayn, which, rising in the vicinity, falls into St. George's channel at Fishguard. The living is annexed to the rectory of Letterson, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is not distinguished by any important architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £126. 11.

LLANVAIR ORLLWYN (LLAN-VAIR ORLLWYN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 394 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Mary, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation in a richly wooded district in the south-western part of the county: the road from Newcastle-Emlyn to Lampeter passes through it. It comprehends an extensive tract of arable and pasture land, which, with the exception of a very inconsiderable portion, is enclosed and in a state of good cultivation. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and, in some parts, pleasingly picturesque; and the views from the higher grounds embrace some interesting features on the banks of the river Teivy, which flows near the parish. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church is a neat edifice, appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service, but not possessing any important architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £115. 6.

LLANVAIR PWLLGWYNGYLL (LLAN-VAIR-PWLL-GWYNGYLL), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (W. by S.) from Bangor, containing 497 inhabitants. The name of this parish is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Mary, and its distinguishing adjunct from its position nearly opposite to a formidable whirlpool in the Menai strait, formed by the Swelley rocks, which rages with impetuous violence, and of which the term "Pwll Gwyngyll" is emphatically descriptive. The rocks, most of which are visible at low water, obstruct the channel of the strait, and when the lower are covered, the tide, rushing between them with tremendous fury, forms numerous vortices and strong eddies, exceedingly dangerous to vessels navigating this part of the Menai, which are sometimes caught by the rapidity of the current, and dashed against the rocks which appear above the surface. The difficulty of avoiding this impending danger at certain states of the tide, and the roaring noise and violent agitation of the waters, have obtained for this part of the strait the appellation of the Scylla and Charybdis of Welsh mariners, of similar import with its Welsh name Pwll Ceris. At high water this terrific agitation subsides, and the appearance of the surface is smooth and tranquil, differing in no respect from the other parts of the strait. The parish, which is of inconsiderable extent, is situated on the western shore of the Menai strait, and by far the greater portion of it is enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is marked with features of rugged and romantic grandeur; and the views over the Menai, which near this place forms a noble bend, and of the adjacent country, combine much picturesque beauty and many interesting objects. On the summit of a craggy eminence to the north of the great Holyhead road, which passes through the parish, is a lofty column, erected by the inhabitants of the counties of Anglesey and Carnarvon, to the honour of their countryman, Henry William, the present Marquis of Anglesey: on the north side of the base is an appropriate inscription, commemorating the exploits of that gallant commander, during the campaign in Spain, in the year 1807, and at the memorable battle of Waterloo, in 1815. The village is situated on the new line of road from London to Holyhead, and at no great distance from the Menai bridge: the inhabitants are partly employed in agriculture, and partly in some extensive quarries, which are worked with considerable advantage to the proprietors. The stone dug in these quarries is a compact schistus of good quality and in considerable demand; and every facility is afforded for its exportation by the Menai, on the shore of which a commodious wharf has been constructed. The living is a rectory, with the perpetual curacy of Llandysillio annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6. 15., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church is a small dark edifice, in a greatly dilapidated condition, and is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by subscription. Mr. Rowlands bequeathed £21, the interest of which, together with a small rent-charge, is annually distributed among the poor of this parish. In a field near Tŷ Mawr are the remains of a large cromlech, partly thrown down, the table stone of which now lies upon stones which formerly supported it from the ground. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £126. 5.

LLANVAIR TALHAIARN, otherwise DÔLHAIARN (LLAN-VAIR TALHAIARN), a parish partly in the hundred of ISALED, and partly in that of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (S. by W.) from Abergele, containing 1355 inhabitants. This place derives its distinguishing appellation from Talhaiarn, a noted bard and saint of the early ages of Christianity in Britain, and domestic chaplain of Emrys Wledig, who, after that prince was slain, is said to have built a hermitage here, on the site now occupied by the church (which, on its erection, was dedicated to him), where he passed the remainder of his life in seclusion, and died in the beginning of the sixth century: he composed a prayer, which was adopted as their formula in the sessions of the bards of Glamorgan. This place is also distinguished as having been the residence of Hedd Molwynog, a descendant of Roderic the Great, sovereign of all Wales, and chief of one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales: he joined the standard of Davydd ab Owain Gwynedd, and assisted that prince in driving the English from his territories, and pursuing them into the midland counties. There are no vestiges of his residence, except the moat that surrounded it, which is discernible about one mile and a half westward from the village. The village is delightfully situated in a deep glen, through which flows the small river Elwy, to its junction with the Aled, one mile lower. The seat of Melai was for centuries the principal residence of the family of Wynne, of which Sir Thomas Wynne, Bart., was created a peer of Ireland by the title of Baron Newborough, in 1776; and Garthewin, an elegant mansion occupying a gentle eminence, commanding rich and diversified prospects, and surrounded by extensive woods of full grown oak, three miles in length, with a large deer park, is the seat of R. W. Wynne, Esq., a younger branch of that family. The parish is composed of two divisions, Upper and Lower; and the portions in the respective hundreds in which it is situated maintain their poor separately. A fair is appointed to be held on Holy Thursday. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph: the whole of the tithes are divided between the Dean and the two comportionate prebendaries of Llanvair, in the cathedral church of St. Asaph: the prebends are each rated in the king's books at £9. 5. 5. The church, dedicated to St. Talhaiarn, is a small edifice, possessing few architectural claims to particular description, erected in 1669, as appears from a Greek cross over the belfry bearing that date: the interior, which presents a neat appearance, is divided in the centre by massive pillars supporting heavy arches: the east windows are good, and there are several elegant and interesting marble monuments to the family of Wynne. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. A free school was founded, in 1708, by the Rev. Sampson Roberts, who gave for its endowment a small sum, which, together with a benefaction by Dr. Jones, Dean of Bangor, was vested in the purchase of a tenement, called Frith yr Hirdir, producing a rental of £6, for which, in addition to a small annual payment from the churchwardens, the master instructs gratuitously twelve poor children of the parish. On a tablet in the church are recorded numerous charitable gifts of benefactors to the poor of this parish, amounting to several hundred pounds, no part of which is now applied to that purpose, except thirty shillings per annum, arising from property in Ceunant. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £732. 14., of which sum, £508. 1. is raised on that portion of the parish which is in the hundred of Isaled, and £224. 13. on that in the hundred of Isdulas.

This parish, which is situated in the southern part of the county, comprises but a small extent of arable and pasture land, which is in tolerable cultivation. The surrounding scenery is not distinguished by any peculiarity of features; and the adjacent country, though varied in appearance, is neither remarkable for picturesque beauty nor for objects of antiquarian interest. The living is a rectory not in charge, annexed to the vicarage of Llandyvvriog, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, having been suffered to fall into decay for want of due repair, is now in ruins. On the north side of the church, and at no great distance from it, is a circular tumulus surrounded by a moat, which is said to have been formerly used as a place of defence; but nothing is recorded of any event of

A LITERARY LETTER: A Successful Anthologist—A New Edition of "Our Village"—R. L. Stevenson's Prayers—Mr. John Murray's New Books.

LONDON, November 14, 1910.

I suppose that long before he is fifty years of age some friend will write a critical study of the achievement of Mr. E. V. Lucas as friends have done of the work of Mr. Chertton and Mr. Bernard Shaw. Mr. Lucas has had a most interesting literary career. We met him first—many of us—as the biographer of Lamb. To have written the best, the most exhaustive, life of Charles Lamb, the most thoroughly beloved of English authors, was no small achievement. To have added to this the edition of Lamb's books that most approaches finality was to enlarge our reasons for gratitude.

Then Mr. Lucas appears as a humorist in the pages of Punch, the index to which annually reveals to us his co-operation with Mr. Charles L. Graves in many breezy columns. A natural outcome of this co-operation was that popular brochure, Wisdom While You Wait, and its successors. To-day a large audience welcomes Mr. Lucas as an anthologist. Ten successive volumes reveal his wide reading and his discriminating taste in literature and ten others his original vein. I prize all these handy little volumes although I care most for those devoted to prose extracts. I am not convinced that Mr. Lucas has a real love for poetry. Who is there to-day that has?

For a time—quite recently—the world was the gay by the existence of a periodical devoted, it almost seemed, to proving that there were only two poets in the world—the editor and assistant editor of the publication in question. And strangely enough both were true poets. Mr. Lucas, if he really loved poetry as a medium of expression, could scarcely have placed side by side some of the versemakers that I find in The Open Road. However, this is but carping criticism. In the main the ten volumes are delightful, and not least the two devoted to letters—The Gentlest Art and The Second Post.

All the ten volumes are published by the house of Methuen, and the new volume, entitled The Second Post, is the reason for these notes. Here Mr. Lucas strays as the whim seizes him. Now it is a letter from Madame de Sévigné (borrowed from Miss Janet Aldis's Queen of Letter-writers), now one of Mrs. Carlyle's, now one of Lamb's. It gratifies me to find that I had read every one of these letters before. It is very certain that had I—or perhaps even you, gentle reader—made an "anthology" of correspondence no publisher would have issued it and no one would have bought it if perchance it had been issued.

But Mr. Lucas has made a name, and so this "selection" receives universal acceptance and is, I am assured by the booksellers, much in demand. Curiously enough the only things in it that are not very good are the new letters furnished by personal friends. Why, I venture to ask, does Mr. Lucas include four letters by Anna Seward and not acknowledge the names of the always interesting, if sometimes absurd, "Swan of Lichfield"? "A Lichfield Chaplet" is surely a trifle obscure. Darwin the elder might have written these letters, or Day, or Edgeworth so far as the reader is informed.

Mr. Lucas is not only a successful anthologist but he is also a successful novelist. Of the one-and-twenty books that are to be found with his name on them three are described as novels, and Mr. Ingleside is the latest arrival. In no sense is it really a novel. Plot there is none, story there is none. But the book contains much good criticism of life, much humorous commentary on persons and events, and I am not surprised to learn that it is being read largely. Mr. Ingleside is a prosperous Civil Servant with two daughters and certain associates. Some of the well-known men of the day are named, others are thinly disguised, and surely in the enthusiast who is "collecting materials for a book about every one of importance called Graham" I recognise a very good friend of my own.

If you are wise you have long since included among your bedside books on a shelf all to themselves the illustrated volumes issued by the firm of Macmillan with illustrations by Hugh

Thomson and other artists. Cranford, Our Village, The Vicar of Wakefield, and Bracebridge Hall are four of this valuable series, and they are surely indispensable because not only do we love the books but we love the artists as well. I could have wished that this series had been extended indefinitely. There are lots of good things in literature that Hugh Thomson might well illustrate.

This is prefatory to recalling the fact that Miss Mitford's Our Village with the introduction by Anne Thackeray Ritchie, now known as Lady Ritchie, and the hundred illustrations by Hugh Thomson, has been reprinted by the Macmillans as a noble quarto with the addition of sixteen coloured plates and drawings by Alfred Rawlins. Our Village is a book of which one never tires. Many have imitated it. We all have a village in our mind about which we could write huge volumes.

Three Miles Cross was the name of the village that Miss Mitford has immortalised. Very interesting is it to read Lady Ritchie's account of her visit to the place. Three Miles Cross she first thought to be one of the most dull and uninteresting of country places, but that was only a superficial view. It is not dull and is even beautiful in Miss Mitford's impressions of it. This volume will make a glorious present.

My congratulations to Chapman and Hall on a new series of very dainty books. They belong to what is to be known as "The Burlington Library." Each volume contains twenty-four coloured illustrations. The first three volumes are Cranford, The Vicar of Wakefield, and The Essays of Elia. In these days one cannot get away from the commercial point of view and I cannot but think what an enormous lot of money our publishers must have made out of those three authors—Lamb, Goldsmith, and Mrs. Gaskell—by these three books.

Would it not be fine if three separate publishers were to agree to honour these three writers by spending a sum of money upon a monument? I will tell them precisely what they should do. They should commission Sir George Frampton to design a monument to Mrs. Gaskell for Manchester; it might stand somewhere near the cathedral. Mrs. Gaskell did far more for Manchester than some of the royal persons who are commemorated in that city by monuments. So perhaps Manchester might do this thing. Then as to Lamb, I would commission Mr. Bertram Mackenall to do a beautiful monument to Lamb for the Temple Gardens.

Goldsmith might be honoured much less expensively than either of the other worthies Outside of Trinity College, Dublin, there is a beautiful statue of him by Foley, which does not belong to the college, by the way, but to the city. This statue of Goldsmith is far superior to any statue we have in London that has been erected within a hundred years. I would have a replica of it cast in bronze and erected near the Temple Church, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Goldsmith's unknown grave.

This is a digression, but if the Dickens stamps are to be a great success, as we all hope, why should not The Strand Magazine or some other popular magazine suggest a Goldsmith stamp, a Lamb stamp, and a Gaskell stamp, devoting the money to memorials of these three?

By the way, I see that Mr. George Bernard Shaw suggests a monument to Dickens. Mr. Shaw probably does not know that Dickens in his will expressed the definite desire that there should be no monument erected to him. All the same Mr. Shaw was right. I do not think in matters of this kind a man's will should be taken the least notice of. Robert Emmet's last message to his country was that no monument to him should be erected until Ireland was free. Well, government of Ireland under Castlereagh was not in the least the same thing as government under Mr. Birrell to-day, and I should think better of Ireland if it were to erect a statue to Emmet at once.

Not only by these three charming books has the firm of Chapman and Hall made a departure in the way of the publication of classics but far more so by the production of the series to be known as "The Books of the Verulam Club." The first book of this club is The Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. George Long's translation is given, and the book is admirably printed at the Ballantyne Press. I should like a thousand volumes produced like this. Unfortunately most of the books that one desires are too long. Other volumes promised, however, among the books of the Verulam Club are Bacon's Essays, Lamb's Essays, The Imitation of Christ, and Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Medici.

A handsome Christmas volume is The Scottish Fairy Book (J. Fisher Unwin), uniform with The Welsh Fairy Book and The Irish Fairy Book. Miss Elizabeth W. Grierson has collected these stories and rewritten them, and Mr. Morris Meredith Williams has provided a hundred charming illustrations. The whole book is printed in red and black, and the result is very effective.

We owe to the firm of Chatto and Windus a beautiful piece of Stevensoniana this season. Prayers Written at Vailima has an introduction by Mrs. Stevenson, and the whole book is reproduced in colours and gold after the original illuminated drawings by Alberto Sangorski. This it would seem is not the artist whom we have to thank for an illuminated edition of Omar Khayyam, published by Siegle, Hill, as the latter is called F. Sangorski. Otherwise there is a family resemblance in the work. Mrs. Stevenson offers us a welcome glimpse of R. L. S. He alone of the white people on the islands, apart from the missionaries, read evening prayers each day, and the Samoans formed the larger part of his family gathering. The prayers were Theistic only. They have a very striking literary note. Truly it is a thing apart, more interesting even than his books, this Samoan sojourn of the gifted Scot.

The firm of Herbert and Daniel has made itself already a power by some striking books. I believe that these are but the Christian names of two enterprising young men. Their first book was the Life of Cardinal Vaughan, which I promise myself the pleasure of reading when the burden of this heavy publishing season be overpast. The book of the moment issued by Herbert and Daniel is Songs of Innocence, by William Blake. The Blake cult is a popular one if we may judge by the multitude of books that it has brought forth of late. Here are six books that I have added to my shelves in less than three years:—

GILCHRIST'S "LIFE OF BLAKE." New edition. (John Lane.)
THE LETTERS OF WILLIAM BLAKE: W. L. Life. By F. Tatham. (Methuen.)
THE REAL BLAKE. By Edwin J. Ellis. (Chatto & Windus.)
THE POETICAL WORKS OF WILLIAM BLAKE. Edited by Edwin J. Ellis. Two vols. (Chatto & Windus.)
WILLIAM BLAKE. By Basil de Selincourt. (Duckworth.)
WILLIAM BLAKE. By Arthur Symonds. (Hinemann.)

The present edition of the Songs of Innocence is simply entrancing. I love the coloured illustrations by Honor C. Appleton. I love the decorated borders in which the poems are enshrined, and I value Mr. Thomas Secombe's introduction to the volume.

What a splendid succession of new books we are constantly receiving from the firm of John Murray. Mr. Murray's house is particularly noteworthy, not only with books that are treasured by the memoir-hunter as in the case of Mr. Monypenny's Life of Disraeli and Lord Broughton's Reminiscences but also so far as serious action and travel as becomes the first publisher of Southey's Life of Nelson. I suppose that book suggests itself to my mind by the fact that one of these new volumes is entitled Storm and Sunshine in South Africa, by Rosamond Southey. Miss Southey has travelled all over South Africa with the result that she has written a pleasant narrative that includes local colour, hunting, and plenty of picturesque description of the people throughout the whole of our newly-united state. The book is well illustrated.

Another volume, also by a woman, is entitled A Behind the Scenes in Peking. The author is Miss Mary Hooker, who describes the terrible times that occurred during the siege of the legations. Here also is a book that will attract everyone who cares to read about China.

The third volume before me (also published by Mr. Murray) is called Sea Waves of the Mediterranean, the author of which is Commander Hamilton Currey. Here is a historical work which tells of the many weird adventures of corsair chiefs from the earliest time to the present. This is a book full of romance and adventure yet of serious historical value to thousands crossing the Mediterranean to-day who may well wish to carry in their mind's eye the exciting conditions under which that beautiful sea was crossed in earlier years. Here is the very book for them. C. K. S.

LLANVAIR VECHAN (LLAN-VAIR-VECHAN), a parish in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD UCHÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Aberconway, on the road to Holyhead, containing 653 inhabitants. This parish, which lies to the east of Traeth Lavan, or the Lavan Sands, which are dry at half ebb, a tract nearly twelve miles in length, and from seven to eight miles in breadth, overflowed by the sea in the sixth century, comprehends the vast mountain of Penmaen-Mawr, near the base of which the village is romantically situated. This mountain, of which the height is one thousand five hundred and forty-nine feet above the level of the sea at high water, rises on one side almost perpendicularly from the bay of Beaumaris, in which it forms a lofty and boldly projecting promontory, and extends for some miles in a north-easterly direction towards Aberconway. It consists of one vast chain of precipitous and rugged rocks of frightful aspect and dreary sterility, wildly and irregularly thrown together in loose and crumbling strata, from which huge masses, frequently detaching themselves with imminent danger to the traveller, threaten to overwhelm him in their descent, or intercept his progress with heaps of scattered fragments. Previously to the construction or improvement of the present road, nothing could be more terrific or more hazardous than the pass over this mountain, in which one false step was attended with certain destruction to the adventurous traveller: numerous fatal accidents have occurred from the steepness of the ascent, the insecurity of the path, and the tremendous precipices on the brink of which the narrow road was continued without the slightest protection. In 1772, application was made to parliament, pursuant to which certain sums were granted for the improvement of this dangerous road, which formed part of the line to Holyhead: a subscription was also opened for the same purpose, to which the city of Dublin largely contributed; and under the superintendence of Mr. John Sylvester, an eminent engineer, the road was sufficiently widened for carriages to pass each other with safety, by cutting through the solid rock, and on the side towards the sea the precipices are guarded by a strong wall, built upon a series of lofty arches of nearly one hundred yards in perpendicular height, over which also the road is carried on a level for several miles, avoiding the almost impracticable descent to Penmaen Bâch, and leading over the chasms formed by the crumbling strata of the mountain. On the summit of the mountain are the remains of an ancient and very extensive British encampment, called Braich y Dinas, a station strongly fortified by nature and by art, and probably erected to defend the passage into Anglesey and the remoter parts of the principality. The ascent is steep and laborious, and near the summit are three strong intrenchments of loose stones of amazing strength, the walls of which are in many places in a very perfect state, having both the external and internal facings in good preservation, and the central wall on the south side in some parts nine feet high and eight feet in thickness; in the intervals between the walls are numerous remains and foundations of circular towers, varying in diameter from seven to twenty feet, and some remains of others of a square form. The central area on the summit contains also the remains of a circular tower, apparently of lofty elevation, but much reduced by the falling of stones, which are scattered in profusion round its base; and near this tower, which occupies the centre of the area, are other groups of circular buildings, which by dilapidation have become little more than masses of undistinguishable ruins. Near them is a well, excavated in the solid rock, which supplied the garrison with water, and which is constantly full, being fed by the condensed vapours of the mountain. On the north-west side of the mountain may be distinctly traced a narrow circuitous road, walled on both sides, evidently leading up to the fortress: this station, which was regarded as the strongest and the most extensive among the strong holds of Snowdon, was capable of accommodating twenty thousand men, and was deemed impregnable as well from the precipitous acclivity of the mountain, as from the extraordinary strength of the fortifications; and throughout the tortuous path by which alone it was accessible were numerous passes of great difficulty, any of which might be defended by a very small body of men against a whole army of assailants. In this formidable post was placed the remnant of the Welsh army, as in a retreat of inviolable security, during the negotiations which were pending between Edward I. and Llewelyn, previously to the final submission of the principality to the authority of that monarch. This mountain, during the sixth century, was the solitary retreat of Seiriol, a British anchorite, who had his hermitage between the two summits, where his bed and his well are still to be seen; but the hermitage being plundered, St. Seiriol retired to Ynys Seiriol, a small island on the coast of Anglesey, where he built a chapel and a cell, and ended his days. The parish, exclusively of the mountainous parts, contains several large tracts of arable, meadow, and pasture land, in a good state of cultivation: the principal fuel is peat, which is obtained in abundance: in some parts copper-ore has been found, but no mines have hitherto been opened, nor has any sufficient trial been made to work the ore effectually. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is pleasantly situated in the village, near the road to the pass over the mountain. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest of several charitable donations and bequests, amounting in the aggregate to £126. 4., is annually distributed in clothing among the poor, in the winter, according to the intentions of the several benefactors. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £158. 17.

LLANVAIR Y CWMWWD (LLAN-VAIR-YN-CWMWWD), a chapelry in the parish of LLANIDAN, hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. W. by N.) from Carnarvon. The population is returned with the parish. This place, which is pleasantly situated near the right bank of the river Braint, partakes generally of the scenery by which the parish is characterized: the adjacent country is richly diversified, and the views are interesting and extensive. The living is a curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Llanidan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The chapel, dedicated to St. Mary, has been for years in a state of such dilapidation as to preclude the performance of divine service, but is at present being rebuilt, and, when completed, will afford great accommodation to the inhabitants of the chapelry, which is more than four miles distant from the parish church.

LLANVAIR YN EUBWLL (LLAN-VAIR-YN-NEUBWLL), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (S.E.) from Holyhead, containing 319 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Mary, and its adjunct from two small lakes or pools contiguous, is pleasantly situated on the great Holyhead road, and comprises only an inconsiderable extent of fertile land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The western part of it is bounded by the narrow strait which separates it from Holy Island, and over which is the bridge called Rhŷd Pont, connecting it with the opposite shore. The surrounding country is richly diversified, and in some parts highly picturesque; and the views, extending over the town and bay of Holyhead on the north-west, and the adjacent country on the north and east, embrace much interesting scenery. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Rhôscolyn, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, a small irregular edifice, contains some excellent architectural details, which appear to have originally belonged to some more ancient building, the remains of which have been probably incorporated with the present structure: it stands on the western brow of an eminence overlooking a small creek of the Irish sea. There are places of worship for Independents and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest arising from some small charitable donations and bequests is distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £116. 11.

LLANVAIR YNGHORNWY (LLAN-VAIR-YN-NGHORNWY), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (N.W.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 310 inhabitants. This parish, which is of great extent, is situated at the north-western extremity of the Isle of Anglesey, near Camlyn bay, and almost directly opposite to the Isle of Skerries. Its surface is boldly varied, and in some parts rises into abrupt and rugged eminences: the scenery is strikingly diversified, and the views, extending on the west over St. George's channel, and on the north to the Irish sea, comprehend many interesting objects, and are finely contrasted with those over the adjacent country on the east, which embrace a rich variety of rural and picturesque features. Near Camlyn bay is a fine quarry of serpentine marble, of the species called verd antique, which is intersected with veins of asbestos, of a beautiful silky texture: this marble is more highly esteemed than the finest specimens from Italy, and many of the slabs obtained here have produced very large sums: the asbestos found here is superior in softness and brilliancy to any yet discovered in Europe. Among the mineral productions of this parish are likewise steatite, or soap-rock, and amianthus. There is safe anchorage for small vessels on the coast, in Camlyn, or Crooked Pool bay, which might at little expense be rendered a safe port, and even a serviceable dock might easily be constructed in it. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llandeusan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a spacious ancient structure, partly in the Norman style, with a lofty square tower of rude architecture at the west end: it consists of a nave and double chancel, the latter divided by a series of massive circular pillars and arches: the south chancel belongs exclusively to the proprietor of the Monachty estate, in this parish; and the north, which is the property of the owner of Caeria, is the sepulchral chapel of the family of Williams, of Friars, and contains many elegant monuments to members of that family, and of the family of the Bulkeleys: upon one of the pillars which separate the chancels is a very ancient inscription in rude Saxon characters. There are places of worship for Baptists and for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Monachty, the estate above mentioned, supposed by some writers anciently to have been the site of a religious house, was granted by Llewelyn ab Gruffydd as part of the endowment of the abbey which he founded at Aberconway, from which circumstance it derived its present appellation, and the exemption from tithes which it still enjoys. Near the church are three upright stones of large dimensions, placed in the form of a triangle, at a distance of six hundred yards from each other, and called Meini Hirion, or "the Stones of Heroes;" and near the same place are the remains of an extensive circular camp, called Castell Crwn, surrounded by a vallum and fosse. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £107. 11.

LLANVAIR YN MHUALLT, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES. — See BUILTH.

LLANVALTEG (LLAN-VALLTEG), a parish comprising two divisions, each separately maintaining its own poor, of which one is in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, and the other in that of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (N.E.) from Narberth, containing 334 inhabitants, of which number, 281 are in that division which is in the county of Carmarthen, and 53 in that which is in the county of Pembroke. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is pleasantly situated near the right bank of the river Tâf, which is here crossed by a bridge, and on the turnpike road from Narberth to Newcastle-Emlyn, and comprises a tract of land which is all enclosed, and of which by far the greater part is in a state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing, and the soil, though various, is not unproductive. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, which is dedicated to St. Mallteg, and situated in that division of the parish which is in the county of Pembroke, has been rebuilt within the last forty years, by a parochial rate, and is a neat edifice appropriately adapted to the performance of divine service. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £83. 15., of which sum, £60. 2. is raised on the portion in the county of Carmarthen, and £23. 13. on that in the county of Pembroke.

LLANVAREDD, or LLANVARETH (LLANVARETH), a parish in the hundred of COLWYN, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from Builth, containing 162 inhabitants. The name of this parish is derived from the situation of its church near a small rivulet called the Vareth, which flows into the river Wye at a short distance from its site. The parish is finely situated on the eastern bank of the Wye, by which river it is separated from the county of Brecknock, and comprises an extensive tract of arable and pasture land, in a good state of cultivation. The surface is hilly, intersected with dorsal eminences, and occasionally varied by abrupt conical hills, forming part of the range called the Carneddau, and affording excellent pasturage for sheep of a very fine breed, of which numerous flocks are reared upon them. The soil in the lower grounds is rich, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. The turnpike road from Builth to New Radnor traverses the northern part of the parish. The living is annexed to the rectory of Aberedw, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a neatly constructed small pierced turret, under which a single bell is suspended, and is situated in a beautiful and romantic spot near the banks of the river Wye, under the shelter of some lofty hills. The poor of this parish share equally with those of Aberedw and Llanbadarn y Garreg in a rent-charge of £12 payable out of a farm called Llanola, bequeathed by Mrs. Gwynne: the average annual expenditure for their support is £101. 4.

LLANVAWR (LLAN-VAWR), a parish in the hundred of PENLLŶN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (N.E.) from Bala, on the road to Corwen, containing 1749 inhabitants. This parish, which extends for nearly eight miles in length and about the same in breadth, is situated on the river Dee, and abounds with pleasing and picturesque scenery; from Moel Llan, on the high grounds above the village, which stands on the road from Bala to Corwen, a fine view is obtained of the vale of Penllŷn, through which the Dee winds its serpentine course, and of Bala lake, bounded at its western extremity by the lofty Arenig and Aran mountains. On the left is "Rhiwaedog," or the bloody brow, celebrated for a battle which took place there between Llywarch Hên and the Saxons, in which that chieftain lost the last of his sons. Not far from the village is Pabell Llywarch Hên, the tent of Llywarch the aged, in which he is said to have rested on the night after the battle, and where he finished the pathetic elegy in which he laments the loss of all his sons. This place is marked out by a circle of large stones, to which tradition has attributed that name; and near the road to Corwen are also the remains of an exploratory station. Fairs are held on May 20th and August 14th. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph: the former, which is a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £11. 5., and the latter, which is discharged, at £5. 1. 5½.; both are in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Deinïol, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture: the north chancel, by an inscription on the outside wall, was erected in 1599, at the expense of R. Price, Esq., of Rhiwlas, in this parish, and contains several monuments to that family. Llywarch Hên died in 580, and was buried here. In a window under the gallery is a stone on which is inscribed, in old characters, the words "Cavos Eniarcii." There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. Sunday schools, in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations, are supported by subscription. The late William Price, Esq., of Rhiwlas, in 1774, bequeathed £800 for the maintenance of three aged men and three aged women of this parish, £200 for clothing the poor, and £100 for purchasing bread, the interest of all which sums is appropriated according to the will of the testator. Mrs. Margaret Price, of the same family, also bequeathed £100 for clothing the poor; and there are some smaller bequests in land and money for their benefit. Rhiwlas, the seat of the family of Price, is a very ancient building, situated on the left bank of the river Trewern, which falls into the Dee within a short distance: the grounds embrace some pleasingly varied scenery. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £1063. 3.

LLANVECHAN, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES.—See LLANAVAN-VECHAN.

LLANVECHAN (LLAN-VECHAN), a township in the parish of LLANWRŶN, hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5½ miles (N.E.) from Machynlleth. The population is returned with the parish. Some delightful views of the vale of the Dovey may be obtained from several parts of this township.

LLANVECHAN, or LLAN-YN-MECHAIN, a parish in the hundred of POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (E. by N.) from Llanvyllyn. The population is returned with that of Guilsfield. The name of this place is derived from its situation nearly in the centre of a beautiful vale in the north-eastern part of the county, of circular form, and about three miles in diameter, watered by the meandering river Cain, and from that circumstance called Mechain, or Mach Cain, "the tract of the Cain." The parish comprises a considerable portion of fertile arable and pasture land, which is in a state of excellent cultivation; and its entire surface, consisting of about five thousand acres, is now enclosed: the whole of the common and waste lands, together with those in the manors of Mechain Iscoed and Plâs Dinas, were allotted and enclosed under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained in 1789. The turnpike road from Shrewsbury and Oswestry to Llanvyllyn passes near the village, which has a prepossessing appearance, and derives much interest from the beauty of its situation. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £8. 15. 10., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Garmon, is an ancient and venerable structure: near it is Fynnon Armon, the well of the patron saint, the water of which was formerly held in such veneration, that the baptismal font was invariably supplied with it. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school, established in 1832, by the Rev. Thomas Griffith, curate of the parish, in which about eighty children are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription. Mrs. Anne Vaughan, in 1715, and Mr. John Moody, in 1718, severally gave, by deed, certain small portions of land; and Mr. Charles Edwards, in 1727, and Dr. Wm. Wynne, in 1776, each gave £50 in money, to the poor of this parish. At no great distance from the church, and close to the turnpike road, are the remains of an ancient British encampment; and above Bryngwyn, the residence of Martin Williams, Esq., by whom it was rebuilt about twelve years ago, are the remains of another; but of neither of them have any historical particulars been recorded. There are also in the vicinity several other British encampments, among which is "Moel Dinam," which, from the resemblance of the names, Mr. Edward Llwyd vaguely conjectures to have been the Mediolanum of the Romans. Within the limits of the parish are the remains of several ancient mansions, now abandoned by their proprietors, among which the principal are, Bôdynvoel, the ancient residence of the Trevor family; and Brongain, the mansion of the family of the Griffiths, descendants of the Idnerths. The Rev. Walter Davies, A. M., rector of the parish of Manavon, eminent as a philologist and antiquary, and profoundly skilled in the literature and antiquities of his country, is a native of this parish: he first rose to a very elevated station as a candidate, and subsequently as an arbiter, in the grand Eisteddvodau of the principality, and has published some useful and interesting works, among which are, a translation of "Gisborne's Familiar Survey of Christianity;" an Agricultural Survey of North Wales, in one volume, 8vo., undertaken at the request of Sir John Sinclair, Bart.; and an Agricultural Survey of South Wales, in two volumes, 8vo., at the request of Lord Sheffield; besides communicating many valuable papers to various Cambrian periodicals, and of late years aiding with his literary and scientific acquisitions divers works relating to Wales and Welsh literature.

LLANVECHELL (LLAN-VECHELL), a parish (formerly a market-town) in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (W.) from Amlwch, comprising the township of Llandugwell, which supports its own poor, and containing 976 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is situated on a small stream which falls into the bay of Cemmes on the north; and the village, which is of considerable size, is finely sheltered by a chain of hills on the south and west. The parish extends for three miles in length and two in breadth, and is divided into two unequal parts, called Llanvechell Caerdegog and Llanvechell Llawr y Llan. The surface is boldly varied, and the hills abound with mineral treasure: the lower lands are in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and from the higher grounds are extensive views of the channel, and of the adjacent country, which in some parts is characterized by features of picturesque beauty. To the west of the church, and about a mile distant from it, are three upright stones, ten feet in height, disposed in the form of a triangle, twelve feet distant from each other, and supposed to be the remaining supporters of an ancient cromlech, which must, from the elevation of the stones, have been one of the loftiest monuments of that kind in the island; the table stone, if ever there was one, has disappeared; but the farm on which the upright stones are found still retains the name of the "Cromlech." The celebrated Mona marble called verd antique is found in this parish, in great abundance and of very superior quality; it is equal in the brilliancy and variety of its colours to the finest specimens of Italy, and was formerly a source of considerable wealth: the best is obtained from the quarries on Maes Mawr farm, and surpasses in beauty all that has hitherto been discovered in other parts of the island. On the same estate, and also in other districts of the parish, steatite, or French chalk, is found in profusion: this mineral has of late become more valuable and important since the discovery that chromate of iron, a pigment of great value, belongs to the same formation. Carding, spinning and fulling, and the weaving of stuffs and of coarse woollen goods, are carried on in the parish to a limited extent. The small creek of Cemmes, in the adjoining parish, affords an opportunity for transporting the produce of the quarries, and for landing coal and other necessary commodities for the supply of the inhabitants. The market, which was well supplied and numerously attended, was formerly held on Friday: fairs are annually held on Holy Thursday, August 5th, September 21st, and November 5th and 26th. The township of Llandugwell was formerly a parish of itself, and is exempt from the payment of church rates to the parish of Llanvechell: the church is now a ruin, and the rectorial tithes are taken alternately by the rectors of this parish and Llanrhyddlad. The living of Llanvechell is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £11. 11. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Mechell, or Macutus, by whom it was originally founded, was rebuilt about the year 1533, and is a spacious and venerable structure, in the later style of English architecture, with a tower surmounted by a low spire: it consists of a nave, chancel, and south transept, and is ornamented with an east window of elegant design, embellished with ancient stained glass of brilliant colour, and contains several good monuments. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A parochial school was founded in 1723, by Richard Wynne, Esq., who endowed it with a farm called Nant Glyn, in the parish of Amlwch, for the gratuitous instruction of children of this and the adjoining parish of Llanbadrig: there are at present only four boys in the school. Mr. Owen Williams, in 1657, bequeathed £2. 14. per annum, payable out of the tithes of Llanbadrig parish; and William Davies, in 1751, bequeathed £60, to be distributed in bread and coarse woollen cloth to the poor. David Lloyd, in 1689, gave a cottage and garden in this parish for the support of an aged and indigent man; John Bulkeley, in 1754, bequeathed a portion of land to the poor; and Catherine Bulkeley, in 1764, bequeathed £100 for the relief of poor distressed widows, but the interest of this last bequest has not been paid for several years: there are also some other smaller donations for the relief of the poor. There is a mineral spring near the demesne of Cevn Côch, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £433. 13.

LLANVEDW, a hamlet in that part of the parish of MICHAELSTON LE VEDW which is in the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. N. E.) from Cardiff, containing 293 inhabitants. It is situated on the right bank of the river Romney, over which there is a stone bridge. In this hamlet are two ancient family seats, Ruperrah and Cevn Mably: the former is a substantial square stone mansion, situated on an eminence and backed with stately groves; it is sheltered by the loftier heights towards the north, which form the southern boundary of the vale of Caerphilly. This is the property of the Morgans of Trêdeg, and generally the residence of the eldest son, having been in the possession of that family from time immemorial: the present house was built after a design by Inigo Jones. Cevn Mably is the seat of C. K. Kemeys Tynte, Esq., an ancient Pembrokeshire family, to whose ancestors it has belonged for several generations. Sir Nicholas Kemeys, a member of this family, raised a thousand men in Glamorganshire, and joined the royalists, who were defeated at St. Fagan's by Cromwell, in 1648. He then retired to Chepstow castle, which he defended with great gallantry for three weeks, until a breach was made in the walls by the heavy artillery under Colonel Pride, who thus obtained possession of that fortress; and Sir Nicholas is said to have been put to death with circumstances of great cruelty. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor of this hamlet, the average annual expenditure amounting to £142. 5.

LLAN-VERNACH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES.—See LLAN-VYRNACH.

LLANVERRAS (LLAN-VERAS), a parish in the hundred of YALE, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. W.) from Mold, containing 705 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Berres, an eminent disciple of St. Martin the Hungarian, whom he succeeded in the bishoprick of Tours, about the close of the fourth century. The parish is situated on the north-eastern confines of the county, bordering upon Flintshire, and upon the river Alyn, which has its source in the neighbouring parish of Llandegla, and, flowing northward through this place, adds much interest and beauty to the surrounding scenery: one thousand eight hundred acres of waste land within its limits were enclosed under an act of parliament obtained in 1793. It abounds with mineral treasures, and within its limits are some extensive lead mines, which have been worked from a very early period. These mines, after being for some time entirely discontinued, or in very limited operation, were worked upon a very extensive scale in 1762, and so continued to be, with great advantage, till the year 1790, when they were again abandoned. From that period the works were wholly suspended, or conducted only upon a very limited scale by a few adventurers, till the year 1823, when a new company established themselves in this place, drove fresh levels in the mountain, sunk new shafts, and erected new machinery for carrying on the mining process with effect. This machinery is put in motion by a water wheel, fifty feet in diameter, and of eighty horse power, driven by the stream of the river Alyn: the symmetry of this wheel, and its great power, render it the admiration of all visitors to this place; and the beauty of the situation which it occupies, on the stream of the Alyn, derives additional interest from its proximity to Colomendy, once the property and residence of Wilson, the celebrated landscape painter. The quantity of lead-ore that has been raised from these mines is very considerable: in 1830, more than one thousand tons were procured from the mine of Maes Isâv alone. The turnpike road from Denbigh to Mold passes through the village. The living is a discharged rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £14. 8. 1½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is a small neat edifice, rebuilt in 1772, chiefly at the expense of Mrs. Jones, of Colomendy. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Mrs. Catherine Jones, prior to the year 1764, erected a school-house in this parish, and endowed it with £5. 10. per annum, payable out of lands in the parish of Holywell, in the county of Flint, and also with £4 per annum payable out of lands in this parish: there are likewise some other smaller benefactions to the school, the whole amounting to £15 per annum, which is paid to a master for teaching twelve poor children. John Robinson, in 1703, bequeathed £30, the interest of which sum he directed to be distributed in bread to the poor; and John Wilson, in 1772, gave by deed a portion of land, the produce of which he directed to be divided among them in bread and money. The Rev. John Davies, D.D., a learned divine, and author of a curious grammar of the Welsh language, and also of a Welsh and Latin Dictionary, published in 1632, was a native of this parish: he died in 1644. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £ 308. 19.

LLANVIGAEI (LLAN-VIGEL), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. N. W.) from Bôdodern, containing 146 inhabitants. This small parish is situated on one of the finest rivulets in the isle, called Avon Alaw, which adds greatly to its fertility: the lands are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The scenery is finely varied, and the views from the higher grounds are interesting and extensive, and in some parts highly picturesque. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanvachreth, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church was situated on the margin of the rivulet which flows through the parish: at present but a small portion of its ruins are remaining. The parishioners attend divine service in the church of Llanvachreth; but distinct officers are still chosen, and the public business of the parish is transacted, in the same manner as prior to the decay of the church. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £63. 1.

LLANVIGAN, or LLANVEUGAN (LLAN-VEIGAN), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (S. E. by S.) from Brecknock, and containing 631 inhabitants, of which number, 274 are in the Upper, and 357 in the Lower, division. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Veugan, or Meugan, who, according to the late Iolo Morganwg, was preceptor to the renowned Merlyn Emrys, and also distinguished himself as a poet. It is situated nearly in the central part of the county, and anciently formed the head of the extensive lordship of Pencelly, which was afterwards divided into five minor lordships, and gave name to the present hundred. The ancient castle of Pencelly, of which there are at present scarcely any vestiges, was situated in the village, about a quarter of a mile to the east of the church. By whom, or at what time, it was originally built is not known; but in the 28th of Edward I. it belonged to Roger Mortimer, who was in that year summoned to parliament by the title of Baron Mortimer of Pencelly Castle: it is also noticed by Leland, who describes it as existing in his time, in the possession of the Herberts, between whom and the Duke of Buckingham the lordship of Pencelly was then divided. The ancient family mansion of the Herberts, which was afterwards erected on the site of the castle, and of which some portions are remaining, has undergone so many alterations as scarcely to retain any of its original character, and is now in the occupation of a farmer. The manor and site of the ancient castle are now, by marriage with the heiress of the late Thynne Howe Gwynne, of Buckland, Esq., the property of James Gwynne Holford, Esq., of Cilgwyn, in the county of Carmarthen. The village is pleasantly situated at a short distance from the river Usk, which forms the principal boundary of the parish on the north and east; and the surrounding scenery is pleasing and well wooded, and in some parts picturesque. Blaennant, the property of Lewis Morris, Esq., and at present unoccupied, is a handsome modern mansion, surrounded with fine plantations: the grounds are tastefully laid out, and command a fine view of the Brecknockshire Beacons, which form a striking feature in the scenery of this part of the principality. The lands, which in some places are wet and marshy, are principally arable, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal passes through the village, where there are several wharfs for landing the coal and limestone brought down it for the supply of the neighbourhood. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £20. 10., and in the patronage of C. K. Kemeys Tynte, Esq.: part of the great tithes, anciently belonging to the chapel of St. Leonard, within the castle of Pencelly, has, since the Reformation, been received by the lord of the manor. The church, an ancient and well built edifice, with a square tower of good proportions, is beautifully situated on the declivity of a lofty ridge, at some distance from the south bank of the river Usk, and commanding an extensive view down the Vale of Usk, and of the Black Mountains. The churchyard contains some of the finest yew trees in South Wales; one of them is nine and a half yards, and another seven and a half in girth; and, though generally of very great age, their trunks are mostly perfectly sound. In the upper division of the parish is the chapel of Glyn Collwyn, to which the rector presents. There is a place of worship for Presbyterians. The Rev. Richard Turberville, rector of this parish in 1635, bequeathed to his servant, William David, two closes of land, called respectively Crovtau and Tir y Gengin, both in this parish, charged with the payment of £5 per annum to the poor; both these, after the death of the legatee, were resigned to the minister and churchwardens, who receive the rents and distribute them among the poor, according to the intention of the testator. Captain Thomas Powell, of Pencelly Castle, about the commencement of the seventeenth century, gave £100 to the poor: this sum was vested in the purchase of lands at Glynderi, now let to Mr. Powell, of the Castle farm, at a yearly rent of £23. 10. A tenement bequeathed to the poor by an unknown benefactor is now let to Mr. Price, of Blaennant, at an annual rent of £11. Mrs. Lettice Parry, by her will in 1721, charged a tenement called Llwynneclyn, in the parish of Llanthetty, with the payment of £1 per annum; and two other benefactors, whose names are not recorded, charged tenements, called respectively Cethinog and Tŷ Newydd, in this parish, with the annual payment of £2 each. The produce arising from these benefactions is annually distributed among the poor on Good Friday, and the rents of the farms on St. Thomas' day. Gilston, or Gileston, was formerly a manor or lordship in this parish, and was conferred by Bernard Newmarch on Sir Giles Pierrepont, whose posterity and name have been long extinct in the principality. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £241. 16.

LLANVIHANGEL (LLAN-VIHANGEL-YN-NGWYNVA), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the lower division of the hundred of LLANVYLLIN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (W. S. W.) from Llanvyllin, and containing 906 inhabitants. The name of this parish is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and its adjunct from its being situated in Gwynva, a district in ancient Powys: it is more commonly called "Llanvihangel y Gwynt" (St. Michael's the windy), from the bleakness of its surface, to distinguish it from "Llanvihangel yn Nghentyn," as the Welsh designate Alberbury, on the confines of Salop. It comprehends a tract of about six thousand acres, of which two-thirds, being hilly and mountainous, are unenclosed and uncultivated. The soil is various: the lower grounds are fertile and productive; the declivities of the hills afford pasturage for young cattle and sheep; and peat, which constitutes the chief fuel of the inhabitants, is found in abundance. The surrounding scenery is strikingly varied and in many parts highly picturesque; and within the parish are some handsome residences, the principal of which is Llwydiarth Hall, with its extensive and well-wooded park, forming a prominent and interesting feature in the varied landscape. The village is situated about half a mile to the left of the turnpike road leading from Llanvyllin to Cann Office. A fair is held on May 9th. The living is a rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £5. 15. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, which is situated on the summit of a lofty eminence, is an ancient edifice: the pew belonging to the possessors of Llwydiarth is decorated with a canopy, on which are emblazoned the arms of the different branches of that family. A parochial school, which since 1820 has been conducted on the National plan, is supported chiefly by bequests of Mrs. Mary Vaughan, of Llangedwin, and her daughter, Mrs. Strangeways, of the parish of Melbury, in the county of Dorset: in this establishment the poor children of the parish are gratuitously instructed, and ten of them are annually clothed. Francis Griffiths, in 1684, bequeathed £20, and David Griffiths, in 1690, left £30, the produce of both which sums was to be appropriated to the apprenticing of poor children. David Vaughan, in 1705, bequeathed £20, and Watkin Evans gave £20, directing the interest to be distributed in bread to the poor. Joseph and David Ellis gave £20, the interest to be given annually in flannel; and Mrs. Mary Strangeways bequeathed £200, and the Rev. Mr. Lloyd £10, the interest of which sums is annually divided among the poor. The Roman road from Caer-Sws to Deva (Chester) passed through this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £298. 13.

LLANVIHANGEL ABERBYTHIC (LLAN-VIHANGEL-ABER-BYTHYCH), a parish in the hundred of ISCENNEN, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Llandilo, containing 911 inhabitants. This parish derives its distinguishing appellation from its situation at the mouth of the small rivulet Bythic, which here falls into the river Towy: it is within the lordship of Kidwelly, and forms part of the Duchy of Lancaster. The environs comprehend many fine views, and much of that varied and interesting scenery which characterizes the Vale of Carmarthen. The neighbourhood abounds with limestone, which rises from the sea near Kidwelly, and extends to this parish, and is burned in great abundance for manure, which is conveyed to various parts of the principality. For this purpose a rail-road has been constructed from the works at Castell y Garreg, in this parish, to the Bury river, a distance of sixteen miles, crossing the Gwendraeth Vawr river, and supported near Mynydd Mawr by a strong embankment, containing more than forty thousand cubic yards of earth, which have been thrown up for that purpose. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 private benefaction, £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, a small neat edifice, was, according to a tablet recording the event, erected in 1617, by Sir John Vaughan, Knt., Comptroller of the Household to Charles I.: it was repaired in 1753, by his descendant, the Hon. John Vaughan, representative in parliament for the county. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A neat school-room was built at the expense of the late Lord Cawdor, who paid £20 annually to a master for instructing the poor children of the parish, and the same payment is now continued by the present Earl. Golden Grove, the ancient seat of the Vaughans, Earls of Carberry, and now the property of Earl Cawdor, is situated within this parish. During the interregnum, Cromwell, on his route to besiege Pembroke castle, abruptly crossed the country, and came to Golden Grove with a troop of horse, hoping to surprise Richard Earl of Carberry, who was zealously attached to the royal cause, and to seize his person; but the earl, having been apprized of his approach, hastily withdrew and concealed himself in a farm-house in a sequestered spot among the hills; and the Protector, disappointed in his intention, concealed his purpose, and, having dined with the countess, continued his route to Pembroke. The old mansion has been recently taken down by the present Earl Cawdor, who has erected, in a more commanding situation, a magnificent structure of the black marble found in the vale of Llangendeirn, and in the ancient style of English architecture: it consists of a projecting front, having a lofty tower at the south-western angle, with a wing declining a little from the parallel, and containing an extensive range of offices on one side, corresponding to which, on the other, it is said to be his lordship's intention to erect a similar wing, to complete the design. The principal entrance is in the opposite front, under a lofty and elegant porch of three finely pointed arches, through which the carriage drives directly up to the door. The internal arrangements have been designed more with a view to domestic accommodation than to ostentatious display; but they comprehend on a very liberal scale all the elegancies and decorations suited to the elevated rank of the noble proprietor. The grounds are rather extensive than beautiful, but are well covered with thriving plantations; and from the mansion an almost boundless prospect is obtained, embracing the whole of the beautiful vale from Carmarthen to Llandovery. Among the numerous interesting objects which are visible from this spot are Dryslwyn castle, Grongar hill, and the venerable ruins of Dynevor castle, the ancient seat of the native princes of South Wales: the modern mansion of that name is not within view, but the unrivalled and luxuriant scenery of Newton park is eminently conspicuous. The celebrated Jeremy Taylor, D.D., chaplain to Charles I., and subsequently Bishop of Down and Connor in Ireland, passed several years during the usurpation at Golden Grove, under the protection of the loyal Earl of Carberry, to whom several of his works are dedicated. Within the parish are the remains of an ancient British camp, in a state of tolerable perfection; and in the limestone rock, from which the neighbourhood is supplied with lime for manure, is an extensive cavern, in which bones have been discovered: tumuli of loose stones are of very frequent occurrence in the vicinity, and there is one of these relics of the ancient Britons within the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £239. 3.

LLANVIHANGEL ABERCOWIN (LLAN-VIHANGEL-ABER-CYWYN), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. W. by W.) from Carmarthen, containing 864 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its distinguishing appellation from its situation on the river Cowin, near its confluence with the Tâf, both of which rivers partly bound it on the east and west, is intersected by the turnpike road from Carmarthen to St. Clear's, from which last it is distant about two miles and a half to the south-east. Within its limits is a village, forming a kind of suburb to St. Clear's; and it derives a considerable portion of traffic from its situation, and an air of cheerfulness and activity from the frequent passing of travellers. Fairs are held here annually on the 12th of May and the 10th of October. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Mydrim, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, stands very near the confluence of the rivers, but is not distinguished by any architectural features. There are places of worship for Baptists and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A parochial school is supported by subscription, in which the children of the poor are gratuitously instructed; and a rent-charge of £10 on some farms in the neighbourhood, bequeathed by Lady Drummond in the reign of Charles I., is annually distributed among the poor of the parish, according to the will of the testatrix. Some very imperfect vestiges of an encampment are visible on a farm near Treventy, in this parish. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £275. 11.

LLANVIHANGEL ABERGWESSIN (LLAN-VI-HANGEL ABER-GWESYN), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 14 miles (W. by N.) from Builth, containing 345 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church, and its distinguishing appellation from its situation near the mouth of the river Gwessin. It is separated from the parish of Llanddewi Abergwessin by the river Irvon (both churches being contiguous, on the opposite banks), which forms its boundary on the south and south-west, and is intersected in some places by some small vales distinguished for the picturesque beauty of their scenery. The surface is principally mountainous, its greatest elevation, Drugarn hill, being two thousand and seventy-one feet above the level of the sea; and but a comparatively small proportion of the land is under cultivation. The soil is generally fertile; even on the highest hills it is of considerable depth, and the lower parts of the mountains might, if brought into cultivation, be rendered extremely productive. The commons afford good pasturage for sheep, cattle, and great numbers of colts. The scenery throughout is generally pleasing, and on the banks of the Irvon it is, in many parts, extremely beautiful. Lwyn Madoc, formerly the residence of the family of Thomas, and still the property of Evan Thomas, Esq., of Sully, in the county of Glamorgan, is a spacious mansion, finely situated under the shelter of a lofty eminence, but at present in the occupation of a tenant. The hills are thought to contain veins of lead-ore, but no regular attempt has been hitherto made to work them: slate is procured in the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llanavan-vawr. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is not distinguished by any architectural features. There are places of worship for Baptists and Presbyterians. William Thomas, in 1709, bequeathed a small farm in this parish, called Cevn Vaes, producing annually £7. 15.; and the late Evan Thomas, Esq., bequeathed £5 per annum, to the poor, which sums are regularly distributed among them. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £87. 14.

LLANVIHANGEL AR ARTH, or YEROTH (LLAN-VI-HANGEL-AR-ARTH), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. by E.) from Carmarthen, containing 2023 inhabitants. According to Giraldus Cambrensis, this place was the scene of an obstinate battle between Hywel and Gruffydd ab Llewelyn, in 1039, in which the former, who had brought his wife to the field to be a spectator of his anticipated triumph, was defeated by the latter, and obliged to seek safety by flight; but, being pursued by the conqueror, he was taken prisoner with his wife, and detained in the power of Gruffydd. Rhys ab Gruffydd, according to the same historian, held an interview at the same place with Henry II., in 1162, when he made his formal submission to the authority of that monarch. The parish is pleasantly situated on the river Teivy, over which the turnpike road from Carmarthen to Aberystwith is continued by means of a handsome stone bridge, and extends for nearly eight miles in length from north to south, and seven miles in breadth from east to west. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in some parts highly picturesque; and the soil, though varying in different parts of the parish, is in general fertile. Fairs are annually held, on the 12th of May and the 10th of October, in the village, which, in addition to its public situation on the thoroughfare leading from Carmarthen to Aberystwith, is also intersected by the turnpike road from the former town to Lampeter. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 6. 8., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of William Lewis and J. R. L. Lloyd, Esqrs. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is situated on an eminence on the southern bank of the Teivy, commanding an extensive and pleasing view of the river and the adjacent country; and in the churchyard is a Roman monumental stone, with the inscription Hic Jacet Ulcacinus Filius Senomacili. The chapel of Pencader has been in ruins for nearly a century, but the cemetery is still entire. There are two places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one each for Baptists, Independents, and Wesleyan Methodists. Near the village are the remains of an ancient encampment, probably thrown up by Hywel, in his encounter with Llewelyn, in 1039; and on the banks of the Teivy, near the boundary of Llanllwyn parish, is a lofty embankment, the history of which is unknown. There are three tumuli within the parish, but no particulars respecting them are upon record. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £622. 16.

LLANVIHANGEL - BÂCHELLETH (LLAN - VI-HANGEL BÂCHELLAETH), a parish in the hundred of GAFLOGION, LLEYN division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (W.) from Pwllheli, containing 332 inhabitants. This parish is situated in a mountainous district in the south-western part of the county, and nearly in the centre of the great promontory of Lleyn, which separates the bays of Cardigan and Carnarvon. The surface is boldly undulated, and the land partially enclosed and cultivated; the soil is generally good, and in the lower grounds fertile and productive. The village, which consists only of one farm-house and two or three scattered cottages, is surrounded by scenery of strikingly varied character. About a mile from the church is Gallt y Beren, the residence and property of the Rev. William Roberts, an elegant mansion embosomed in thriving plantations, and commanding some fine views. Part of Carn Vadrin is within the parish: this rocky eminence, rising twelve hundred feet above the level of the sea, was one of the strong holds of Roderick and Maelgwyn, sons of Owain Gwynedd, to whom this part of the county belonged. On the declivities and around the base are numerous foundations of oblong, elliptical, and circular buildings, varying in dimensions from eighteen to thirty-six feet in diameter, the temporary dwellings of the natives, when driven by any sudden emergency to this retreat, where they remained in safety with their flocks and herds. On the summit, which was surrounded with a strong rampart, of which some portions are still remaining, the chieftains encamped with their forces, to watch the movements of the enemy, and avail themselves of an opportunity to intercept their progress or repel their aggressions. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanbedrog, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor. The church, which is dedicated to St. Michael, is situated on a gentle eminence beneath a lofty rock, and, though possessing no architectural features, derives from its site a highly romantic appearance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £143. 15.

LLANVIHANGEL-BRÛN-PABUAN (LLAN-VI-HANGEL BRÛN-PAB-JOAN), a parish, comprising the hamlets of Llanvihangel and Rhôsverrig, which are separately assessed for the maintenance of their poor, in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, and containing 385 inhabitants, of which number, 273 are in the hamlet of Llanvihangel, 5 miles (N. W.) from Builth. This parish is situated in a hilly district near the north-western extremity of the county, and is bounded on the north by the river Wye, and on the south by the river Whevri, neither of which is navigable at this place. The Whevri, which rises near Llŷn Varhyn, on the border of the parish of Llanwrthwl, and falls into the Irvon near Park House, abounds with trout, which both in firmness and in flavour are greatly superior to those either of the Wye or the Irvon. During the parliamentary war in the reign of Charles I., this parish suffered greatly from the violence of contending parties; the church was converted into a stable, and the font removed to a farm-house, where it was used as a pig-trough; the minister was expelled from his living, and for many years remained in retirement in the parish of Llanavan-Vawr, but was ultimately restored to it. The lands for the greater part are enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the soil varies greatly in different parts of the parish; in the hamlet of Llanvihangel it is dry, light, and shallow, and in that of Rhôsverrig richer and deeper, and intermixed with loam in greater proportion, with a small quantity of gravel: the pastures are good, and great numbers of sheep and cattle are reared for the market at Builth. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified, and in many places highly picturesque, and the distant views are extensive and interesting. At the eastern extremity of the parish are the Radnorshire trap rocks, extending for a short distance along the banks of the river Wye; and near Park wells is a small projecting rock, overhanging the same river, which was anciently fortified, probably for guarding the ford of Llêchrŷd, and perhaps in the occupation of the Romans, as the Roman vicinal road over Llandrindod common must have crossed the Wye near this spot. On the tenement of Parc ar Irvon, near Park wood, are three mineral springs, having their sources within a short distance of each other; one of these is saline, another sulphureous, and the third chalybeate: the saline spring is considered by medical men to be one of the most efficacious in the kingdom; but the sulphureous spring is not so powerful as that in the parish of Llanwrtyd. A neat pump-room has been erected for the accommodation of persons resorting to this place to drink the waters, which are raised from the springs by three pumps, each inscribed with the property of its respective water; and adjoining the pump-room are some neatly furnished apartments, consisting only of two bedrooms and one common sitting-room, which have been prepared for the reception of visitors. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llanavan-Vawr. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small edifice, situated on an eminence on the road leading from Llanavan-Vawr to Newbridge upon Wye; it displays no architectural details, nor does it contain any monuments of importance. Rees Price, in 1731, bequeathed a small portion of land for the relief of the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £114. 16., of which sum, £90. 3. is raised on the hamlet of Llanvihangel.

LLANVIHANGEL-CAPEL-EDWIN, or EGLWYS-VÂCH, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES.—See SCYBOR-Y-COED.

LLANVIHANGEL CWM-DÛ, a parish in the hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. by W.) from Crickhowel, containing 1103 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and, according to some, its distinguishing adjunct from its situation in a vale bounded on one side by the Black Mountains, and from that circumstance usually called Cwm dŷ, or "the black vale." This appellation, however, is on good authority supposed to be a corruption of Cwm dè, or "the south vale," a name more applicable to the situation of the southern portion of the parish in an open district remarkable for the beauty of its scenery, and strictly descriptive of its relative situation in the southern division of the ancient lordship of Ystradwy, now the hundred of Crickhowel, with respect to the northern division of that lordship, which now forms the hundred of Talgarth. In the ninth century this parish was distinguished by the appellation of Llanvihangel trêv caerau, or "the church of St. Michael apud castra," in allusion to the numerous remains of military fortifications which are still discoverable within its limits. The vale in which it is situated is watered by the river Rhyangoll, or "the sheltered stream," over which are several bridges; and the parish, which is intersected by the turnpike road from London to Milford, extends five miles in length, and is nearly of equal breadth, comprising large tracts of rich arable and pasture land, which are all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surface is pleasingly varied; and the views from the higher grounds, embracing many objects of interest and features of picturesque beauty, are diversified and extensive. Penmyarth, anciently the seat of the family of the Vaughans, afterwards by purchase the property of William Augustus Gott, Esq., who built the present mansion, and now belonging to Joseph Bailey, Esq., derives its name from its situation on the sloping front of Myarth hill, an isolated eminence in the centre of the Vale of Crickhowel, over which it commands a beautiful prospect. The lawn in front of the house rises gradually towards the east, from the margin of the river Usk, the banks of which are finely rounded on the north and south; and the mansion is sheltered from the sun's rays, during summer, by a lofty hill which rises abruptly behind it on the west. The prospect from the house is rich and imposing, comprehending almost every variety of scenery; and the view from the summit of the hill is unrivalled for beauty by any in this part of the country.

The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's: the rectory, which is a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £19. 15. 2½., and in the patronage of the Duke of Beaufort; and the vicarage is rated at £9. 13. 1½., and in the patronage of the rector: the latter is endowed with one-third part of the great and small tithes of the whole parish, with the exception of a certain impropriated portion called the Priory tithes, which were granted to the prior and monks of St. John the Evangelist in Brecknock, by Pycard, a Norman knight, to whom Bernard de Newmarch gave the lordship of Ystradwy. By a late survey it appears that the impropriation extended to the exclusive tithes of six hundred and thirty-four acres, one rood, and thirty-five perches, situated in the hamlets of Trêtower, Cenol, and Kilwych, and is now lay property. The church appears to have been originally founded in the early part of the eleventh century; for, in an ancient register of Llandaf, quoted by Wharton in his Anglia Sacra, it is stated that a church, dedicated to St. Michael, in the lordship of Ystradwy, was consecrated by the venerable Herewald, Bishop of that see, who, according to Godwyn, died in 1103, in the 48th year of his prelacy, at a very advanced age, exceeding one hundred years: as there is no other church in that district to which this description will at all apply, it is supposed to relate to the church of this place. The ancient structure appeared, from the varieties in its style of architecture, to have been erected at different periods: it was a spacious and handsome edifice, consisting of a nave with two aisles, and a chancel, with a square embattled tower of grey stone, which probably was the most ancient, and perhaps the only remaining part of the original building. This church was found to be in such a state of irreparable dilapidation that, in 1830, it was judged expedient to take it down, with the exception only of the ancient tower; and in the following year it was handsomely rebuilt in an appropriate style, and opened for divine service in May. It is in the later style of English architecture, and consists of a nave with two aisles and a chancel: the roof is divided into compartments, and the interior is well lighted by ranges of six large windows in the sides, and at the west end by a large window of five lights, with cinque-foiled heads, surmounted by an ogee arch, and by two other windows of smaller dimensions. The chancel is ornamented with a handsome oak screen, which was removed from the front of the ancient rood-loft, and placed around the walls: the mullions of the ancient windows, and the stone work of the old church, as far as was practicable, have been employed in the present edifice, which was erected at an expense of £1600, of which sum, about £225 was raised by subscription. In one of the buttresses on the south side of the church has been inserted, for preservation, by the Rev. Thomas Price, vicar of the parish, an ancient stone which was removed from its original position in a field called Tir Gwenlli, near the Roman camp at Pentre-

Gaer, in 1830, and presented for that purpose by the Rev. T. Lewis: the purport of the original inscription is preserved on a brass plate, also inserted in the buttress. In the churchyard is an ancient stone, about three feet long and sixteen inches wide: it originally formed the sill of the chancel window of the old church, and is evidently a fragment of a larger stone; one side of it is inscribed with a rude cross, apparently of the date of the sixth, seventh, or eighth century, and a mutilated monumental inscription. On a stone which also belonged to the old church, and is now inserted in the south wall of the present building, are a cross fleury within a circle, and two shields of armorial bearings. In the hamlet of Tretower is the chapel of St. John the Evangelist, formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. It is at present in contemplation to erect a school-room by public subscription on a plot of glebe granted by the rector: the estimated expense is £50, of which sum, upwards of £40 has been already raised. A rent-charge of one guinea on a tenement called Pen yr hewl is distributed among poor old spinsters not receiving parochial relief.

At the small village of Pentre-Gaer, in this parish, are unequivocal marks of an ancient Roman encampment; and local tradition affirms that anciently a town of considerable size extended from that spot to a place still called Tre'r Graig, or "the town on the hill." It is quite certain that this space of ground has been formerly occupied by buildings; the foundations of walls have been discovered, and wrought stones, fragments of brick, cement, and pottery have been frequently turned up by the plough. The camp itself was situated on a plot of ground sloping gently towards the south, with a small inclination towards the west, and having at the lower extremity a small stream called the Ewyn: its form was an oblong square, of which the eastern side and the upper end are still traceable by the foundations of the walls; and heaps of rubbish, consisting of fragments of bricks, stones, and masses of cement were till very lately lying on the spot. Coins of the lower empire have been found here at various times, some of which were in the possession of the late Archdeacon Payne. In the garden belonging to the farm on which this encampment is situated, within the last few years, was discovered a vaulted chamber, six feet in length, three feet wide, and three feet high, nearly filled with fragments of human bones; and in an adjoining field some workmen, who were clearing the ground, broke into an arched covered way, which appeared to have been a drain. The Roman road from Gobannium (Abergavenny), leading up the Vale of Usk, passed by this station; and a respectable farmer, son of the owner of the land at that time, informed Archdeacon Payne that, about fifty years before, he had himself assisted in breaking up that part of the road which lay to the east of the camp, and distinctly remembered that his father's neighbour, who occupied the land on the opposite side of the camp, was similarly employed. He described it as a causeway of considerable breadth and of great solidity, composed of pebbles deeply imbedded in gravel, and so hard, that it was with difficulty separated by pickaxes and iron bars. In a field about a quarter of a mile to the south-east of the camp was the stone already noticed as being now placed in one of the buttresses of the church, which was described by the Hon. Daines Barrington to the society of antiquaries in 1773, upon the communication of Mr. Maskelyne, brother of the Astronomer Royal of that name: the inscription, in ancient characters, was CATACUS HIC JACIT FILIUS TEGERNACUS. Archdeacon Payne, struck with all these circumstances, which he had personally investigated, employed a land-surveyor of the neighbourhood, in 1803, to form a plan of the entire precincts, which he sent to the late Mr. Jones, who was at that time engaged in preparing his History of Brecknockshire, in which work an engraving of it may be seen. That there was a line of Roman stations from Isca (Caerleon upon Usk) and Maridunum (Carmarthen) through the interior of the county, as well as along the coast, is, in the archdeacon's opinion, beyond a doubt; and he considered it strange that it has not been noticed by Antoninus, nor investigated by any modern writer, with the exception only of Sir Richard Colt Hoare, who designates it the Via Julia Romana, and with whom he agreed in his opinion that this must have been one of the stations on that line, in which it occupied a situation precisely where a station might be expected. On the hill called Pentir, above the parish church, are the remains of another military post of considerable strength, evidently of Roman origin, and probably the Campus Æstivus of the principal station: it encloses a quadrilateral area, one hundred and forty yards in length, and one hundred and five yards in breadth, and is fortified by high ramparts, and defended on the lower side by a deep fosse: below it is a wood, which from the contiguity of this post has obtained the appellation of Coed y Gaer, or "the wood of the encampment." On the little hill of Myarth are vestiges of an ancient strong hold, overlooking the station of Pentre Gaer; it is supposed to be of British origin, but no particulars of its history have been satisfactorily ascertained. In the ninth century, as stated in Dugdale's Monasticon, a considerable tract of land marked by boundaries, which may still be traced, extending from the river Rhyangoll, which runs through the centre of this parish, to St. Keyna's well and Glangrwyney, in the parish of Llangenny, was conferred upon the church of Llandaf, by Tudur, the son of Rhain, a regulus of the principality of Brycheiniog, in expiation of a crime committed by him against the church. Of the ancient castle, manor, and chapel of Trêtower, an account is given under its own head. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £445.10.

LLANVIHANGEL-DIN-SYLWY (LLAN-VIHANGEL DIN SYLWY), a parish in the hundred of TYNDAETHWY, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N.N.W.) from Beaumaris, containing 62 inhabitants. The name of this parish is derived from the dedication of its church, and its adjunct from the ancient British fortification Din Sylwy, or "the exploratory station," adjacent to that edifice. The parish, a part of which is within the limits of the borough of Beaumaris, is situated on the shore of the Irish sea: the surrounding scenery is wild and rudely magnificent, and the prospects from the higher grounds embrace an assemblage of objects more striking from their grandeur than pleasing from their beauty. There are some very extensive quarries of limestone and marble, which are worked upon a large scale, affording employment to a considerable portion of the poorer inhabitants. The living is annexed, with that of Llangoed, to the rectory of Llaniestyn, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed together with £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small ancient edifice, in a very dilapidated state; the pulpit, which is of great antiquity, is rudely but very curiously carved. The fortress of Din Sylwy, otherwise called Bwrdd Arthur, or "Arthur's round table," is the most extensive in the island, occupying the whole summit of the hill on which it is situated, and is surrounded by a double wall of large stones placed endwise, with their sharp ends uppermost: the intervals between them are filled up with small stones, and the ramparts, which are nearly entire, enclose a level area of almost thirteen acres in extent. It was of impregnable strength, and is evidently of British origin, having been occupied by the Britons prior to the invasion of the island by the Romans; and several brass celts have been found within the camp and in its immediate vicinity. The entrance is from the south by a broad path of easy ascent: within the area, which is perfectly level and dry, are several foundations of circular and elliptical buildings of various dimensions, and beneath the walls on the north side is a fine spring of water. This post, which, from the extensive view which it commands over the surrounding country, was admirably adapted for an exploratory station, was, after their conquest of the Isle of Anglesey, occupied by the Romans. Numerous fibulae, coins, and other Roman relics have been frequently discovered here; and, in the summer of 1831, a great number of silver and copper coins was found in this place, among which were some of Nero, Vespasian, Constantius, and Constantine, together with several rings, keys, buckles, and clasps of copper, and other relics of Roman antiquity. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £14.16.

LLANVIHANGEL GENEU'R GLYN (LLAN-VIHANGEL-GENAU-Y-GLYN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.E.) from Aberystwith, comprising the townships of Ceulan and Maesmawr, Cyvoeth y Brenhin, Cynnullmawr, Hênllŷs, Scybor y Coed, and Tirmynych, each of which supports its own poor, and containing 3576 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the shore of St. George's channel, is of considerable extent, and is watered by the rivers Lery, Ceulan, Maesmawr, Llyvnant, and Dyvi: the greater part of it is hilly, but that portion which is near the coast is rather flat, and was subject to partial inundation previously to the embankment of the Lery, which took place within the last few years. The river Dyvi, by which the parish is bounded on the north, separates Cardiganshire from Merionethshire, and also forms the boundary between North and South Wales; and the river Llyvnant, which rises in the Plinlimmon mountain, and falls into the Dyvi, separates it from Montgomeryshire. Walter l'Espece, one of the Norman invaders, who had acquired some lands in this part of the principality, erected a castle, for the security of his possessions, on the summit of a lofty eminence near the church: this fortress, called Castell Gwalter, from which the parish also derives a portion of its name, was destroyed in the year 1135, by Cadwaladr and Owain Gwynedd, sons of Gruffydd ab Cynan, who also took the castle of Aberystwith. This parish is supposed to have been the place of sepulture of the eminent bard Taliesin, whose remains are thought to have been deposited in a kistvaen on the summit of the mountain Pen Sarn Ddû, and thence called Gwely Taliesin, or "Taliesin's Bed:" the popular tradition concerning this bed is that, should any one sleep in it for a night, he would become either a poet or an idiot. The gwely is composed of six stones, of which five are so placed as to form an oblong chest, and the sixth, which constituted the covering stone, and was more than six feet long and three feet six inches broad, has been removed and placed on one side: it is in the centre of a circle of stones twenty-seven feet in diameter, which is surrounded by another circle of thirty-one feet in diameter. Taliesin died about the year 570, but these relics are evidently of a much earlier date, and are without doubt of Druidical origin, like numerous other remains which are found in this place. A remarkable sand bank, termed Sarn Gynvelin, or Gwallog, stretches from the coast here, for several miles in a south-western direction, into the bay of Cardigan, and is covered at the ebb tide with only from one to two fathoms of water, though immediately contiguous the soundings vary from three to seven fathoms. Flannel is manufactured here, but on a very limited scale; and lead-ore is found in the parish, but the mines are not worked to any considerable extent. The number abandoned is very great; and among the mines formerly worked were some respectively producing both copper and silver. The river Dyvi, which is navigable to this place, affords facility to the trade, which consists principally in the shipping of lead-ore and bark, and the importation of timber, coal, and limestone. The small village of Carreg, situated on the Dyvi, near its mouth, is well adapted for this purpose, as vessels of nearly three hundred tons' burden can approach its wharfs, where the craft employed are generally stationed. Talybont, which stands on the road between Aberystwith and Machynlleth, at the junction of the river Ceulan with the Lery, is also another considerable village in this parish, the well-wooded scenery surrounding which is remarkably pleasing and picturesque. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £12, and in the patronage of the Bishop. Part of the township of Cyvoeth y Brenhin pays the great tithes to the vicar, who receives only one-fourth part of the small tithes throughout the whole of this extensive parish. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient and spacious cruciform structure, in the later style of English architecture, and is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. A portion of land for an additional cemetery has recently been obtained, through the influence of the commissioners for the building of new churches, without any appropriation of the funds entrusted to their management by parliament. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The interest of £100 bequeathed for the instruction of poor children is distributed among the neighbouring schools, by the vicar of the parish. Traces of part of the ancient Roman road, Sarn Helen, leading from one old mine to another, as well as remains of Roman

LLANVIHANGEL-GLYN-Y-MYVYR (LLAN-VI-HANGEL - GLYN - MYVYR), a parish partly in the hundred of EDEYRNION, county of MERIONETH, and partly in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (N. W. by W.) from Corwen, containing 452 inhabitants. The general aspect of this parish, which comprises about two thousand four hundred computed acres, is extremely rugged and hilly, the greater part being old enclosures, and the rest unenclosed mountain land. The King is lord of the manor of the Denbighshire part, in right of his lordship of Denbigh, and John Wynne, Esq., of Garthmeilio, claims a small manor in the Merionethshire division. The village, consisting of only four houses, is situated on the small river Alwen, a rapid stream issuing from Llŷn Alwen, in the mountains, about five miles to the north-west of the village, and forming, for the greater part of its course here, the north-eastern boundary of the parish: this stream, which abounds with excellent trout, is subject to frequent floods; in 1781 it overflowed its banks, and rose within the church, which is not more than seven or eight yards from its margin, to the height of eight or nine feet, the remembrance of which event is preserved by a mark painted on the wall. The village, through which the road from Ruthin to Pentre Voelas passes, and the church, with about one-sixth part of the parish, are in the county of Merioneth. The surface of the parish is mountainous; and the soil in some parts is a loamy clay, mixed with stone and gravel, and in others chiefly bog and peat. There are some fine meadows on the banks of the Alwen, affording excellent pasturage to divers herds of the black cattle peculiar to this part of the principality, which are kept chiefly for the dairy; and the mountain lands, which are covered with fine heath, are depastured by numerous flocks of sheep of the small Welsh breed: with the exception of a very few acres of wheat and barley, oats are the only species of grain sown. A fair is held on February 16th. The living is a discharged rectory, subject to the payment of tithes, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £6. 12., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture. There are places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. On the bank of the Alwen, in the upper part of the parish, are the remains of a very ancient circular fortification, called Caer-ddynod, or the "conspicuous or distinguished fort," occupying a considerable eminence; and nearly opposite to Cerrig y Druidion, which is within three miles of the parish, are the ruins of another, called Pen y Gaer. Owen Jones, author of the "Myvyrian Archaeology of Wales," was born at Tyddyn Tydyr, in Glyn Myvyr, in this parish; and in compliment to the place of his nativity the epithet Myvyrian was prefixed to the title of that voluminous work, from Glyn y Myvyr, which in the Welsh language signifies "the valley of meditation." This elaborate compilation, though only embracing the period from 1300 to the close of Queen Elizabeth's reign, extends to upwards of sixty quarto volumes of considerable bulk. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £175. 18.

LLANVIHANGEL HELYGEN (LLAN-VIHANGEL HELYGEN), a parish in the hundred of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E.) from Pen y bont, containing 101 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the river Ithon, along the banks of which, and those of the river Dulais, it extends for about five miles, and is nearly of equal breadth. The high road leading from Rhaiadr to New Radnor, and also to Kington in Herefordshire, by which the parish is intersected, passes within two miles of the church. The surface is hilly and the soil various, consisting principally of clay in the lower grounds, and being light and shallow on the hills: the lands are, with the exception of a comparatively trifling portion, enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and from the higher grounds some good views are obtained over the adjacent country. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and with half of the tithes of the parish, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Nantmel. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, and is not distinguished by any architectural details. A Sunday school is supported by subscription, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children; and a small day school in the village is partly supported by the same means. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £21. 19.

LLANVIHANGEL KILVARGEN (LLAN-VIHANGEL-CÎL-VARGEN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CATHING, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. N. W.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 69 inhabitants. This parish, which is supposed to be the least extensive in the county, consists only of a few respectable houses, with some cottages for labourers. The surrounding scenery is characterized rather by features of pleasing simplicity and rural beauty than by picturesque or romantic appearance: the Avon Dulas flows within half a mile of the church. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £1. 6. 8., endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is not distinguished by any peculiar architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £12. 15.

LLANVIHANGEL-LLEDROD (LLAN-VIHANGEL LLETHRY TROED), a parish in the Upper division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. E.) from Aberystwith, comprising the townships of Lledrod Isâv and Lledrod Uchâv, each of which supports its own poor, and containing 1213 inhabitants, of which number, 732 are in Lledrod Isâv, and 481 in Lledrod Uchâv. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and its distinguishing appellation from its situation at the foot of a declivity on which it is built. It extends for nearly seven miles in length, and three miles in breadth, forming a part of the lordship of Mevenydd, which belongs to the crown, and contains a large tract of land, of which the greater portion is enclosed and cultivated: a considerable part of the surface is hilly, affording pasturage to sheep on the declivities, and having on the summits numerous carneddau. The surrounding scenery, though in some parts pleasingly varied, is generally bold and striking; and from the higher grounds are some extensive views of the adjacent country: there are a few ornamental residences scattered over the district. The parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. An annual fair is held in the village on the 7th of October: the inhabitants of part of the parish receive their letters from the post-office of Lampeter, within the delivery of which it is included, though the church is fifteen miles distant from that place. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £10 per annum and £200 private benefaction, £600 royal bounty, and £900 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. John Phelix, the present incumbent. The church is a small plain building, consisting only of a nave, and has recently received an addition of two hundred and eighty free sittings, towards the erection of which the Incorporated Society for the enlargement of churches and chapels have contributed £150. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The free grammar school, originally founded by the Rev. Thomas Oliver, a native of this parish, and at the time of his decease vicar of Dudley, in the county of Worcester, who endowed it with land now producing £120 per annum, for the gratuitous education of an unlimited number of boys of this parish, is at present united with the school at Ystrad Meiric. The Rev. Evan Evans, an eminent divine, poet, and antiquary, who displayed an early attachment to Welsh poetry and literature, of which he compiled from ancient manuscripts nearly a hundred volumes, was interred in the churchyard of this parish, where a small rough unhewn stone denotes his grave: he was born at Cynhawdrêv, in this county, in 1730, and, after a long course of professional duty as curate of several parishes, without obtaining any preferment in the church, and an unwearied and unprofitable devotion to the cultivation of literature, died in obscurity at his brother's house, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the entire parish is £274, of which sum, £156. 4. is assessed on Lledrod Uchâv, and £117. 16. on Lledrod Isâv.

LLANVIHANGEL-MYDDVAI, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES.—See MOTHVEY.

LLANVIHANGEL-NANT-BRÂN (LLAN-VIHANGEL-NANT-BRÂN), a parish in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N. W.) from Brecknock, containing 528 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and its distinguishing adjunct from the small rivulet Brân, which intersects the narrow vale in which it is situated. The vale extends for about four miles in a direction from north-west to south-east; and along the summits of the hills by which it is enclosed are extensive sheepwalks, affording good pasturage for numerous flocks, upon the rearing of which the farmer depends more than upon tillage. The lower lands are, with the exception of comparatively a small portion, enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The scenery of the vale is pleasingly varied, but is not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of feature; and the views from the higher grounds embrace many objects of interest, and some fine and extensive prospects over the surrounding country, which is rich in picturesque and romantic scenery. The church was formerly a chapel of ease to Merthyr-Cynog, and, during the usurpation of Cromwell, was endowed with £40 per annum out of the rectorial tithes of that parish, the living of which was sequestered by the parliament; but at the Restoration the property was restored to the legitimate owner, and the endowment of this chapel was discontinued. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Trustees of the late Walter Jeffreys, Esq. The church, which is situated in the centre of the village, is a plain ancient edifice, in a very dilapidated condition, and possessing no architectural details of importance: the parsonage-house, which had been suffered to go to decay, fell down in the reign of Charles I., and has not since been rebuilt. There are two places of worship for Baptists, and one for Calvinistic Methodists. Pwll y llacha, a tenement in this parish, forms part of the endowment of Jesus' College, Oxford, given by Dr. Hugh Price, the founder of that institution. Bola Maen, also a tenement in this parish, was given by an unknown benefactor, who appropriated the rent to the payment of the officiating minister of the Roman Catholic congregation at Brecknock. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £211. 12.

LLANVIHANGEL-NANT-MELAN (LLAN-VI-HANGEL-NANT-MELAN), a parish in the liberties of the borough of NEW RADNOR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from New Radnor, containing 410 inhabitants, of which number, 284 are in the township of Llanvihangel-Nant-Melan. The adjunct to the name of this parish is supposed to be a corruption of "Melin;" and the name, which would then signify "the church of St. Michael at the Mill brook," is derived from the dedication of its church, and its situation on a small stream which flows into the Somergill brook. The lands are partially enclosed and cultivated; the soil is various, being in some parts fertile and productive, and in others comparatively poor. The surface is undulating; the hills are finely formed and of pleasing aspect, and the grounds in the lower part of the parish are richly clothed with wood. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied; and from the higher grounds are some interesting views, extending over the adjacent country. Llyn Llanillyn, in this parish, is a large pond, nearly three-quarters of a mile in circumference, but, from the want of wood both on its banks and in the immediate vicinity, it is destitute of picturesque beauty. The cascade quaintly called "Water break its neck" is also within this parish: it is situated in a narrow defile, among the hills of Radnor forest, about two miles to the west of New Radnor: the fall is about seventy feet in perpendicular height, but the water, instead of descending in one continuous sheet, trickles down the rock, and loses all that interest and grandeur of effect which it might otherwise be capable of producing. The village, though small, is of more prepossessing appearance than many in this part of the principality, and is considerably enlivened by the traffic occasioned by the roads from Hereford to Aberystwith, and from Knighton and Presteign to Builth, in the county of Brecknock, which pass through the parish. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 13. 4., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a small ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, and, though possessing no architectural details of interest, is kept in good repair and neatly fitted up. Lady Joan Hartshorne bequeathed a house and about twenty-five acres of land, for the support of a school for the gratuitous education of poor children of this parish, and also of the parishes of Old Radnor and Gladestry. This parish is entitled to one-third of the produce of a farm, let for £18 per annum, in the parish of Llandeglay, purchased with the benefactions of Evan and Ann Griffiths, made in 1721, and applied to the relief of the poor, agreeably to the directions of the donors; and there is also a rent-charge of £1 on a small farm within its limits, called Llaniago, given by an unknown benefactor for the same purpose. There are two large tumuli, and one of smaller dimensions in the parish, but no historical particulars have been recorded of them. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £190. 8.

LLANVIHANGEL-PENBEDW (LLAN-VIHANGEL-PENBEDW), a parish in the hundred of KILGERAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. E.) from Cardigan, containing 353 inhabitants. This parish, which is but of inconsiderable extent, derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and the distinguishing adjunct to it from the number of fine birch trees growing in the vicinity. It is pleasantly situated in the north-eastern part of the county, and near the source of the river Nevern, which, after flowing through the parish, continues its course in a westerly direction, and falls into the sea at Newport. The lands are all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation; and the surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified. Kilrhue, the property of Thomas Lloyd, of Bronwydd, Esq., and now the residence of Dr. Morgan, is a good mansion, pleasantly situated in grounds tastefully laid out, and comprehending an agreeable variety of pleasing scenery. The old road leading from Carmarthen to Cardigan passes through the village. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church is not remarkable for any peculiar architectural details. There is a place of worship for Baptists. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £76. 15.

LLANVIHANGEL-RHYD-ITHON (LLAN-VIHANGEL RHYD ITHON), a parish in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (E. N. E.) from Pen y Bont, containing 350 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Michael; its distinguishing adjunct, signifying the ford of the Ithon, seems but obscurely derived from its situation on the ford of a small rivulet, which falls into the Cymaron, a tributary stream to the Ithon, and more than a mile above its confluence with that river. According to the opinion of some antiquaries, which is said to be confirmed by local tradition from time immemorial, the name is more properly Llanvihangel Rhiw Teithon, from its situation on a road immediately above the church, which led into the forest of Radnor, and still bears the name Rhiw Teithon. The surface of the parish is in general wild and mountainous: the soil is comparatively poor and unproductive; and the lands are but partially enclosed and indifferently cultivated. The surrounding scenery is equally destitute of beauty and of interest; and the views from the higher grounds, though extensive, are neither pleasing nor diversified. The road from Knighton to Pen y Bont passes through the parish, and at the latter place is a post-office, from which the inhabitants receive their letters. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lord Kensington, as lessee of the tithes under the Prebendary of Llanbister. The church, which is in a very dilapidated condition, is about to be taken down and rebuilt. The interest of several small charitable donations and bequests, amounting only to £2. 10., is annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £158. 10.

LLANVIHANGEL-TÂLYLLÛN (LLAN-VIHANGEL TÂL-Y-LLÛN), a parish in the hundred of TARGARTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Brecknock, containing 135 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation at the head, or north western extremity, of the beautiful lake called Llangorse pool, or Llŷn Savaddan. The whole of it, together with the parish of Cathedine and part of Llangorse, was assigned by Bernard Newmarch to his royal prisoner Gwrgan, son of Bleddyn ab Maenarch; but it appears to have reverted to the Norman lords of Brecknock, on the marriage of the Welsh chieftain with the heiress of Wizton, in the county of Pembroke, to which place he immediately removed. On the attainder of the last Duke of Buckingham of the Stafford family, this property was granted to John Walwyn, from whom it successively passed to the Wynters, the Philippses, the Scourfields, and the Prichards, and finally to the father of Hugh Bold, Esq., the present lord of the manor. The village is agreeably situated at the head of the lake, which is two miles in length and one mile in breadth, and abounds with perch, pike, and eels, of which last some are found of enormous size. From this fine sheet of water issues the small stream called the Llynvi, which during part of its course forms a boundary between the hundreds of Pencelly and Targarth, and finally falls into the Wye just above the bridge at Glâsbury. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in some parts highly picturesque; and the views comprehend some interesting features, among which the Brecknockshire Beacons are conspicuous. The turnpike road from Brecknock to Llangorse and Targarth runs through the village; and the Brecknock and Hay tram-road passes within a few hundred yards of it. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 12. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of Hugh Bold, Esq. There are twenty-five acres of glebe land, and a very indifferent parsonage-house, attached to the living. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a massive square tower at the west end: it is beautifully situated at the extremity of the lake, and is kept in good repair. Adjoining the churchyard is a neat cottage, which was purchased and fitted up as a school-room by the late rector, Archdeacon Davies, who established a school here on the National plan, in 1816: this school, which is at present suspended for want of an efficient master, is supported by the Rev. Hugh Bold, the present rector, and Hugh Bold, Esq., lord of the manor. Mrs. Mary Philipps gave by deed a house and garden in the village, the rent of which she directed to be distributed in bread to the poor; this benefaction produces only £1 per annum, the rent having been reduced in consideration of the tenant's supporting an aged mother, who would otherwise be chargeable to the parish. Mrs. Jennet Prosser also bequeathed a house and garden to the poor, which is now occupied rent-free by a pauper. Pwll y mere, a tenement in this parish, comprising about half an acre of land, and producing about £1 per annum, was bequeathed for a supply of sacramental bread and wine, to which use the rent is now applied. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £63. 19.

LLANVIHANGEL TRE 'R BEIRDD (LLAN-VIHANGEL TRE-Y-BEIRDD), a parish in the hundred of TWRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (E. by S.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 360 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and its distinguishing adjunct from its having anciently been one of the seats of the British bards or Druids, is pleasantly situated in a fertile district nearly in the centre of the island. The surface is varied with some bold eminences; the lands are for the most part enclosed and in cultivation; and the soil, especially in the lower grounds, is fertile and productive. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llandyvvrydog, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church is a small plain edifice, and contains some good monuments to the family of Lewis. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The poor children of this parish are admissible for gratuitous instruction into the school of Llandyvvrydog; and the produce of several small charitable donations and bequests is annually distributed among the poor at Christmas. Sir William Jones was a native of this parish; and Lewis Morris, an eminent antiquary and poet, resided here for some time. Of the occupation of this place by the ancient Druids several vestiges are still visible, among which may be noticed the remains of a Druidical altar upon one of the hills in the parish, and a large pillar, or upright stone, near the church, called Maen Addwyn, or "the blessed stone," supposed to be one of those Meini Gwyr pillars noticed by Mr. Rowlands. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £155. 13.

LLANVIHANGEL-UWCH-GUILLY, a chapelry in the parish of ABERGUILLY, lower division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (E. N. E.) from Carmarthen. The population is included in the return for the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Aberguilly, to the church of which it was formerly only a chapel of ease. The chapel is dedicated to St. Michael. It is situated in a vale, apart from any high road, through which flows a stream that falls into the Towy after passing by Merlin's Grove.

LLANVIHANGEL-VECHAN (LLAN-VIHANGEL-VECHAN), a chapelry forming the upper division of the parish of LLANDEVAILOG-VÂCH, in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Brecknock, on the road to Buiith, containing 188 inhabitants. It comprises the northern portion of the parish: the village is situated on the left bank of the romantic river Honddû, which is here crossed by a bridge, amid some well-wooded glens enclosed by lofty hills. The name of this place, signifying "St. Michael's the Lesser," is derived from the dedication of its church; but it is sometimes called "the Lower Chapel," to distinguish it from the chapel of Dyfryn Honddû, situated higher up the stream, in the parish of Merthyr-Cynog. About a mile to the north of it stands Castle Madoc, the seat of Hugh Price, Esq., to whose father this estate was devised by his cousin, Miss Catherine Powell, by whose ancestors it had been possessed for ages. It is one of the oldest family mansions in the county, and, according to Mr. Jones, the historian of Brecknockshire, derives its name from its founder, Madoc ab Maenarch, brother to the unfortunate Bleddyn, Prince of Brycheiniog, whose dominions were seized and himself slain by the Normans under Bernard Newmarch. The plainly marked site of this original edifice, and a mound forming that of the keep, are still to be seen near the present mansion, which was built in the year 1588, as appears by an inscription over the entrance, but has been frequently altered, and has just undergone a thorough repair. From a lofty hill above it, called Altarnog, in the adjacent parish of Merthyr-Cynog, is obtained a delightful view of the most beautiful part of the Vale of Honddû, with the sinuous course of its rapid river, terminated by the magnificent chain of mountains in which rise pre-eminent the Brecknockshire Beacons. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Rector of Llandevaillog-Vâch. The chapel, dedicated to St. Michael, is supposed to have been originally erected for the use of the family at Castle Madoc, who contributed largely to the rebuilding of it, about the commencement of the present century: it contains a neat marble tablet to the memory of Miss Catherine Powell, and that of her father Charles Powell, Esq. Here is a place of worship for Independents. Miss Catherine Powell, who died in 1798, charged the estate of Castle Madoc with the payment of forty shillings per annum to the poor of this chapelry. On the hill of Altarnog are the remains of a British encampment, nearly of an oval form, and about two hundred yards in circumference, originally defended on the north by three ramparts, two of which are now almost levelled, and on the south by the precipitousness of the elevation. Thomas Powell, of Castle Madoc, according to the Cambrian Biography, was a poet who flourished between the years 1580 and 1620, but his writings are little known. The Rev. Hugh Price, rector of Rettendon and Little Ilford, in the county of Essex, for many years examining chaplain to Bishop Warburton, and distinguished no less for his literary attainments than for his upright and amiable character, died, in 1803, at Castle Madoc, of which he had been for many years proprietor, and lies buried in the cemetery attached to the mother church of Llandevaillog-Vâch. The poor of this chapelry are supported by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £109. 13.

LLANVIHANGEL Y CREIDDYN (LLAN-VIHANGEL-Y-CREUDDYN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. E.) from Aberystwith, on the road to Rhaiadr, comprising the chapelry of Eglwys-Newydd, or Llanvihangel y Creiddyn Uchâv, and the township of Llanvihangel y Creiddyn Isâv, each supporting its own poor, and containing 1971 inhabitants, of which number, 944 are in Llanvihangel y Creiddyn Isâv. This parish, which is situated on the river Ystwith, and intersected by various other streams, is eminently distinguished by scenery which is equally remarkable for picturesque beauty and strikingly romantic grandeur. The former character prevails in a high degree throughout the extensive and beautiful grounds of Hâvod, and the latter on the precipitous and craggy cliffs through which the rivers Mynach and Rheidol wind an arduous and frequently interrupted course. Over the former of these streams is Pont ar Vynach, or, as it is called from a vulgar tradition, "the Devil's Bridge:" the Mynach here rushes with impetuosity through a narrow chasm between the lofty cliffs which on each side confine its waters, darkened by the entangled branches and foliage of numerous trees which have taken root among the rocks, and at a great depth beneath a bridge of one arch, thrown over it, at a very early period, by the monks of the abbey of Strata Florida, an ancient establishment in the neighbourhood. This bridge, to which the descent from the road was found inconvenient and dangerous, was, in 1753, surmounted by another bridge of one arch, at a higher elevation and of larger span, over which the road is continued to Aberystwith. The descent to the river, which lies at a great depth below its craggy and precipitous banks, is frightfully steep, and only rendered practicable by the numerous trees with which the rocks on both sides are thickly interspersed. The view from the bottom of the valley is strikingly picturesque; the bridges are seen to advantage only from this point, and present an appearance truly romantic; the height of the upper bridge above the bed of the river is about one hundred and twenty feet. At the distance of about fifty yards from the bridge, the river, rushing in a narrow and obstructed channel, falls with violence from a rock twenty feet in height into a cavity beneath: on its emerging it almost instantly descends from a precipice of sixty feet into another, and, after falling again from a height of twenty feet, descends in one unbroken sheet from an elevation of more than one hundred feet. On the opposite side of the glen a view of all the falls of the Mynach is obtained from a projecting mass of rock, a little below which the river falls into the Rheidol. The Rheidol, after receiving the Mynach, pursues a similar course, frequently interrupted by rocks of various elevation, over which it is precipitated with violence, and from one of which, of prodigious height, it descends in one vast and entire column, forming a cataract of great sublimity. The main torrent, in its descent, is partially intercepted on each side by projecting points of rock, which, diverting its course into an oblique direction, form two smaller cataracts which intersect each other in their descent. The scenery of the valley through which the Rheidol has its course is characterized by features similar to those of the vale of Mynach, and, notwithstanding the difficulty of access to those parts from which it is seen to the greatest advantage, it still continues to attract the attention, and to excite the admiration of all travellers into this part of the principality. Lead-ore abounds in the parish, but is not worked to any great extent: there is a mine called Cwm-Ystwith, capable of being rendered very productive, and there are others of smaller importance. The working of these mines at a former period led to the establishment of a small village called Pentre Briwnant, which was chiefly inhabited by the persons employed in them, and which stands on the road from Rhaiadr to Aberystwith, in the upper part of the vale of the Ystwith, where the country is remarkably wild and rugged; but the population is now principally engaged in agriculture. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a neat structure, in the later style of English architecture. The chapel of Eglwys-Newydd is within the precincts of the estate of Hâvod, and forms an interesting and beautiful feature in the landscape. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £344. 16., of which sum, £189. 2. is raised on the township of Llanvihangel y Creiddyn Isâv.

LLANVIHANGEL Y CREIDDYN UCHÂV, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES.—See EGLWYS-NEWYDD.

LLANVIHANGEL YN HOWYN (LLAN-VIHANGEL YN NHYWYN), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E. by E.) from Holyhead, containing 153 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation on an extensive common near the sea. It contains a considerable portion of fertile land, of which the greater part is enclosed and cultivated, and a large tract of common land, bounded on the south by Cymmyran bay, and on the west by the narrow strait which separates it from Holy Island. The new road from the Menai bridge to Holyhead passes near the church. In several parts of the parish are vestiges of the original habitations mentioned by Mr. Rowlands, and supposed to have been occupied by the earliest inhabitants of the isle. The scenery, though in some parts pleasingly varied, is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature; and the views of the bay and of the adjacent country are extensive and pleasing. An ancient festival, called Gwyl Mâb Sant, was formerly held in this parish on the 10th of October annually, and observed with great ceremony; but it has degenerated into a meeting for the purpose of hiring servants. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Rhôscolyn, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient and venerable structure, built upon a lofty eminence, and forming a conspicuous and interesting object for many miles around. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A National school was erected in 1826, and is supported by subscription, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of this and the neighbouring parishes: there are at present about ninety scholars in this establishment. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £71. 13.

LLANVIHANGEL YN RÛG, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES.—See LLANRÛG.

LLANVIHANGEL Y PENNANT (LLAN-VIHANGEL-Y-PEN-NANT), a parish in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. W. by N.) from Trêmadoc, containing 563 inhabitants. The name of this parish is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Michael, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation near a fine stream in a picturesque valley embosomed in mountains. The surrounding scenery combines features of picturesque beauty with objects of barren aspect and romantic grandeur: the mountains called Graig Gôch and Moel Hebog, of wild and frowning appearance, rise to a considerable height immediately above the church. Brynker, the seat of Sir Joseph Huddard, is a good family mansion, occupying a pleasant situation. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. A rent-charge of £2. 10., by an unknown benefactor, and the interest of a small donation by Mrs. Jane Jones, about the year 1720, are annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £310. 2.

LLANVIHANGEL Y PENNANT (LLAN-VIHANGEL-Y-PEN-NANT), a parish in the hundred of ESTIMANER, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W.) from Dolgelley, containing 394 inhabitants. This parish is about four miles in length and three in breadth, and contains a variety of soils: nearly one-half of it, situated in the vale, is fertile and in a state of good cultivation, a considerable portion producing excellent corn; whilst the mountainous parts, which form a portion of the great Cader Idris chain, afford only pasturage for sheep. The village, which is small, is pleasantly situated on the banks of the river Dysyni, which falls into the sea at Aber Dysyni. Near the margin of the river, and occupying the summit of a rocky eminence, are the remains of the castle of Teberri, a strong fortress, supposed to have been erected either by Gruffydd ab Cynan, Prince of North Wales, or by Hugh Lupus, Earl of Chester, into whose hands that prince was betrayed by Meirion Gôch, to whom its defence had been committed. According to Mr. Pennant it is supposed also to have been the castle of Bere, the strong hold of the last Llewelyn, which, not long before the final reduction of Wales, was taken by William de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, and probably the same which was committed by Edward I. to the custody of Robert Fitz-Walter, to whom he granted the privilege of hunting all kinds of wild beasts in the principality. A part of this fortress was excavated in the rock, and the walls were constructed of masonry, cemented by mortar composed of shells and gravel. Near this is Caerberllan Hall, the seat of Edward Pugh Owen, Esq. Turf and peat are found in the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church is dedicated to St. Michael. There is a place of worship for Independents. Mr. David Evan, in 1724, bequeathed £10, the interest of which is annually distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £288. 18.

LLANVIHANGEL YSCEIVIOG, or LLANVIHANGEL PENTRE BERW (LLAN-VIHANGEL YSGEIVIOG), a parish in the hundred of MENAI, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 8 miles (W. by N.) from Bangor, containing 663 inhabitants. This parish, which is of considerable extent, has been progressively improving since the new line of road from Bangor to Holyhead was brought through it, which has also been productive of considerable benefit to the surrounding country: the soil is various in different parts of it, and in some places there is a considerable portion of marshy land. The village is small, but has a post-office dependent on that of Bangor. Coal of a particular kind, called "mountain coal," of a very soft quality, is found in this parish, and, as the stratum of it here found is the only one in the island, the procuring of it would be of very great advantage, were it not limited by the expense of working it, arising from the marshy nature of the land, and the quantity of water with which the mine is inundated: to overcome these obstacles, a steam-engine of great power has been erected, and the colliery is conducted upon a limited scale, affording employment to about thirty men. A rail-road was constructed from Penrhyn-Mawr coal works, in this parish, to Red Wharf, in the parish of Llanbedr Gôch, a distance of seven miles, under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained in 1812, by which the proprietors are incorporated under the name of the "Anglesey Railway Company." The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Llanfynnau annexed, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £10 per annum private benefaction, £800 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Dean of Bangor, to whom the great tithes of the parish are appropriated, as forming part of the endowment of the deanery. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is a spacious and ancient structure, consisting of a nave, south aisle, and chancel, and having on the north side a small building called Capel Berw, communicating with the church, and evidently of more recent date than the rest of the edifice: the east window is embellished with some portions of ancient stained glass, of brilliant colours. At Gaerwen, in this parish, is a large place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, capable of holding two thousand persons, and which, being situated upon elevated ground, forms a conspicuous object to a considerable distance. The Rev. Dr. John Jones, Dean of Bangor, in 1719, bequeathed £100 in trust, to be appropriated to the payment of a schoolmaster to teach twelve poor children of this parish and that of Llanfynnau to read. A parochial school was built in 1828, by subscription, and is supported by the same means, aided by the interest of the above £100, paid to the master, which entitles six children of the parish of Llanfynnau to gratuitous instruction in it: the total number of children in this school is now about seventy. There are several small charitable donations and bequests, the interest arising from which is annually distributed in clothing and in money among the poor during the winter. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £205. 16.

LLANVIHANGEL YSTRAD (LLAN-VIHANGEL YSTRAD), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N. W.) from Lampeter, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, and containing 1183 inhabitants, of which number, 612 are in the Upper, and 571 in the Lower, division. This parish, which is pleasantly situated on the river Aëron, and on the turnpike road from Lampeter to Aberystwith, is of considerable extent, reaching from the beautiful vale of Aëron, almost to that of the Teivy, comprehending a rich variety of scenery, in many parts highly picturesque, and embracing, especially from the higher grounds, several interesting and extensive views of the surrounding country. This place formerly constituted a prebend in the college of Llandewy-Brevi, rated in the king's books at £7. 14. 4½., and is now an impropriation. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 18. 1½., endowed with £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave and north and south aisles: the nave is separated from each of the aisles by a series of four pointed arches, supported on square pillars; the font is quadrangular, and is placed on a short round column. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists, Presbyterians, and Unitarians. A Sunday school is supported by the vicar, at whose expense, assisted by the National society, and by some of the proprietors of land in the parish, a commodious school-house has been erected in the churchyard. In the southern part of the parish there is an ancient intrenchment, called Cribyn Clottas, of which no particulars are recorded; and in a field called Maes Mynach, is an ancient stone, embellished with Runic ornaments, but without any inscription. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £423. 13.

LLANVIHANGEL Y TRAETHAU (LLAN-VIHANGEL-Y-TRAETHAU), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. by E.) from Harlech, containing 1026 inhabitants. The name of this parish, which consists of the townships of Llanvihangel and Ynys, with part of that of Penrhyn, the rest of which is in the parish of Llandecwyn, is derived from the dedication of its church, and its distinguishing adjunct from its situation on the southern bank of the Traeth Bâch, an extensive tract of sands, forming the wide æstuary of the river Dwyryd, which here pours its waters into the bay of Cardigan. In 1073, at a place called Bron yr Erw, in this parish, on the point of land which intervenes between the æstuaries of the Traeth Bâch and Traeth Vawr, was fought a sanguinary battle between Trehaern ab Caradoc, Prince of North Wales, and a claimant of the sovereignty named Gruffydd ab Cynan, in which the latter was defeated and compelled to return into Anglesey, from which island he had advanced into the heart of Trehaern's dominions. The road from Harlech over the sands to Trêmadoc passes near the village; and the parish, which includes also a tract on the northern bank of the Traeth, called Penrhyn-deudraeth, is also intersected by the road from Tan y Bwlch to the same town. An act of parliament was obtained in the year 1806, for enclosing the common and waste lands in this and the adjoining parish of Llandanwg, under the provisions of which one thousand three hundred and sixty-five acres were allotted to this parish, which comprises altogether between six and seven thousand acres of land, partly hilly and partly flat: some marshes, formerly subject to inundation by the waters of the Traeth Bâch, have of late years been enclosed. Within the parish are several small lakes, the largest of which are Llŷn y vedw and Llŷn-eiddaw: Glynn, an ancient mansion belonging to Mr. Ormsby Gore, also forms an ornament to it. The soil is various, consisting on the higher grounds of a dark red substance, and in the lowlands of clay, sand, and peat. The scenery is pleasingly varied, and there are some good views, embracing on the west a portion of Cardigan bay, and on the south the stately remains of Harlech castle. Vessels of small burden can ascend the river as far as Tŷ Gwyn y Gamlas, within a few hundred yards of the church, where they receive or discharge their freight. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Llandecwyn, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, endowed with £200 royal bounty: the tithes of the parish belong to the treasurer of Bangor cathedral, as rector of Llandecwyn. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. In the churchyard is a monumental stone, six feet high, bearing the following inscription: "Hoc est sepulchrum Will. Dermae de Deler, qui primus edificavit hanc Ecclesiam, in tempore Ewini Regis." There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The Reverend John Jones, D. D., in 1719, bequeathed £50, the interest of which he directed to be appropriated to the instruction of ten poor children of this and of the adjoining parish of Llandecwyn. In that part of the parish called Penrhyn-deudraeth is said formerly to have stood a castle belonging to one of the sons of Owain Gwynedd. The Reverend Humphrey Humphreys, D. D., Bishop of Bangor, and afterwards translated to the see of Hereford, was born at Hêndre Isâ, in this parish: he died at Hereford, on the 20th of November, 1712, and was interred near the altar in the cathedral church of that city: he presided over the see of Bangor from 1689 till 1701, and over the see of Hereford from that time till his death. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £258. 6.

LLANVILLO (LLAN-VILO), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH

WALES, 7 miles (N. E. by E.) from Brecknock, containing 327 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Milburg, called by the Welsh St. Vilo, an eminent female saint of the seventh century; she was daughter of Merwald, King of Mercia, and abbess of Wenlock, in the county of Salop, over which convent she presided till her death, and was interred in the abbey of that place, where her remains were found in the reign of Henry I. The lands in the parish, though not naturally fertile, are in a very high state of cultivation; and the surrounding country affords many finely varied prospects and much pleasingly rural scenery. The village is situated within a mile of the turnpike road from London through Hay to Brecknock, and at a short distance from a small stream, over which is a bridge called Pont Vâch. There are some quarries of good limestone, and of stone for building and roofing houses, the working of which affords employment to a few persons. The Brecknock and Hay tram-road passes within a mile of this place, but the road leading to it is at present in so bad a state that but very little benefit is derived from it. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 14. 9½., and in the patronage of the Earl of Ashburnham. The advowson anciently belonged to the lords of Brecknock, but upon the attainder of the last Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, it became vested in the crown, and was granted to Roger Vaughan of Porthaml, from whom it descended to the Ashburnham family, charged with the payment of seven shillings per annum to the abbey of Wigmore, which is annually received by the auditor of Wales. The church, situated in the centre of the village, is an ancient structure, much disfigured by successive alterations and repairs. The ancient rood-loft still remains: in the front are twelve niches, in which it is supposed were formerly statues of the twelve apostles, and the upper part of it has been converted into a gallery for the accommodation of the parishioners: the ancient roof of the chancel is hid by a flat modern ceiling. The churchyard commands an extensive prospect over the surrounding country; and from the parsonage-house is obtained a very pleasing view, which extends into the counties of Radnor and Hereford. A Sunday school is partially supported under the patronage of the rector, who contributes a donation of two guineas per annum. The interest of £11, given by an unknown benefactor, and secured on a cottage in the parish, is annually distributed among the poor. On a lofty eminence on a farm belonging to Sir Charles Morgan, Bart., are some vestiges of an ancient British encampment of considerable extent, enclosing an elliptical area, of which the longer diameter is six hundred and twenty-four feet, and the shorter, one hundred and thirty-eight; it appears to have been defended all round by a deep fosse, which is still remaining in that part where the ground is least precipitous. From this eminence is a view of amazing extent and magnificence, comprehending the vale of Llangorse, with its beautiful lake, behind which the lofty Allt Esgair, apparently rising abruptly from its margin, presents a perfectly conical appearance; to the east is the range of the Black Mountains, stretching into Herefordshire, and throwing into bold relief the village of Talgarth, which, with the neighbouring castle of Bronllys, forms a pleasing and conspicuous feature in the scenery. To the north lies a richly cultivated tract, comprising part of the picturesque vale of the Wye, beyond which rise the Radnorshire hills; and to the south, the village and church of Llandevalley, the mansion and grounds of Pontywall, the village of Talachddu, the heights above Brecknock, and the lofty summits of the Brecknockshire Beacons, present themselves in pleasing succession. A little to the west of this encampment is a much smaller eminence, which appears to have been fortified by an intrenchment. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £198. 2.

LLANVLEWYN (LLAN-FLEWYN), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N.W.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 133 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Flewyn, by whom it was originally founded, in the early part of the seventh century, is situated in the north-western part of the island, and is finely sheltered on the north by a chain of hills, by which it is separated from the parish of Llanvechell. It appears to have been visited, if not permanently inhabited, by the Romans, on their conquest of Anglesey; three golden bracelets, of which two were purchased by Mr. Pennant, and a bulla of the same metal, having been found on a farm within its limits, called Ynys Gwyddel, a few years prior to his visiting this part of the principality; and in this and also in the adjoining parish are numerous vestiges of Saxon and Danish occupation. The surface is boldly undulated, and the soil consequently various: the lands are for the greater part enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The scenery is pleasingly diversified, and from the higher grounds are obtained some interesting views. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanrhyddlad, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, a small plain edifice, is beautifully situated near a little lake, and surrounded with scenery of pleasing and rural appearance. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A small parochial school, in which the poor children of the parish are gratuitously instructed, is supported by subscription. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £44. 19.

LLANVROTHEN (LLAN-VROTHEN), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (W.N.W.) from Tan y Bwlch, containing 657 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Brothen, an eminent British saint, who flourished about the end of the sixth century. It is situated between the two æstuaries of the Traeth Mawr and Traeth Bach, the former of which is now embanked and under cultivation, in a district abounding with mineral wealth, and comprises a tract of about six thousand acres, the surface of which is boldly undulated, rising in some parts into mountainous elevations. The surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified, combining features of romantic character and picturesque beauty. Various small streams here fall into the Glâslyn, or, as it is commonly called, the Traeth Mawr river; and there is one small lake called Cwmvoel. In this parish is included the greater part of the extensive tract gained, about twenty years ago, by an embankment made by the late Mr. Madocks, at the mouth of the Traeth Mawr: the soil of this marsh is a peaty clay, while that of the higher grounds is a dark reddish loam, producing good pasturage for live stock. Peat, which constitutes the principal fuel of the inhabitants, is found in abundance in various places. Lead-ore is procured at Bwlch Plwm; but the mines are not regularly worked. The village stands about a quarter of a mile from the turnpike road leading from Tan y Bwlch to Bethgelart. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £6. 15., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church is an ancient structure, appropriately fitted up for divine service. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. Evan Thomas, in 1732, bequeathed £20; William Lewis Anwyl left £10, and John Carreg £20; Gwen Prichard, in 1715, bequeathed a small portion of land; and Mrs. Lloyd, in 1784, a rent-charge of ten shillings, all for the benefit of the poor of this parish; besides which there is also a bequest of £1. 15. per annum, by an unknown benefactor, to be appropriated to the instruction of poor children. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £255. 12.

LLANVRYNACH (LLAN-VRYNACH), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S.E.) from Brecknock, containing 310 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Brynach, a celebrated Irish saint, who accompanied Brychan Brycheiniog into Britain, in the fifth century, and presided over some of the monastic institutions founded by that prince. It is a place of very remote antiquity, and appears to have been occupied at a very early period by the Romans, in connexion with their works in the mineral districts of Bryn Oer, through which the course of a Roman vicinal way from Cardiff, or Caerphilly, has been satisfactorily traced, leading directly to this place. That this district has been worked at some very remote period is evident from the scoria of ancient smelting works, especially on a field called "Clos y Geveilon," or the field of the forge; but that these works belonged to the Romans was not satisfactorily ascertained till the year 1775, when the remains of a Roman bath were discovered, in which was found a piece of malleable iron, four feet long and six inches wide. The parish is bounded on the south-east by the small river Mehascin, and on the west by the Cynrig; these rivers, across both of which are bridges kept in repair by the hundred, fall into the river Usk, by which the parish is skirted for nearly two miles on the north-east, and over which a good stone bridge was built in 1773, and is kept in repair at the expense of the county. The Brecknock and Abergavenny canal passes through the parish, and is carried over the Usk, near the bridge, by a handsome stone aqueduct of four arches. The village is situated near the turnpike road from Brecknock, which proceeds along the left bank of the Usk, to Abergavenny; and the neighbourhood abounds with finely varied scenery, in which the rivers that flow through the parish, with their bridges, and the distant woods and plantations, form pleasing and prominent features. The views from the higher grounds are interesting and extensive, embracing the magnificent range of mountains called the Brecknockshire Beacons, the lowest of which borders on the parish, and the small wood on the estate of Dinas, which has a very beautiful and picturesque appearance. Tŷ Mawr, the seat of Charles Claude Clifton, Esq., is supposed to have been originally built in the reign of Edward II., by Howel Gam, eldest son of Gruffydd ab Meredydd, who was lineally descended from Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog, now Brecknock: it had fallen into neglect and was for many years in the occupation of a farmer, but has been recently restored and embellished, in the later style of English architecture, by its present proprietor: the grounds, though flat, are tastefully disposed and enriched with numerous flourishing plantations. Maes-Derwen, the seat of John Parry Wilkins, Esq., is a neat modern edifice, pleasantly situated on a gentle eminence under the majestic chain of the Brecknockshire mountains: it forms a pleasing and conspicuous object from several parts of the surrounding country, and commands a fine view of an interesting and beautiful portion of the Vale of Usk, and of the neighbouring heights by which it is enclosed. Tregaer, formerly the seat of the family of Vaughan, and now the property of John Parry Wilkins, Esq., has been converted into a farm-house.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 10. 7½., and in the patronage of C. K. Kemeys Tynte, Esq. The advowson anciently belonged to the lords of Brecknock, and, upon the attainder of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, became vested in the crown; it was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Dr. William Aubrey, by whose descendant, Sir William Aubrey, it was sold, and descended from the purchaser to John Waters, Esq., whose only daughter conveyed it by marriage to the family of Tynte. The church, dedicated to St. Brynach, and now in a very dilapidated condition, is a very ancient structure, with a massive square tower at the west end, and consists of a nave and chancel, which are separated by a small gallery, probably the remains of the ancient rood-loft: the churchyard is one of the largest in the county, but contains only a small number of tombs, of which none are remarkable. The parsonage-house is a neat building, and, including the churchyard, has nearly five acres of glebe attached to it. Herbert Aubrey, of Clehonger, Esq., by deed in 1668, gave a rent-charge of £6, on a tenement called Pen y vagwyr, in the parish of Peterchurch, county of Hereford, to be annually divided among the poor of this parish at Christmas. The Roman remains above mentioned, as having been discovered in 1775, were situated in a field called Caermaen bâch, near the village, and were destroyed by the proprietor of the land, in order to avoid the annoyance to which he was subjected by the intense public interest which they excited, and which could be restrained within no bounds; but, from a drawing made of the bath, soon after its discovery, which is preserved in Mr. Jones' History of Brecknockshire, it appears to have comprised one warm and two cold baths, about seven feet four inches long, five feet one inch in width, and four feet deep. The tessellated pavement was formed of small blue, white, and red tesserae, varying in size from half an inch to an inch in diameter, and was supported on dwarf pillars of brick, about three feet and a half high, between which were laid down flues communicating with the warm bath. Many Roman coins, still preserved, have been found here, among which are several of Constantine, and one of Valentinian. Two sympuria were also discovered, one made of copper, and the other of a mixed metal: these instruments, which resemble narrow spoons, are supposed by some antiquaries to have been used for pouring oil on the victims in sacrifices, and by others they are thought to have been used as lachrymatories. No vestiges of military fortification are now visible; but the names of two tenements, in this parish, called respectively "Tregaer" and "Caerau," appear to indicate the existence of such works at some remote period. In a field called Cae Gwyn, in this parish, was an immense heap of loose stones, under which, on their removal in 1808, was found a kistvaen, formed of four stones placed on their edges and supporting a fifth in a horizontal position: human bones were found both within and on the lid of the kistvaen, which is supposed to be coeval with the appearance of the Romans in Britain, if not of earlier date.

Brychan Brycheiniog, one of the native reguli, who after the departure of the Romans governed this part of the principality, and gave his name to the county, is supposed to have resided in this parish, and to have founded the church, within the walls of which he is said to have been interred. This parish has been the birthplace of several individuals who are highly distinguished for their literary attainments, or by the offices of importance to which their talents had raised them. Dr. William Aubrey, of All Souls' College, Oxford, Principal of New Inn Hall, Regius Professor of civil law, advocate in the Court of Arches, member of the Council in the Marches of Wales, master in Chancery, chancellor to Archbishop Whitgift, and master in ordinary of the Court of Requests, was a native of this parish; he died in 1595, and was buried on the south side of the choir of the cathedral church of St. Paul's, London. William Aubrey was chancellor of the diocese of St. David's in 1514, and Thomas Aubrey, of the same family, and also a native of this parish, subsequently held the same office; and John Aubrey of Easton Percy, in the county of Wilts, and a descendant of the same family, assisted Dugdale in his compilation of the Monasticon: he was one of the earliest members of the Royal Society, and published several works, among which was a natural history of Surrey; he died in 1700. John Jones, the intimate friend of Archbishop Laud, was born in this parish in 1575: he received the earlier part of his education in Merchant Taylors' school, London, whence he went to Merton College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow; he afterwards embraced the Roman Catholic religion, and went into Spain, where he was chosen a brother of the Benedictine monastery of Compostella, upon which occasion he assumed the name of Leander de Sancto Martino. Having taken his degree of Doctor of Divinity, he went to Douay, where he was for many years professor of Hebrew in the chapel of Vedrastus, and subsequently was made prior of the Benedictine college of St. Gregory, in that place; he was also appointed vicar-general of the English Benedictines living in Spain, twice president of the Benedictines in England, and titular prior of the Catholic church of Canterbury. Upon the invitation of Archbishop Laud he returned to England, where he died in 1636, and was interred in the chapel of the Capuchins, near Somerset-House in the Strand, London. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £143. 14.

LLANVWROG (LLAN-VWROG), a parish in the hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N. W.) from Bodedern, containing 266 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the shore of the Irish sea, by which it is bounded on the west and south-west, and contains a considerable tract of enclosed and fertile land. The views from the higher grounds over the adjacent country and the Irish sea are interesting and extensive. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to the rectory of Llanvaethlu, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Mwrog, is a small ancient edifice in a very dilapidated condition, containing some curious remains of ancient oak carving: over the north entrance is a mutilated inscription, of which only a few of the letters, rudely formed, are remaining. According to tradition, there was anciently a chapel in a field called Monwent Mwrog, on the farm of Cevn Glàs, in this parish; but not a vestige of it is now to be seen. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The produce of some small charitable donations and bequests is distributed among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £191. 7.

LLANVWROG (LLAN-VWROG), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a mile (W.) from Ruthin, containing, with the exception of that part of the parish which is returned with the borough of Ruthin, 343 inhabitants. This parish, of which the township of Street extends into and forms part of the borough of Ruthin, is intersected by the turnpike roads from that borough to Cerrig y Druidion, to Corwen, and to Denbigh, and is bounded on the east by the river Clwyd. The neighbourhood is pleasingly diversified with hill and dale, and abounds with fine oak timber, which gives a stately air of grandeur to the surrounding scenery. Poole Park was formerly the seat of the ancient family of Salusbury, from whom it passed by marriage with the last heiress to Sir Walter Bagot, of Blithfield, in the county of Stafford, and is now the property of the present Lord Bagot, who in 1828 rebuilt the mansion in the Elizabethan style of architecture: it is a handsome edifice, and the pleasure grounds, which are extensive and finely laid out, comprehend many pleasing views and much beautiful and varied scenery. An attempt has been made to obtain lead-ore, for which purpose some works were erected at Coedmarchan, but they have not been attended with any success. The living is a rectory, in the diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £16. 13. 4., and in the peculiar jurisdiction and patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Mwrog, and situated in the township of Street, close to the river Clwyd, is a very ancient structure, containing some portions in the later style of English architecture in the eastern part, and having the piers and arches of the nave of much more ancient date. There is a place of worship for Baptists. This parish, being partly within the borough of Ruthin, has the advantage of the free grammar school of that place. A National school is supported by subscription, which is also open to children of Ruthin and of the parish of Llanrhudd: commodious school-rooms have been erected, in which seventy boys and sixty girls are gratuitously instructed. A Sunday school is also held in the church, which is conducted by the gratuitous attendance of voluntary teachers. An almshouse for four men and six women was founded in the middle of the seventeenth century, by Dame Jane Bagot, of Blithfield, in the county of Stafford, and endowed by her with £60 per annum; it is situated near the church. About £16 per annum, secured on lands and turnpike trusts, the aggregate amount of some charitable bequests, is distributed among the poor on St. Thomas' day. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £553. 11.

LLANVYLLIN (LLAN-VYLLIN), a borough, market town, and parish, in the lower division of the hundred of LLANVYLLIN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 20 miles (N. N. W.) from Montgomery, 12 (N. W. by N.) from Welshpool, and 183 (N. W. by W.) from London, containing 1836 inhabitants. This place derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Myllin, or Mewn Llyn, concerning whom a tradition is extant that he was the first baptist ever known in Britain, and from being constantly in the water baptizing and inviting those who passed by to partake of that ceremony, was called by the natives St. Mewn Llyn, or "the Saint in the Pool." It appears to have been of very inferior importance prior to the time of Edward I., during whose reign several privileges and immunities were granted to its inhabitants. In 1644, Charles I. passed one night in this place, and on the following day dined at Brithdir, whence he continued his route through Mochnant to Cevnhirvynydd, proceeding along the tops of the mountains to Chirk castle. The town is pleasantly situated in a fertile valley, on the road from Shrewsbury to Bala, and is intersected by the small river Abel, which, uniting with the river Cain, flows through the parish, and, pursuing its course through the adjoining one of Llanvechan, falls into the river Vyrnwy at Llansantffraid: it has been greatly improved within the last few years, and a neat bridge has been erected over the Abel, which flows through the principal street; but, from its retired situation at a distance from any great thoroughfare, it possesses very little commercial importance. The trade is principally in malt, for the making of which there are several kilns: there are likewise some tanneries carried on to a moderate extent. All the waste lands in the parish have been enclosed by act of parliament; but many hundred acres still remain uncultivated. Between this town and Bôdvâch there was formerly an extensive turbary, from which the inhabitants were entirely supplied with fuel, but which was converted into fertile meadows, at a considerable expense, by Bell Lloyd, Esq., father of the present Lord Mostyn, and on part of it was erected a beautiful cottage, called the Vownog, the residence of John Williams, Esq. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and in many parts highly picturesque, and from the higher grounds are obtained some fine views over the vale of Cain, and other valleys in the vicinity, eminent for the beauty of their scenery. The market, which is well supplied with corn and provisions of every kind, is held on Thursday in a convenient area under the town-hall; and fairs are held annually on the Wednesday next before Easter, May 24th, June 28th, August 10th, October 5th, and December 8th, for horses, cattle, and wares; and sheep and pigs are exposed for sale on the day preceeding each of the fairs, except those of August and December. The inhabitants received their first charter of incorporation from Llewelyn ab Gruffydd ab Gwenwynwyn, in the reign of Edward I., which was confirmed by Edward de Charlton, Lord of Powys, in the 11th year of the reign of Henry V., and invests the burgesses with power to take, imprison, and try thieves and other malefactors, and, in the event of their escape, to pursue them in any direction for a distance not exceeding a league from the town; and any stranger residing within it, and paying scot and lot for one year, could claim his freedom. This charter was extended and confirmed by Charles II., in the 25th year of his reign, at which time the government of the borough became vested in two bailiffs, a high steward, a recorder, and fourteen capital burgesses, assisted by a town-clerk, two serjeants at mace, and other officers. The bailiffs are chosen annually, one by the lord of the manor, and the other by the burgesses at large, and both are justices of the peace within the borough, of which the jurisdiction is co-extensive with the parish: the other officers of the corporation are chosen by the bailiffs. The borough was made to participate, in the 27th of Henry VIII., in the elective franchise, as a contributory borough with those of Llanidloes, Machynlleth, and Welshpool, in the return of a member for the county town of Montgomery. This privilege was confirmed by a resolution of the House of Commons, in 1680, but was afterwards denied by another resolution of that house, in 1728, which disfranchised these boroughs, in consequence of the inhabitants refusing to contribute towards defraying the expenses of the member, namely, thirteen shillings and fourpence for each borough, and confined the right of voting exclusively to the burgesses of Montgomery. These resolutions, however, being in opposition to each other, the burgesses, by an act of the 28th of George III., were empowered to assert their right of voting for a member for Montgomery before another committee of the House of Commons, and of appealing within twelve calendar months against any future decision. By the late act for amending the representation of the people the elective franchise has been restored to Llanvyllin, which, with Llanidloes, Machynlleth, Montgomery, Newtown, and Welshpool, unites in sending one member to parliament: the right of voting is vested in every male person of full age, occupying a house or other premises of the annual value of not less than ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which were extended by the late act, and are minutely detailed in the Appendix to this work, including an area of about five hundred acres, is sixty. Llanvyllin has also by the late act been made one of the polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire. The freedom of the borough is inherited by the eldest sons only of freemen, on their attaining the age of twenty-one, or conferred by gift of the bailiffs and capital burgesses. The corporation are empowered to hold quarter sessions for the borough; and petty sessions both for the borough and for the hundred are held in the town-hall every Thursday. Courts leet and baron are held twice in the year, within a month of Easter and Michaelmas; but the court baron does not at present exercise the jurisdiction to which it has a claim in the recovery of debts. The town-hall, situated on one side of the principal street, is a neat building of brick, containing in the upper story a commodious room, forty-five feet long and twenty feet wide, which is used for the transaction of all public business, and during the intervals is appropriated to the use of the National school, affording underneath a convenient and sheltered area for the use of the market: it was erected in 1789, at an expense of £1500, defrayed by the sale of waste lands under the provisions of an act obtained for that purpose in 1775. A lock-up house, consisting of two rooms, for the confinement of prisoners, and an apartment for the residence of the constable, was erected in 1829, at an expense of £350: the ground was purchased and presented to the corporation by the Rev. D. Hughes, rector of the parish, and one of the most indefatigable magistrates in the county.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £10. 13. 6½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Myllin, or Mewn Llyn, is a neat edifice of brick, erected in the year 1706, upon the site of a more ancient structure, which, having fallen into a dilapidated state, was taken down: the walls of the body of the edifice, as well as of the tower, which is also of brick, and contains a fine peal of eight bells, presented by Lord Mostyn are embattled and surmounted with pinnacles. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Mrs. Vaughan of Llangedwin, in 1720, bequeathed the sum of £1116. 10. in the funds, to be invested in the purchase of lands for the foundation and endowment of charity schools for twenty boys and ten girls of this parish, and for twelve boys of the parish of Llanvihangel, to be annually clothed: this sum, after having accumulated to £1220. 10., was laid out in mortgage on the estate of Llwydiarth, belonging to Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., and produces an income to the charity of £61 per annum. Mrs. Mary Strangeways, of the parish of Melbury, in the county of Dorset, daughter of Mrs. Vaughan, purchased a tenement in Llaethbwlech, now producing a rent of £60 per annum, which she gave for the support of these schools, to which also Henry Thomas, Esq., in 1713, bequeathed £100, which, from accumulated interest, produces £8 per annum. There are at present in these schools, which since the year 1820 have been conducted on the National plan, sixty boys and sixty girls, of whom twenty boys and ten girls are annually clothed: the boys' school-room is in the town-hall; the girls', which was erected by subscription in 1820, is situated near the church. There are also Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Edward Lloyd bequeathed a portion of land, the produce of which he directed to be annually distributed in money and bread to the poor. Charles Edwards, in 1717, bequeathed £50; Lewis Evans left £20; John Morris £10; Anne Wynn £10; and John Griffiths, in 1722, bequeathed £10, also for the benefit of the poor.

In the hamlet of Bôdyddon, in this parish, at a place called the "Street," are some remains of a Roman road; and in the same division of the parish are also an ancient British encampment, and a well called Fynnon Coed y Llan, which is supposed to have been the well of St. Myllin, who is said to have resided near the spot. There are vestiges of several intrenchments in other parts of the parish, also the remains of an ancient house, built in 1599, in which Lord Castlemain, ambassador from James II. to the pope, is said to have been concealed for some time after the Revolution by a family named Price, to whom he fled for an asylum. The altar-piece of the chapel in this house, and an exquisitely carved book-case, removed from this old mansion, are now at Brynaber, near Llanvyllin, the seat of Maurice Bibbey, Esq., to whom the remains above mentioned belong. There are several gentlemen's seats within the parish and in its vicinity, among which, in the hamlet of that name, is situated Bôdvâch, the property of Lord Mostyn, a handsome mansion beautifully situated on the banks of the river Cain, and surrounded with thriving plantations: the grounds are tastefully disposed, and present much interesting scenery, commanding a fine view of the church and town of Llanvyllin. Thomas Price, a member of the same family, a man of learning and fond of antiquarian researches, formed a valuable collection of manuscripts, which is supposed to have been deposited in the Vatican Library at Rome. Near the town, on the other side, and at the entrance of the well-wooded Vale of Abel, which is watered by the river of that name, stand the splendid mansion of Llwyn, the residence of William Humphreys, Esq. The Rev. Thomas Richards, who was appointed rector of this parish, in 1718, by Bishop Wynne, published a folio volume of Latin Hexameters upon the death of Queen Caroline, consort of George I., which he dedicated to Bishop Maddox, clerk of the closet to Her Majesty: he was an elegant scholar, and is said by Dr. Trapp, professor of poetry in the University of Oxford, to have been the best writer of Latin verse since the time of Virgil. At Dôl y velin Blwm, near Llanvyllin, many tons of lead have been procured from the imperfectly reduced scoria of some ancient British smelting hearths. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £616. 2.

LLANVYNYDD (LLAN-VYNYDD), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. W.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 1436 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very considerable extent, is pleasantly situated near the head of the river Sannan, and the river Cothy separates it on the north-west from the parish of Brechva. The lands are for the greater part enclosed and cultivated, and the soil is tolerably fertile. Fairs are held annually in the village on May 6th, July 5th, September 28th, and November 19th. This parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, annexed to the precentorship in that establishment, and rated in the king's books at £18. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £6. 13. 4., endowed with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Egwad, is not entitled to architectural notice.

There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. On an eminence at Coed henog, near the left bank of the Cothy, are the remains of an ancient fortress of considerable extent and elliptical form; and there are several cairns and monumental stones scattered through the parish. There are some small charitable donations and bequests for the relief the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £397. 16.

LLANVYRNACH (LLAN-VRYNACH), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 979 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is situated in the north-eastern part of the county, bordering upon Carmarthenshire, and comprises an extensive tract of land, of which the greater portion is enclosed and cultivated. The surrounding scenery, though not characterized by any peculiarity of feature, is generally pleasing and in some instances picturesque: the soil, though inferior in fertility to that of other parts of the county, is not unproductive. An extensive common, connected with Precelly mountain, rises to the west of the village, but an enclosure of land was made in the parish a few years ago. On the banks of the river Tâf, and at no great distance from its source, are some extensive lead mines, which were formerly worked with great success; but for some years the works have been suspended. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Brynach, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. There are places of worship for Baptists and Presbyterians. On the common above the church are four large erect stones, visible at a great distance, marking out, according to tradition, the graves of two chieftains who were slain in a desperate battle which is said to have been fought near that spot: and near the church is a large tumulus, which is supposed to have been surmounted by a castle, or fort, to defend the pass. There are several mineral springs within the parish, but their peculiar properties have not been ascertained. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £194. 9.

LLANWDDYN, or LLANOUDDYN (LLAN-OWDDYN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of LLANVYLLIN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 12 miles (W. by N.) from Llanvyllin, containing 668 inhabitants. This parish, which formerly constituted a chapelry, dependent on the adjacent parish of Llanrhaidr in Mochnant, is said to derive its name from a giant named Wddin, or Owddyn, who was born here; and on the neighbouring hills is a place called Gwely Wddin, or "the bed of Wddin," where he is supposed to have resided. But other accounts, with more probability, describe Wddin to have been an anchorite, who had a cell among the rocks in this place, in which he lived in seclusion and retirement. It is affirmed, on the authority of an absurd local tradition, that immense treasures are concealed in this place, and that all attempts to discover them have been frustrated by incessant storms. The path of Wddin, when he went to visit St. Monacella, whose cell was at Pennant Melangel, on the other side of the mountain, five miles distant, is still pointed out, and called by his name. The vale in which the village is situated is about five miles in length, and varies from half a mile to a mile in breadth: it is frequently covered with water during the winter months, but, if drained, would be one of the most picturesque and fertile in this part of the principality. The village occupies a pleasant site near the river Owddyn, a tributary of the Vyrnwy, and nearly at the north-western extremity of the county, in a sequestered spot sheltered by mountains on both sides. Within the parish are two slate quarries, one at Gallt Forgan, near Rhiw Argor, which has been worked for some years; the other at Lluestwen, about two miles south-westward from the village, which was opened in the year 1830. The quantity of slates raised from these quarries is but very inconsiderable, and, though the mines are capable of producing a vast amount, must necessarily remain so till better roads are made for conveying the produce to the surrounding districts. Attempts to procure lead-ore have been repeatedly made at Cynon Isâ and other places, but without sufficient success to remunerate the adventurers. Fairs are annually held in the village on May 8th and October 2nd, principally for cattle and horses. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1000 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Earl of Powis. The tithes of the parish belong to the Earl and to the Dean and Chapter of St. Asaph, with the exception of those of the township of Garthbwllch, which are appropriated to the rector and vicar of Llansantffraid yn Mechan. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, is an ancient structure, which formerly belonged to the knights hospitallers: in the churchyard are some remarkably fine yew trees. Mr. David Humphreys, in 1721, bequeathed £30 to the poor of the parish, the interest of which sum is annually distributed according to the will of the testator. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £167. 7.

LLANWENLLWYVO (LLAN-WENLLWYVO), a parish in the hundred of TWRCELYN, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (E. S. E.) from Amlwch, containing 534 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the coast of the Irish sea, and partakes much of the general character of dreary sterility by which the mining districts in the immediate vicinity are distinguished, though in some parts the scenery displays features of fertility and even of romantic beauty. Many of the inhabitants are employed in the Parys and Mona copper mines, which are situated in the adjoining parish of Amlwch. Llŷs Dulas, the property and occasionally the residence of Lord Dinorben, is a spacious mansion situated in extensive grounds, within which the parish church forms a conspicuous and interesting object. The Traeth Dulas, or Dulas sands, at the mouth of the river Dulas, which rises from a lake in this district, stretch along a part of the shore here and form a small bay, while other portions of the coast are bold and precipitous: within a short distance is the small island of Ynys Gadarn. The living is a perpetual curacy, annexed to that of Amlwch, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor, and in the patronage of the Bishop, who is proprietor of the great tithes, but in half of the parcel called Rhôs y Manach the tithes belong to the Rector of Llanellian.

The church, dedicated to St. Gwenllwyvo, a small neat edifice, is situated in a retired and sequestered spot within the grounds of Llŷs Dulas, and is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. The poor children of this parish receive gratuitous instruction in the National school at Amlwch; and there are some trifling benefactions for distribution among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £175. 11.

LLANWENOG (LLAN WENOG), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (W. S. W.) from Lampeter, containing 1647 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises the upper and lower divisions, is pleasantly situated on the river Teivy, and on the turnpike road leading from Lampeter to Cardigan. It is distinguished as the scene of a memorable battle, which was fought in 981, between the Danes, under their famous leader Godfrid, and the native Welsh under Eineon ab Owain (in which the former were totally defeated), or, according to Dr. Meyrick, between Eineon and his countryman Hywel ab Ievav; and a square intrenchment in a field called Cae'r Vaes, or "the field of battle," on the farm of Tŷ cam, in this parish, is still pointed out as the spot where the engagement took place. The parish, which is very extensive, is intersected by the road from Lampeter to Cardigan, and comprehends a large tract of arable and pasture land, the greater portion of which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery, though not characterized by any extraordinary features, is in general pleasing, and is enlivened by several handsome seats and villas. Llanvaughan, a handsome, though deserted, mansion, now the property of the nieces of the late Admiral Thomas, who erected it in 1786, is beautifully situated: the pleasure grounds are laid out with great taste, and abound with a rich variety of ornamental scenery. The admiral's family name was originally Lloyd: he was a native of this parish, and a member of the family of the Lloyds of Castel Hywel. High Mead, the seat of Herbert Evans, Esq., is delightfully situated on an eminence above the river Teivy, commanding an extensive prospect of the surrounding country on both sides of the vale, which here expands into considerable breadth: the house is completely sheltered from the north winds by an extensive range of lofty hills, the summits and acclivities of which are richly planted with thriving woods of luxuriant foliage, which add much to the beauty of the surrounding scenery. A fair is held here on January 14th. This place formerly constituted a prebend in the collegiate church of Llandewy-Brevi, rated in the king's books at £17. 12. 11. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The parish is divided into two portions, called respectively the Freehold land and the Grange: the Grange portion of the tithes is divided into three parts, of which one belongs to the Peterwell estate, and the other two parts are added to the freehold land portion: the freehold tithes, including this addition, are divided into two parts, of which one belongs to the High Mead estate, and the other part is divided between the Crosswood estate and the vicar. The church, dedicated to St. Gwynog, is an ancient structure, with a massive tower sixty-six feet high, a very unusual appendage to churches in this part of the principality. There were formerly four chapels of ease to the mother church of this parish, of which there is not one now in existence. There are two places of worship for Baptists, and one for Presbyterians. Among the remains of antiquity are, an ancient monumental stone, with an inscription in rude characters, which Dr. Meyrick reads "Trenacatus ic jacet filius Maglagni," two circular tumuli, near the river Teivy, supposed to have been originally thrown up and crowned with forts, to defend the passage of the river; and a barrow called Crûg yr Udon, which, on being opened, was found to contain a coffin of glazed earth, in which were human bones placed in an upright position. In this parish is an ancient fortress called Castel Moyddyn, which is inserted in Mr. Owen's map; but of its origin or history there are no records, nor has any traditional account of it been preserved. There was also within the last few years another relic of antiquity, called Carn Philip Gwyddyl, the cairn or barrow of Philip the Irishman, a curious bank of earth, six yards in length and four feet high, resembling in form the rude sketch of a prostrate human figure, without the head, and with the arm stretched out: it was situated in a field not far from the church, but was destroyed a few years since. Tradition reports it to have marked the burial-place of a freebooter, who lived in the tower of the church, and who, on leaping from it when closely pursued, broke his leg and was captured. The Rev. David Lloyd, a poet of minor celebrity, was interred here, but no monument has been erected to his memory. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £770.6.

LLANWINIO (LLAN WYNO), a parish, comprising the eastern and western divisions, in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 13 miles (W. N. W.) from Carmarthen, containing 1024 inhabitants, of which number, 417 are in the eastern, and 607 in the western, division. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is situated near the western extremity of the county, on the border of Pembroke-shire, and comprises a large tract of land, of which the greater portion is enclosed and cultivated: it is watered by the small river called Avon Gynin. The surrounding country is finely diversified, and the distant views comprehend some fine combinations of mountain scenery and richly luxuriant pasture lands in the vicinity. The soil is fertile; and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture and in the feeding of numerous flocks of sheep. The village is pleasantly situated: an annual fair for sheep is held on the 12th of November. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Mrs. Howel. The church, dedicated to St. Gwyno, stands near the right bank of the Avon Gynin river. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists, and for another congregation assuming no other denomination than that of Dissenters, who collectively support a Sunday school for the gratuitous

LLANWYNDVA (LLAN-WYNDVA), a parish in the hundred of UWCHGORVAI, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. by W.) from Carnarvon, containing 1264 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Gwyndav, who flourished during the sixth century. The parish is situated on the turnpike road from Carnarvon to Pwllheli, and comprises a very extensive tract of mountainous country, abounding with mineral treasures. Slate of excellent quality is found among the mountains, and very considerable quarries have been opened; but from the difficulty of conveying the produce to any shipping-place, they are not worked to their full extent. Large quantities of copper-ore have also been discovered here, but so mixed with iron as to require great labour and expense in separating it. For this reason the works are not carried on to any advantage, especially as the low price of that metal is insufficient to remunerate the adventurers for the trouble of procuring it. The rail-road from Llanllŷnvi to Carnarvon passes near the south side of the churchyard, but does not appear to have been made available for the exportation of the mineral produce of this parish, by the construction of any collateral communication with the quarries or the mines. The village is small, being chiefly inhabited by persons employed in the quarries and in agriculture. The surrounding scenery strikingly combines objects of rugged grandeur with features of rural beauty; and the distant views are interesting and extensive. The living consists of both a rectory and a vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Bangor: the rectory, which is a sinecure, is annexed to the headship of Jesus' College, Oxford, and the vicarage, which is discharged, and to which the perpetual curacy of Llanvagdalen is annexed, is endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church is a venerable and beautiful cruciform structure, principally in the early style of English architecture, but in a state of great dilapidation: the chancel is lighted by three elegant lancet-shaped windows; and the interior of the edifice displays in many parts fine specimens of architectural beauty: there are some good monuments of the Baron Hill family, but in a very neglected state, and the whole appears to be rapidly falling into ruin. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school was maintained for many years at the sole expense of the curate of the parish, but has been lately discontinued. A school-house was built many years ago, on the north side of the church, and some bequests were made for teaching poor children of the parish, but they have been lost. Mrs. Ellen Williams, in 1714, bequeathed £200 for the augmentation of the vicar's stipend, and £100, the interest of which she directed to be distributed among the poor annually. The Rev. Lewis Jones, in 1692, bequeathed £63.12., directing the interest to be annually divided among twelve aged men or women, and a rent-charge of £3, to be divided among twelve poor natives of the parish, or, in default of such, among inhabitants of seven years' standing. Near a farm called Bôdaden some slight traces of a Roman road are still discernible, pointing to the ancient Segontium, near Carnarvon. There are likewise some remains of two ancient British fortifications, called respectively Yr Hên Castell and Dinas Gorvai, or Gorvai, the latter probably deriving its name from its situation on the river Gorvai: of the former but very slight vestiges are discernible, and the latter, which is situated near Pont Newydd, has been so much damaged by the action of the rapid stream of the Gorvai, during times of flood, against its base, that the upper part has fallen, and only a portion of the foundations can now be distinguished. The Rev. Mr. Farrington, who employed a considerable portion of his time in antiquarian pursuits, was for some years vicar of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £386.

LLANWYNDY (LLAN-WYNDAY), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.W.) from Fishguard, containing 1046 inhabitants. This place appears to be of very remote antiquity, and the adjoining district is supposed to have been a favourite resort of the ancient Druids. That there was a principal station for the solemnization of their rites is plainly indicated by the number of Druidical remains that are scattered over the parish and throughout the vicinity, and also from various adjacent spots which still retain the names "Llan Druidion," "Fynnon Druidion," and others of similar import and origin. Near Fynnon Druidion were found five instruments of flint, supposed to have been used in flaying the victims devoted to sacrifice; and in the vale below is a circular earthwork, marked out by a solitary erect stone, probably to defend the pass of a small stream by which it is skirted, and perhaps also to protect the avenue to the consecrated region. According to tradition, an ancient town called Trêv Culhwch is said to have existed here at a very early period, of which evidence is frequently obtained in the foundations of ancient buildings which still obstruct the plough in various parts of the farm on which it is situated. About the year 1076, Trehaern ab Caradoc, Prince of North Wales, led his forces into South Wales, for the purpose of subjecting this country to his dominion, and at Pwlhgwttic was boldly encountered by Rhys ab Owain, the reigning prince, with all the forces he could levy: here, after a long and sanguinary conflict, Rhys was at length defeated, with the loss of most of his army, and being himself closely pursued by the victor, he was at length taken prisoner with his brother Howel, and both were put to death by Trehaern in revenge for the murder of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, which they had previously committed. The French effected a landing on this part of the coast in the year 1797, and, after plundering the inhabitants for some time, the soldiers becoming insubordinate through excess, their commander found it necessary to make an unconditional surrender to the local forces brought against him by Earl Cawdor. The parish is pleasantly situated in the north-western part of the county, and is bounded on the north by St. George's channel, and on the east by Fishguard bay, forming a promontory with a bold and precipitous shore, and indented by several small bays, the soundings within half a mile of the coast being from seven to twenty fathoms. The surrounding scenery is diversified with features of romantic grandeur; and the views from the higher grounds embrace extensive prospects over the channel and the adjacent country, which abounds with objects of in-

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 5.  $2\frac{1}{2}$ ., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Precentor and Canons in the cathedral church of St. David's, to whom the rectorial tithes are appropriated. The church, dedicated to St. Gwynndav, is not distinguished by any architectural features of importance. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic Methodists. William Hugh, in 1778, bequeathed £20 to the poor not receiving parochial relief. A strong chain of well-connected forts, extending in a direction from east to west throughout the whole length of the parish, is said to be of British origin: that on Garn vawr rock comprises an extensive area, enclosed by strong ramparts of uncemented stones, on the most accessible parts, flanked with portions of the rock which project in the form of natural bastions. On the summit of the hill above Goodwick pier is a rocking-stone, weighing about five tons, and so nicely poised as to yield to the slightest pressure. A little beyond it are three remarkable cromlechs in a right line, of which two have been overturned, but one still preserves its original position. Another cromlech stands on the ledge of rock just above the village, the table stone of which is fifteen feet in length, nine feet in width, and of an average thickness of two feet; and to the west of the site of the ancient town of Trêv Culhwch are the majestic remains of several cromlechs, of which one, more perfect than the rest, has a table stone fifteen feet long, eight feet wide, and two feet and a half in thickness. On opening a cairn, in 1826, for the purpose of widening a road near the sea, in this parish, was found a brass instrument, about nine inches long, with a circular ring at one end, and a flat triangle at the other, and pierced with two round holes in the neck which connected these together; it is now in the possession of D. O. Lewis, Esq., of Swansea, but no satisfactory conjecture has been offered as to the use to which it was applied. Near Trêv Asser, in this parish, is a tumulus surrounded with a moat, which, on being opened some years since, was found to contain fragments of urns, and other indications of its having been a place of sepulture. Trêv Asser is said to have been the birthplace of Asser, the friend and biographer of Alfred the Great. The celebrated Archdeacon Giraldus Cambrensis, who attended Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, while preaching the crusades throughout the principality, and is better known for his literary works and numerous ecclesiastical appointments, was for some time incumbent of this parish. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £382. 7.

LLANWYNNEN (LLAN-WNEN), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{4}$  miles (W. by S.) from Lampeter, containing 328 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the south by the river Teivy, and is intersected by the Granell, which flows into the Vale of Teivy, to its confluence with the superior stream, and on the turnpike road from Lampeter to Cardigan. The surrounding scenery is beautifully picturesque, and the views of the adjacent country comprehend many objects of interest and features of pleasing character. On the bank of the Granell is a moated mound, called Castell Dû, which was probably crowned with a fort for defending the river and the pass of the vale, but which now serves only to give name to the farm on which it is situated; and there is also a small encampment on the hill. In a field attached to a farm, called Cevn Llew Trêv, some curious silver coins were dug up a few years since. About a mile from the turnpike road, and in the vale of the Granell, is Llwyn y Groes, the deserted seat of the family of Jones, of Neuadd, in the adjoining parish. The mansion, which is spacious and handsome, is finely situated in the midst of flourishing plantations, and the grounds comprehend much beautiful scenery. A fair is held on December 13th. The living is a discharged vicarage, with which that of Silian is consolidated, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3.4.9½, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Bishop, to whom two-thirds of the tithes are appropriated, the other third belonging to the vicar. The church, dedicated to St. Gwynin, is a small edifice, without either tower or spire, and possessing no architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Unitarians. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £159.

LLANWNNOG (LLAN-WYNNOG), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 6½ miles (W. by N.) from Newtown, containing 1355 inhabitants. The name of this place is derived from the dedication of its church to St. Gwynnog, an eminent member of the congregation of Catwg, who flourished about the middle of the sixth century, and was canonized after his decease. The parish is bounded on the south by the river Severn, which is joined near Caer-Sws, in this parish, by the Tarannon stream, which descends into it through the Vale of Trêveglwys. The surface is boldly undulated, and the surrounding country displays a pleasing variety of picturesque beauty and rich mountain scenery. Among the loftiest of the hills within its limits are three fine lakes, called respectively Llŷn Mawr, "the great lake;" Llŷn Tarw, "the bull's lake;" and Llŷn Dû, "the black lake." Llŷn Mawr covers an area of twenty-five acres, exclusively of a large turbary on its margin, which, before the lake was dammed up to feed the Montgomeryshire canal, was also covered with water. The average depth of this lake, when dammed up, was twelve yards; but since the canal has been supplied with water from the river Severn, its depth has been reduced to eight yards. Both in the lake and the adjoining turbary are extensive remains of ancient forests: in the former they consist chiefly of oaks in a prostrate position, but on the present surface of the turbary they are principally of fir or pine, with scarcely any portion of oak. These remains afford conclusive evidence that the adjacent hills were covered with forest timber at a very remote period. Peat is found in abundance in the neighbourhood of this and the other lakes; and the margins of all where it is procured have an elevation of fifteen hundred feet above the level of the Vale of Caer-Sws. The waste lands have been allotted under the "Arustley Enclosure Act," obtained in 1816, since which time much of them has been enclosed and brought under cultivation. The village is pleasantly situated on the turnpike road leading from Newtown to Machynlleth: a few of the inhabitants are employed in the manufacture of flannel, which is carried on upon a moderate scale. The living is a discharged vicarage, within the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £4.16.5½, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, and contains some beautiful specimens of ancient sculpture: the screen and rood-loft are exquisitely carved, and in a state of excellent preservation: the chancel window is embellished with stained glass, in which the patron saint is represented in episcopal vestments, with a mitre on his head and a crozier in his hand, and underneath the figure is the inscription "Sanctus Gwynocus, cujus animæ propitiatur Deus. Amen." In the churchyard are several venerable yew trees of luxuriant growth. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A parochial school is supported by subscription for the gratuitous instruction of poor children: and there are also Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Hugh Baxter, in 1687, bequeathed £50; Richard Baxter, in 1690, gave £50, and subsequently £50 more; and Richard Gittins, in 1783, gave £10, the interest of which sums is annually distributed among the poor; and Anne Pritchard, in 1760, bequeathed £20, the interest to be annually given to poor decayed housekeepers in this parish. The hamlet of Caer-Sws was the site of a Roman station, through which has been traced a Roman road leading from Deva, now Chester, to the mines in the adjacent parish of Trêveglwys, and of which a description is given under its appropriate head. On the hills adjoining Llŷn Mawr are numerous carneddau, supposed to be ancient sepulchres of the aboriginal inhabitants, and one of the hills is distinguished by the name of Carneddau. Scattered over the parish and its vicinity are also the remains of several ancient British encampments, among which may be noticed those at Gwyn Vynydd, Rhôsddi-Arbed, and Cevn Carnedd. At Park, the largest farm in the parish, Queen Elizabeth is said to have kept a stud of horses, to which circumstance is attributed the superior breed of horses for which this part of the principality is distinguished. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £843.14.

LLANWNWS (LLAN-WNWS), a parish, comprising the townships of Gwnnws-Isâv, or Lower, and Gwnnws-Uchâv, or Upper, which separately maintain their own poor, in the upper division of the hundred of LLAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (S.E. by S.) from Aberystwith, and 15 (N.N.E.) from Lampeter, containing 919 inhabitants, of which number, 467 are in the higher division, which contains the church. This parish, which extends nearly fourteen miles in length, and, upon the average, three miles in breadth, comprises a wide tract nearly in the centre of the county, bounded on the north by the river Ystwith, and on the south by the Teivy. The surrounding scenery, though not generally rich, or distinguished by any prevailing character, is enlivened by some picturesque and romantic features, the most prominent of which is the beautiful fall called Pwll Caradoc, supposed to have derived its designation from a chieftain of that name, who is said to have met his death by rushing over the precipice, which is of very considerable height. The lands are but very partially enclosed, a large proportion of this extensive parish being uncultivated. In the Upper division are the mines called Esgair Mŵn, of which a plan was made in 1758, by order of the Court of Exchequer; they are not at present worked. The inhabitants obtain their letters chiefly from Aberystwith; but a part of the parish is within the delivery of Lampeter. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Chichester family. The church, dedicated to St. Gwnnws, is a small ancient edifice, situated on the summit of a hill, and consisting only of a nave and chancel. In the churchyard is an ancient monumental stone, about three feet nine inches in height, ornamented on the east front with an embellished cross, and bearing an inscription so greatly mutilated as to be at present quite illegible: it is supposed by some antiquaries to commemorate the death of the above-mentioned unfortunate chieftain. On the sacramental cup is inscribed the date 1574. A small Sunday school is supported by subscription. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £133. 6., of which sum, £61. 13. is assessed on the township of Gwnnws-Uchâv.

LLANWONNO (LLAN-WYNNO), a parish in the hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N.W. by N.) from Cardiff to Newbridge (the principal village within its limits), containing 1094 inhabitants. This parish, which is bounded on the east by the river Tâf, is nearly equally divided between mountain and valley; Cwm Clydach, Cwm Rhondda, and Cwm Cynon, watered by their respective streams, are partly within it. The Aberdare canal passes down the last, and forms a junction with the Glamorganshire canal at Navigation House, in the parish of Llanvabon; and up Cwm Rhondda is a tram-road, communicating with the collieries worked there. The Rhondda falls into the river Tâf at the populous village of Newbridge, of which the part situated in this parish is the largest: here a weekly market for provisions is held, and a considerable quantity of corn is conveyed hence for the supply of Merthyr-Tydvil. The celebrated bridge called Pont y Prydd crosses the Tâf at Newbridge, and is described in the account of that place. This parish is within the jurisdiction of the court of requests held at Merthyr Tydvil, on the second Thursday in every month, for the recovery of debts not exceeding £5. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Llantrissant. The church, dedicated to St. Wonno, and distant three miles from Newbridge, is romantically situated on the rocky side of Cevngwingil mountain, at a considerable distance from any habitation. There are places of worship for Baptists and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £393. 11.

LLANWRDA (LLAN-WRDA), a parish, comprising the Upper and Lower divisions, in the higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles, by the ford over the river Towy, (W. by S.) from Llandovery, and containing 560 inhabitants. This parish, which is intersected by the turnpike road from Llandilo to Llandovery, is beautifully situated in a pleasing and retired vale, watered by a fine stream that joins the Towy immediately contiguous, and surrounded by lofty hills richly clothed with wood. A small manufacture of coarse woollen cloth is carried on within its limits, and an annual fair is held in the village on the 5th of October. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Llansadwrn, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's. The church is dedicated to St. Cawrdav. There is a place of worship for Independents. Lady Letitia Cornwallis, one of the coheiresses of the ancient family of Abermarlais, in the adjoining parish of Llansadwrn, bequeathed, in 1731, £400 for the endowment of a free school for the children of both sexes, in the parishes of Llansadwrn and Llanwrda, and £1000 for the endowment of an establishment for four maiden gentlewomen of the county of Carmarthen; and £800 for the purchase of ground and the erection of suitable buildings. These several sums being suffered to accumulate in the funds till a site near the church could be obtained, according to the direction of her will, amounted in 1793 to the sum of £9000, which was then appropriated to the purposes of the will, and the buildings were completed and inhabited in 1795. The schoolmaster, who is appointed by the vestry of Llanwrda, has a salary of £60 per annum, with a house and garden rent-free; and each of the maiden gentlewomen receives £37. 14. 1. per annum, and £20 per annum is allowed for furniture for their apartments. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure of £174. 1.

LLANWRIN (LLAN-WRIN), a parish in the hundred of MACHYNLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N.E. by E.) from Machynlleth, containing 802 inhabitants. This parish, which lies in the western portion of the county, bordering upon Merionethshire, is pleasantly situated on the north bank of the river Dovey, and comprises a considerable tract of mountainous country. The surrounding scenery is finely varied, and from the higher grounds are seen some of the principal mountains in North Wales, with nearly the whole of the beautiful vale of Dovey, through which that river pursues its winding course. The road from Machynlleth to Dôlgeley, through the vale of the Dylas, is remarkable for the beauty of its views, the vale being characterized by strikingly romantic and picturesque scenery. From the front of Vronvelen is a fine prospect, embracing on the left the small, richly wooded, and highly cultivated valley, watered by the little river Dylas, and on the right is an extensive range of bleak and sterile mountains, beyond which the rugged head of Cader Idris is seen towering with sullen grandeur in the distance. The mountainous districts of the parish are supposed to be rich in mineral wealth; but their only produce is slate, of which some quarries are worked upon a moderate scale. Peat, which is the principal fuel of the inhabitants, is found in abundance. The turnpike road leading from Dinasmowddwy to Aberdovey passes through the village. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £12. 16.  $5\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Gwrin, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture: the chancel window is embellished with stained glass, and in the central compartment, which is the most perfect, is a representation of Christ upon the Cross. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. Sunday schools are maintained in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Mrs. Anne Pugh bequeathed £50, an unknown benefactor £49, and John David Evan £10, the interest of which sums, together with that of several smaller benefactions, was directed by the several donors to be annually distributed among the poor. On the bank of the river Dovey, in this parish, is Mathavarn, the ancient residence of Davydd Llwyd ab Llewelyn ab Gruffydd, a celebrated bard and seer, who flourished in this part of the principality from 1470 to 1490. The Earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., on his route from Milford to Bosworth Field, is said to have passed one night at this mansion, and, in his anxiety for the issue of his enterprise, to have privately requested the opinion of his host. Davydd cautiously replied that a question of so much moment could not be immediately answered, and that he would give his opinion in the morning. His wife, observing the perplexity in which the question had involved him, expressed her astonishment at his hesitation, and advised him to inform the earl that the issue of the enterprise would be successful and glorious; observing at the same time that, should his prediction be verified, he would receive honours and rewards, and if otherwise, there was little probability of the earl's ever returning to reproach him. During the civil war in the reign of Charles I., the forces under Cromwell, having entered this part of the principality, which they reduced into subjection to the Commonwealth, burned the seat of Mathavarn, in 1644, and committed many ravages in the neighbourhood. The Rev. Isaac Bonsall, the present incumbent, has an extensive and valuable collection of Greek and Roman, and of ancient and modern British and Irish, coins, of gold, silver, brass, and copper, and also a beautiful assortment of minerals. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £542. 10.

LLANWRTHWL (LLAN - WRTHWL), a parish, composed of an Upper and a Lower division, each separately maintaining its own poor, in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Rhaiadr, containing 558 inhabitants, of which number, 261 are in the Upper, and 297 in the Lower, division. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church, is situated at the northern extremity of the county, bordering upon Radnorshire, from which it is separated on the north and north-east by the river Wye, and on the west and north-west by the smaller streams of the Claerwen and Elain, which fall into that river, on the north-eastern confines of the parish. The rivulets Runnant and Dulas are the principal of the smaller streams which intersect the parish, the surface of which is extremely irregular, rising in some parts into lofty hills, alternated with large tracts of level ground, forming extensive commons and bogs: the soil on the higher grounds is rocky, and in the lower generally of a marshy nature; but on the banks of the Wye and Elain are some extensive meadows of luxuriant fertility. The surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified, and in many parts highly picturesque, and the distant views are even magnificent. Copper-ore has been found near the junction of the small river Elain with the Wye, and the Runnant works were established to procure it, but they have not been carried on with any degree of success. This parish constitutes a prebend in the collegiate church of Brecknock, rated in the king's books at £9. 12. 11., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Wrthwl, or Morddal, is an ancient edifice, not distinguished by any remarkable architectural details: it is situated near the Wye, and at no great distance from the influx of the Elain: in the churchyard is a large stone, about six feet in height, of which the upper part appears to have been broken; from its situation, it may probably be the shaft of a cross, though by some it is supposed to be of Druidical origin. On the hills are several cairns, especially on the height called Drygarn, or Derwydd Garn, implying "the Druid's rock or mount," part of which is in the adjoining parish of Llanvihangel-Abergwessin. There are also some cairns on an eminence of less elevation, called Gemrhiw. On Rhôssaith-maen, or "the Seven Stone Common," which is partly in this parish, and partly in that of Llanavan, are some stones very irregularly placed; but whether they are military, sepulchral, or Druidical remains, cannot be precisely determined. Near this common is another, called Rhôs y beddau, or "the common of the graves," the name of which would appear to commemorate some great battle, probably that of Llêchrhŷd. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £296. 1., of which sum, £150. 17. is assessed on the Lower, and £145. 4. on the Upper, division.

LLANWRTYD (LLAN-WRTYD), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N. E. by E.) from Llandovery, comprising the hamlets of Clawddmadoc and Llêchwether, each maintaining its own poor, and containing 627 inhabitants. The river Irvon, which falls into the Wye at Builth, runs through the centre of the parish, which is intersected by no less than four smaller streams, which discharge themselves into that river within its boundaries. These are the Cerdin, Cledan, Cledwial, and Henog, which in their several courses to the Irvon add greatly to the picturesque beauty of the vale that takes its name from that river, and abounds with scenery of pleasing and diversified character, though other parts of the parish are barren and mountainous, especially the portion bordering on Carmarthenshire. The parish is distinguished for the efficacy of a mineral spring, discovered close to the river Irvon by the Rev. Theophilus Evans, vicar of Llangammarch, in 1732, since which time it has been, during the summer season, a place of resort for respectable families. This spring, called Llanwrttyd Wells, and, from the foetid odour of its waters, in Welsh "Fynnon Ddrewllyd," flows over a rich bed of sulphur, with which it is strongly impregnated, partaking also of a chalybeate nature, and containing a small portion of marine salt. The water is a specific remedy in all scorbutic and cutaneous diseases, relaxation of the fibres of the stomach, and in all chronic distempers, and is considered by many skilful chemists, who have analyzed it, to be inferior to none of the kind in Europe. Dôl y coed, about one mile below Dinas, and formerly the seat of the family of Jones, a spacious and pleasantly situated mansion, is always open for the accommodation of families frequenting the wells: the grounds attached to it afford every opportunity of exercise, and the surrounding scenery is greatly admired for its romantic beauty. Considerable additions have been made to this during the last year, and suitable accommodations for a considerable number of visitors have been made, who are boarded on moderate terms. The village, which is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Irvon, derives an air of cheerful activity from the resort of visitors, and has been greatly improved since the efficacy of its mineral water has been established. The manufacture of woollen cloth is carried on through all its processes, from the introduction of the raw material to its completion for the market, in one large factory, which affords employment to a considerable number of the inhabitants. This parish is intersected by the road from Builth to Llandovery. The living is annexed to the vicarage of Llangammarch, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. David, is not distinguished by any architectural features. There are places of worship for Independents and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A parochial free school was founded by Mrs. Margaret Jones, of Great Queen-street, London, a native of this parish, who, in 1783, bequeathed £300 four per cents., now producing £12 per annum, for its endowment: the school is under the superintendence of trustees, of whom the incumbent of the parish for the time being is always one. The same Mrs. Jones bequeathed also the interest of £200 at four per cent., for clothing and feeding the poor, and £50, the interest to be spent in a feast on the 1st of November for the trustees: the two last-named sums are payable on the death of Harriet Rowbotham, who is upwards of sixty years of age. Dinas, an ancient seat of the family of Lloyd, and now in the occupation of a farmer, is situated at a short distance from the church, upon an eminence commanding an extensive and richly varied prospect: immediately on the north, and almost adjoining the house, is a precipitous and beautiful knoll, completely clothed with wood, commanding a fine view of the vale of Irvon, on each side of which the country for two or three miles is richly wooded. The proprietor of Dinas has erected a handsome mansion in the parish of St. David's, Brecknock, to which he has transferred the name of the original seat, and which was completed for his residence in 1826. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £136. 19.

LLANWYDDELAN (LLAN-WYDDELAN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (S. S. W.) from Llanvair, containing 530 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated nearly in the centre of the county, comprises about five thousand acres of arable and pasture land, for the most part in a good state of cultivation: in 1796 an act of parliament was obtained for dividing and enclosing the common and waste lands, the former of which was then done, and the latter has since that period been partially carried into effect. The surface is boldly undulated, and the soil is various: peat, which forms the principal fuel of the inhabitants, is procured in abundance. The manufacture of flannel is carried on to a small extent, affording employment to a portion of the inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £3. 8. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Gwyddelan, is an ancient edifice, appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Rowland Evans bequeathed £15, the interest to be appropriated to the teaching of poor children; Richard Pryce bequeathed £12, and the Rev. Mr. Jones £5, for the support of a charity school; and one of the Welsh circulating charity schools is at present held in the parish. Various small charitable donations and bequests in land and money have been made for the benefit of the poor of this parish. The Roman road from Caer-Sws to Chester is supposed to have passed through the western part of it, entering through the pass of Bwlch Cae Haidd, and proceeding to the vale of Mochnant, where Sir R. Colt Hoare has placed the Mediolanum of Richard's Itinerary. There are also some remains of ancient British fortifications, one called Pen y Gaer, surrounded with an intrenchment, and another on the other side of the Roman road, called Lluest Cerig, or Carneddau: these posts appear to have been chosen as commanding the passes of Bwlch Haidd and Cevn Côch, both of which are within view. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £345. 12.

LLANYBYTHER (LLAN-Y-BYDDAR), a parish in the higher division of the hundred of CATHYNOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (S.W.) from Lampeter, comprising the Northern and Southern divisions, and containing 1062 inhabitants, of which number, 687 are in the Northern, and 375 in the Southern, division. This is an extensive parish, containing nearly ten thousand acres, of which about two thousand are unenclosed, and comprising a great variety of soil and surface, including a large portion of the country between the rivers Teivy and Cothi. There is a ridge of high ground crossing the parish in the centre from east to west, from which numerous streams descend towards the north into the Teivy, and southward into the Cothi: this latter district exhibits many deep glens. A road from Llansawyl to Llandyssul crosses this common, on which several carnau and monumental stones are visible. The village is situated on the banks of the river Teivy, which is here crossed by a bridge, and near the road leading from Lampeter to Carmarthen. Fairs are held on June 21st, July 17th, and November 1st and 21st. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Crown. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, has recently undergone thorough repair, and is now comfortably fitted up for the accommodation of the inhabitants. There is also a chapel at Abergorlech, a village situated on the southern confines of the parish, some miles distant from the village of Llanybyther, and near the junction of the river Gorlech with the Cothi, from which it derives its name: the living is a perpetual curacy, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar. There are two places of worship for Independents, and one each for Baptists and Methodists. Opposite the church, and at the distance of about half a mile from it, in a south-western direction, is an encampment, crowning a conical hill of considerable elevation, supposed to be of Roman construction. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £310. 15.

LLANYCEVN (LLAN-Y-CEVN), a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 13 miles (N. E. by E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 437 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated at the eastern extremity of the county, bordering upon Carmarthenshire, is watered by the Eastern Cleddy, which, after traversing it in a southerly direction, joins the western river of the same name, to form the great haven of Milford: the lands are all enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and enlivened by the winding of the Cleddy and some small tributary streams, which join that river within the limits of the parish. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1000 royal bounty, and with £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £65. 19.

LLANYCHAER (LLANERCH-AUR), a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (S. E.) from Fishguard, containing 176 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated in the northern part of the county, upon the river Gwynn, which falls into the bay of Fishguard. The surface is varied, and in some parts has a very considerable elevation; and of the lands, about one-half only is enclosed. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and from the higher grounds are some fine views over the adjacent country, which presents some pleasing scenery. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 6. 8., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Rev. James Williams James. The church, dedicated to St. David, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £34. 8.

LLANYCHAERON (LLAN - UWCH - AERON), a parish in the upper division of the hundred of MOYTHEN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (N. W.) from Lampeter, containing 233 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying "the church above the Aëron," is derived from its situation upon that river, which falls into Cardigan bay, a few miles west-north-westward, at Aberaëron. Its surface is richly wooded, forming an agreeable contrast to the rugged and barren hills of the surrounding district; and the scenery is finely diversified, combining a pleasing variety of fertility and luxuriance. Llanychaëron House, formerly the residence of the family of Parry, and now the seat of Colonel Lewis, is an elegant modern mansion, delightfully situated in the vale of Aëron, commanding a fine view of that river, and embosomed in well-wooded grounds, skirted by a small park. The entire lands are in a high state of cultivation; the meadows afford rich pasture; the cottages are neatly and substantially built; and the whole parish, enlivened by the windings of the river Aëron, has a pleasing and prepossessing appearance, scarcely known in other parts of the county. The living is a perpetual curacy, with that of Dihewyd consolidated, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1200 parliamentary grant, and in the alternate patronage of the Earl of Lisburne and Colonel Lewis: the improper rectory formerly constituted a prebend in the collegiate church of Llandewy-Brevi, rated in the king's books at £3. 1. 0½. The church, dedicated to St. Non, one of the most distinguished female saints of Wales, and mother of St. David, is a very neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a tower: it is beautifully situated in a very picturesque spot, and was erected at the joint expense of the inhabitants, and of Colonel Lewis, who built a very neat house for the minister, at his own expense, in a pleasant situation within a short distance of Llanychaëron House. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £120. 3.

LLANYCHAIARN (LLAN - LLWCHAIARN), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (S.) from Aberystwith, containing 688 inhabitants. This parish is bounded on the west by the bay of Cardigan, and on the north and east by the river Ystwith; and the road from Aberystwith to Cardigan passes through it from north to south, crossing the Ystwith by a romantic bridge, from which there is a fine view up its vale, with the remains of the ancient fortress of Llanychaiarn castle in the foreground. There are some pleasing residences in the parish, the principal of which is Tan y bwlch, the residence of Matthew Davies, Esq., son of the late General Davies. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of J. P. B. Chichester, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Llwhaiarn, was erected as a chapel to the rectory of Llanbadarn Vawr, of which parish this formed a part, the inhabitants still contributing to the repair of part of the body of that church: it is an ancient structure, delightfully situated on the banks of the river Ystwith, being distinguished within by an air of neatness and comfort: the porch is a good specimen of early English architecture, and there are several interesting monuments. A handsome monument will shortly be erected to the memory of General Davies, who greatly distinguished himself in the peninsular war, particularly on the plains of Salamanca, and whose remains were deposited in a vault in this church. At Blaenplwyv, at the southern extremity of the parish, there is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A school-house has been erected at a place called Chancery, at the expense of the inhabitants, for the instruction of boys and girls, who pay a small quarterage. Llanychaiarn castle, of which there are but few remains, stood on the eastern bank of the Ystwith. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £235. 4.

LLANYCHAN (LLAN-HYCHAN), a parish in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. N. W.) from Ruthin, containing 115 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Hychan, who flourished in the fifth century, is pleasantly situated nearly in the centre of the fertile and picturesque Vale of Clwyd. It is only of inconsiderable extent, but in the beauty of its situation, and the richness and variety of the surrounding scenery, it is not inferior to any spot of the same extent in this part of the principality. The lands are all enclosed and in a high state of cultivation, and the soil is tolerably fertile. The manor of Rhôs, which is within the parish, belongs to the Bishop of Bangor, whose steward holds for it a court leet and baron in the village at Easter. The living is a discharged rectory, within the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court of the Bishop of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £7. 17. 6., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church is a small edifice, not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. The Rev. Maurice Jones, about the year 1725, bequeathed a rent-charge of £6, to be appropriated to the apprenticing of poor children of this parish and that of Cerrig y Druidion, or, in default of such, to be paid to the widow of a clergyman: Mrs. Austin bequeathed £20 in money, and there are likewise some smaller charitable donations and bequests to the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £150. 3.

LLANYCIL (LLAN-Y-CIL), a parish, comprising the market town of Bala, in the hundred of PENLLŶN, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, the church being situated 1 mile (S. W.) from Bala, on the road to Dôl-gelley, and containing, with that town, 2359 inhabitants. The name of this place, signifying "the church in the retreat," is probably derived from its retired situation in a sequestered part of the county, embosomed in hills, and nearly surrounded by mountains. The parish extends in length nearly nine miles from Bala lake, in a north-westerly direction, and is about four miles in breadth, from north-east to south-west. With the exception of that part adjacent to the lake, in which the town of Bala is situated, the surface is generally hilly, and the soil indifferent; but below the town are some fine luxuriant meadows, forming a rich and pleasing vale watered by the river Dee, and its first tributary, the Trewern, the latter issuing from a small pool of that name in the upper part of the parish, and the former having its source immediately above the lake, through which it flows: the Trewern, after pursuing a rapid though devious course through the vale, unites with the river Dee previously to its leaving the parish. The village is beautifully situated on the north-western side of Bala lake, commanding a fine prospect over that extensive sheet of water, and some pleasing and highly picturesque views of the surrounding country, and of the lofty mountains in the distance. The mountains called respectively Arenig Vawr and Arenig Vâch, at the bases of which are pools abounding with excellent trout, are within the limits of this parish: they exhibit some volcanic remains, and indications of lava are discernible in many parts of them. Peat, which constitutes the principal fuel of the inhabitants, is procured in several parts of the parish. The knitting of stockings is carried on to a very considerable extent, affording employment to many of the inhabitants. Fairs are held in the village on June 3rd, September 11th, and October 2nd. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £9. 4. 4½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Beuno, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture: it underwent a thorough repair in 1828, when it was enlarged by the addition of a gallery at the west end: it contains several good monuments, among which are some to the families of Lloyd and Anwyl, formerly rectors of the parish. In the churchyard are eight fine yew trees of venerable growth. There is a chapel of ease in the town of Bala. The Independents and Calvinistic Methodists have each places of worship. Mrs. Margaret Price bequeathed £100, directing the interest to be applied to the clothing of five men and seven women; William Price, in 1774, bequeathed £100 for clothing poor people of both sexes, and £100 for bread to the poor; Elinor Williams, in 1752, gave £40 to be divided annually among eight poor persons; and Edward Meyrick, in 1712, bequeathed a rent-charge of £15 for clothing thirty poor boys of North Wales, and a rent-charge of the same amount, the use of a house, and three acres and a half of land, to a schoolmaster at this place, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £823. 6.

LLANYCRWYS (LLAN Y CRWYS), a parish partly in the upper division of the hundred of CAYO, and partly in the upper division of that of CATHINOG, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (E. S. E.) from Lampeter, containing 374 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated near the river Cothy, and separated from the adjacent parish of Cayo by the small river Twrch, which flows near the church, comprises, in addition to an extensive tract of common, a large portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The surface is varied, and the surrounding scenery is agreeably diversified; the adjacent country is mountainous, and the views from the higher grounds embrace objects rather of striking boldness than of pleasing or picturesque beauty. The soil is favourable to the growth of corn and hay, of both which the lands yield abundant crops; the principal manure is lime, which is brought at considerable expense from a great distance. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of John Bowen, Esq., who is impropiator of the tithes. The church, dedicated to St. David, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The Roman road called Sarn Helen, leading from Loventium to the station at Llanvair ar y brÿn, according to Sir R. Colt Hoare, passed through the parish, to the left of the church, and is discoverable at two places near the small river Twrch. At the upper end of the common is a large stone, about five yards high, fixed upright in the ground, with the inscription "T. Singer;" but whether originally placed there as a guide to shepherds traversing the common, or as a boundary, is not known; the latter is more probable, as it stands precisely on the spot where the parishes of Llanycrwys and Kellan unite, and where the counties of Carmarthen and Cardigan join. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £64.

LLANYMOWDDWY (LAN-Y-MAWDDWY), a parish in the hundred of TALYBONT and MOWDDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 4 miles (N.E.) from Dinasmowddwy, containing 703 inhabitants. This parish comprises an extensive mountainous district on the eastern confines of the county, bordering on Montgomeryshire; and the village is situated in the narrow vale of Mowddwy, near the source of the river Dyvi or Dovey, which rises in a pool, containing no fish but abundance of lizards, at the base of a rock called Craig Llŷn Dyvi, under the mountain of Aran Mowddwy, in this parish. The entire district abounds with picturesque scenery; and from the summit of the Aran are obtained magnificent prospects of numerous other Welsh mountains, with the intervening country. The vale, which is of considerable length, has the appearance of a glen or ravine, and is embosomed in vast hills, the declivities of which are covered with verdure, and afford pasturage to great numbers of young cattle and sheep. The vale is so much contracted as scarcely to leave space for a very narrow meadow in its bottom; and, in one part of it, an opening between the hills by which it is enclosed presents a beautiful vista, through which is seen the rugged and lofty summit of the Aran Mowddwy mountain. In several parts of this narrow vale are interspersed groves of small extent, but of luxuriant appearance, and above them the hills are covered with fine turf to their summits, which are crowned with boggy and peaty lands, affording shelter to multitudes of red grouse, and supplying abundance of fuel to the inhabitants: the soil of the entire parish is gravelly. The peat is brought from its elevated bed with great difficulty down the declivities of the hills, which are too steep for a horse, in sledges drawn by men, who, by means of a rope, contrive to direct and regulate its motion; but the practice is attended with danger from the accumulated velocity which the sledge acquires in its descent. At Pumrhyd, near the village, is a beautiful waterfall. The turnpike road from Dinasmowddwy to Bala and Corwen passes through the village. A few of the inhabitants are employed in procuring limestone, which is found in this parish in great abundance, and is generally of a brown colour, and of poor quality as a manure. Fairs are held on the first Thursday in March and October 18th. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £16. 18. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Tydecho, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, and is appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Sunday schools are supported by subscription, in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. The produce of several small charitable donations and bequests is annually distributed among the poor. Near the source of the river Dovey is a strongly impregnated chalybeate spring. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £233. 3.

LLANYNIS (LLAN-YNYS), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by S.) from Builth, containing 195 inhabitants. This parish, which comprises nearly three thousand acres, is bounded on the north by the river Irton, and separated on the south from the parish of

Maesmynis by a small rivulet called Cniddon, or Knithon. The place derives a considerable degree of interest from its proximity to the scene of Llewelyn's death; and within a few yards only from the church was a bridge over the Irton, near which that last royal assertor of his country's independence was slain, and of which some of the timbers remained in the bank of the river until within the last thirty years. The surface is very uneven, and in some parts mountainous: a long ridge of high land, rising near the eastern extremity of the parish, extends almost its entire length, and terminates in a barren hill on its western confines. The soil, especially on the north side, where the ground is low and sometimes, after heavy rains, partly overflowed by the waters of the Irton, is extremely rich: on the south side it is rather light and barren. The scenery is richly diversified, and the banks of the river Irton, a stream abounding with salmon, trout, and graylings, are finely alternated with luxuriantly fertile meadows, groves of thriving timber, and flourishing plantations. The views from the higher grounds extend over a tract of country characterized by many features of picturesque beauty, and combining many objects of interest. The turnpike road leading from Builth to Llandovery passes within a short distance of the church, on the opposite side of the river. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 0.  $7\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, situated in a fine fertile plain on the south bank of the Irton, was rebuilt in 1806: it is a neat edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel. A tenement, called Tir Twppa, in this parish, was charged by Howel Lewis, of Blaen Dihonwy, in 1674, with the payment of twenty shillings annually to the poor of Llanynis, and also with a like sum to the poor of the adjoining parish of Maesmynis. Thomas Lewis, supposed to have been a brother of Howel Lewis, bequeathed, in 1675, a tenement called Pen-y-rhiw, adjoining Tir Twppa, to the poor of these two parishes, in equal portions: the present annual income arising from this tenement, amounting to £13, is distributed, according to the will of the testator, by the minister and officers of this parish. Near the summit of the high ridge above mentioned, the northern acclivity of which, to the south of the church, is almost precipitous, and covered with wood, are several small artificial terraces or flats, formed probably either for encampment or for ambush, from which are several roads or paths, at nearly equal distances from each other, leading down the slope to the river: the principal of these roads, which are about three hundred yards apart, led directly to the bridge over the Irton, near which Llewelyn ab Gruffydd was slain. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £35. 15.

LLANYNYS (LLAN-YNYS), a parish partly in the hundred of ISALED, but chiefly in that of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N.N.W.) from Ruthin, containing 784 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated on the river Clwyd, and is intersected by the turnpike road leading from Ruthin to Denbigh, extends nearly eight miles in length, and one mile and a half in mean breadth. In addition to the old enclosures, a few hundred acres of waste land were allotted under the provisions of an act obtained in 1803: of the remaining wastes, nearly the whole is mountainous. The soil, though tolerably fertile in that part of the parish which is enclosed, is in the more elevated parts shallow and comparatively unproductive; the surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and the views from the higher grounds, extending over the adjacent country, embrace some interesting features. Plâs Einws, an ancient mansion in the parish, occupies a pleasant situation, and forms an agreeable object in the scenery of the place. Bâchymbyd, a fine seat belonging to Lord Bagot, which an ancestor of his lordship's acquired by marriage with an heiress of the family of Salusbury, is also situated in this parish, and exhibits in that portion of the demesne bordering on the road some beautiful chesnut trees, which have acquired a very large growth. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Cyfeiliog annexed to the latter, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor: the rectory, which is a sinecure, rated in the king's books at £26. 13. 6., is annexed to the bishoprick, in lieu of mortuaries; and the vicarage is rated at £8. 13. 4., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The tithes of the parish are divided between the bishop and the vicar; the former has two-thirds, and the latter one-third, together with the tithes of pigs, geese, &c., exclusively. The church is dedicated to St. Saern, and is situated within a small distance of the river. There are several charitable donations and bequests, amounting in the aggregate to more than £100, and some small portions of land, the produce of which is distributed among the poor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £697. 8.

LLANYRE, or LLANHÎR (LLAN-HÎR), a parish in the hundred of RHAIAADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (N.) from Builth, on the road to Rhaiaadr, containing 674 inhabitants. This parish is situated between the rivers Wye and Ithon, by the former of which it is bounded on the west, and by the latter on the east. It extends five miles in length and about two miles and a half in breadth, and comprises a large tract of arable and pasture land, of which by far the greater portion is enclosed. The surrounding scenery is generally pleasing, the banks of the rivers being in some parts richly ornamented with wood. The living is a vicarage not in charge, consolidated with that of Nantmel, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's. The church, dedicated to All Saints, is an ancient edifice, consisting of a nave and chancel, and is not remarkable for any architectural details. There are places of worship for Baptists and Wesleyan Methodists, at Newbridge, on the border of the parish. Within its limits is a house called Cwm, on the farm attached to which are the remains of a Roman camp, which, however, being included in the adjoining parish of Llanvihangel Helygen, are described under the head of that place. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £283. 12.

LLANYSTYNDWY (LLAN-YSTUM-DWY), a parish in the hundred of EIVIONYDD, Eivionydd division of the county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 6 miles (N.E. by E.) from Pwllheli, containing 1115 inhabitants. This parish, of which the name signifies the church on the windings of the river Dwy, is pleasantly situated on the northern shore of Cardigan bay, and on the turnpike road leading from Pwllheli to Trêmadoc:

it comprises an extensive tract of country, embracing a variety of rural beauty and pleasing scenery. The village, which is small, but has a very pretty appearance, is situated in a fine vale watered by the river Dwy, over which a neat bridge of three arches has been erected near it; and the neighbourhood is enlivened by some handsome seats, which form interesting features in the landscape. Of these, the principal is Plâs Hên, an ancient family mansion, celebrated as having been the residence of Sir Howel y Vwyall, who attended the Black Prince to the field of Poitiers, and is said to have taken the French king prisoner in the battle fought there: this estate is now the property of E. M. Lloyd Mostyn, Esq. Gwŷnvrn and Trevan, also in this parish, are both elegant mansions, and noted for the frequent and sanguinary feuds maintained between their respective lords, towards the close of the fifteenth century. A fair is held on April 17th. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor, rated in the king's books at £11. 8. 1½., and in the patronage of the Bishop of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, and nearly rebuilt in 1819, is a small handsome edifice, very neatly fitted up, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north and south aisles: the north aisle was built by the family of Priestly, under the sanction of a faculty. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic Methodists. A National school was established in 1819, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children; and a school-house was built with funds which had accumulated from the rectory during the period for which it was held by Dr. Hughes, under a dispensation. The building, though small, is very neat and commodious; and there are at present sixty children in the school, which is partly supported by the funds above noticed, and partly by subscription. The Rev. John Jones, in 1690, bequeathed £50 in money, the interest to be annually distributed among ten poor people of this parish not receiving parochial relief; Margaret Wynne bequeathed £50 for the relief of aged women, which benefaction has been lost by the failure of the persons to whom it was lent on interest; and Thomas Prichard, in 1720, bequeathed £10 to the poor. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £377. 7.

LLANYVYDD (LLAN-NEVYDD), a parish in the hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (N.W. by W.) from Denbigh, containing 1130 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Nevydd, one of the daughters of Brychan Brycheiniog, who flourished about the middle of the fifth century. It is pleasantly situated in the north-western part of the county, and near the river Elwy, which, after traversing the parish in a north and east direction for a considerable distance, falls into the river Clwyd. The surface is varied, rising in some parts into lofty eminences; the lands are enclosed and cultivated; and the soil, especially in the lower grounds, is fertile and productive. The surrounding scenery, though in some points pleasingly picturesque, is rather of a bold and striking character; and the views over the adjacent country combine many features of interesting aspect. The inhabitants are principally employed in agriculture; and fairs are held annually on March 18th, May 12th, August 14th, and November 20th. This parish constitutes a prebend annexed to the chancellorship in the cathedral church of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £37.13.4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Nevydd, is not remarkable for any architectural details. Pierce Owen, in 1654, bequeathed a rent-charge of £1; and Maurice ab Sion, in 1717, and Evan Hughes, in 1729, gave rent-charges of £2 each, to the poor of this parish: Ambrose Wynne, in 1671, bequeathed £50 in money; Anne Foulkes, in 1740, Jane Wynne, in 1751, and an unknown benefactor, bequeathed £20 each; which sums, together with some other charitable bequests, were invested in the purchase of a tenement, the rent of which is annually distributed. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £539.10.

LLANYWERN (LLAN-Y-WERN), a parish in the hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (E.) from Brecknock, containing 138 inhabitants. The name of this place, properly Llan y Gwern, signifying "the church of the alder grove," appears to have been derived from the situation of the village in a tract of moist ground, favourable to the growth of those trees, for the number and luxuriance of which the neighbourhood was distinguished. The lands and tithes of the parish, with a manorial right, were by charter of Bernard Newmarch granted to the monks of the priory of St. John at Brecknock, and subsequently confirmed to them by two successive charters of Roger Earl of Hereford. To this circumstance is attributable the name of Monkton, by which it is designated in several ancient deeds; and also the names of some estates within its limits, of which one, called Waun y Mynach, or "Monks' meadow," became the property of David Lloyd, Esq. By a charter of Henry I., granted in 1127 to the abbey of Battle, in the county of Sussex, of which the priory of St. John was a cell, the inhabitants of this place still claim the privilege of exemption from the payment of tolls throughout the kingdom. On the dissolution of the priory, the appropriated estates became vested in the crown, and were sold tithe-free to various individuals, who, voluntarily subscribing to the support of a minister, acquired the right of nomination to the living. The village, which appears to have been formerly of greater extent than at present, is situated within a quarter of a mile to the left of the turnpike road leading from Brecknock, through Llanvihangel Talyllyn, to Talgarth; and the surrounding country, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of features, is characterized by the pleasingly varied scenery which prevails generally in this part of the principality. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £800 royal bounty: the bishop of St. David's presented to it on the two last vacancies, previously to which the advowson was understood to belong to the freeholders within the parish, who contribute £4.10. per annum towards the stipend of the incumbent. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is a small ancient edifice, appropriately accommodated to the use of the parishioners, but possessing no architectural details of importance. Mr. Watkin Pries, in 1731, bequeathed a rent-charge of ten shillings upon a field called Clôs Pen y Glan, on Blaendyvri farm, in this parish, which is annually distributed on Good Friday among the poor. At the north-western extremity of the common called Waun y Geivr, which is now enclosed, are the remains of a small cromlech. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £90.11.

LLANYWERN (LLAN Y WERN), a township in the parish of LLANDEVAILOG TRE'R GRAIG, hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (E.) from Brecknock. The population is included in the return for the parish of Llangorse.

LLAWR-Y-LLAN, a township in the parish of LLANVECHELL, hundred of TAL Y BOLION, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES,  $6\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. by S.) from Amlwch. The population is returned with the parish. A small stream, issuing from a lake in the adjoining parish of Llanvlewyn, flows through this township into the bay of Cemmaes: on the opposite side of the stream is a remarkable cromlech, now prostrate.

LLAY (LLAI), a township in that part of the parish of GRESFORD which is in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. by W.) from Wrexham, containing 539 inhabitants. It is situated near the left bank of the river Alyn, and on the border of Flintshire. Offa's Dyke passes between it and that river.

LLÊCH, a joint township with Llan and Llwyn, in the parish of LLANRHAIDR-IN-KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S.) from Denbigh. The population is included in the return for the parish. Courts leet and baron, with view of frankpledge, are held for the manors of Llêch and Llan, which belong to the Bishop of Bangor, at the village of Llanrhaidr, at which the steward of the bishop presides. The road from Denbigh to Ruthin passes through this township.

LLÊCHCYNVARWYDD (LLÊCH-GYNVARWY), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, the church being 3 miles (S.W.) from Llanerchymedd, containing 442 inhabitants. This parish, which derives its name from the dedication of its church to St. Cynvarwy, an eminent British saint, who flourished towards the close of the seventh century, is situated in the western portion of the island, on the road leading from Llanerchymedd to the old line of road to Holyhead. It extends to the former of these towns, and comprehends a very large tract of land, of which the greater portion is enclosed and cultivated. The surface is boldly undulated, rising in some parts into considerable eminences; and the higher grounds command extensive prospects over the surrounding country. The soil is of a poor argillaceous quality, and produces chiefly oats, with a small proportion of wheat and barley. The living is annexed to the rectory of Llantrisant, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, which is supposed to have been originally founded about the year 630, is a spacious and handsome cruciform structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north and south transepts. Within the limits of this parish the present rector of Llantrisant, in 1826, built a handsome parsonage-house, which, with fifteen acres of land, his private property, he has given to the rectory for ever. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. The poor children of this parish receive gratuitous instruction in the National school at Llanerchymedd. Mrs. Margaret Wynne bequeathed a small portion of land, the produce of which she appropriated to the support of one indigent and aged woman; Mrs. Catherine Roberts bequeathed £50 in money, for the support of two poor housekeepers; and there are likewise some smaller charitable donations for the benefit of the poor. In a field adjoining the church is an upright stone, called Maen Llêchgwenvarwydd, which is more than nine feet high, and appears to be of great antiquity. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £185.5.

LLÊCHRHÛD (LLÊCHRYD), a parish in the lower division of the hundred of TROEDYRAUR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (S.E.) from Cardigan, containing 392 inhabitants. This place is by some historians supposed to have been the scene of a sanguinary engagement which took place between Rhys ab Tewdwr, sovereign of South Wales, and the three sons of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, who, in a previous insurrection, had compelled that sovereign to seek refuge in Ireland. Rhys, returning thence, in 1087, with a powerful army to recover possession of his dominions, landed on the neighbouring coast, and was met at a place called Llêchryd by the sons of Bleddyn, who resolved to give him battle before his army should be increased by the number of his friends who were hastening to join him; and an obstinate and severe battle was here fought, in which the sons of Bleddyn were totally defeated, and two of them slain on the field. A place of this name in Radnorshire has been generally reputed the scene of this engagement, to which opinion Mr. Jones, the historian of Brecknockshire, has afforded some negative sanction by deriving its name from a stone which may have been raised there to the memory of Riryd, one of Bleddyn's sons who fell in the encounter. But there are numerous circumstances which conspire to give the greater degree of probability to the former opinion, among which, the situation of LlêchrhÛd in Cardiganshire, in the direct route of this sovereign's march through his own territories, where he might reasonably expect the assistance of his friends, in his progress towards the seat of his government at Dynevor or Carmarthen, is not the least important. The parish is pleasantly situated on the river Teivy, which is navigable for small vessels to LlêchrhÛd bridge, an ancient structure mantled with ivy, and forming a truly picturesque feature in the scenery of the place. The turnpike road from Cardigan to Newcastle-Emlyn passes through the village, the inhabitants of which derive a considerable profit from the drying of salmon, of which great quantities are taken in the river. An extensive manufactory of tin plates, which was formerly carried on, has for some years been entirely discontinued, and the buildings have been demolished. LlêchrhÛd, though now a parish of itself, was formerly only a chapelry in the adjoining parish of Llangoedmore. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £1200 royal bounty, and in the alternate patronage of Thomas Lloyd and Charles Richard Longcroft, Esqrs. The church, dedicated to the Holy Cross, is an ancient edifice, undistinguished by any interesting details. There are places of worship for Wesleyan Methodists and Presbyterians: the latter is said to have been originally built by Major Wade, an officer under Oliver Cromwell. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £44.19.

LLÊCHVAEN (LLÊCH-VÂN), a hamlet forming the upper division of the parish of LLANHAMLLÊCH, in the hundred of PENCELLE, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E. by S.) from Brecknock. The population is returned with the parish. The present name of this place has a tautological meaning, signifying literally the "stony stone," corrupted from the ancient etymology, meaning the "upright or lofty stone." It is situated on the southern declivity of the Allt Ronwy mountain, and near the left bank of the Brÿnich brook, which falls into the Usk about a mile lower down. A bridge here crosses the Usk, and another the Brecknock canal, which passes nearly contiguous, and just below is conveyed to the right bank of the river by an aqueduct of four arches. The Hay railway, from Brecknock to Kington and Eardisley in Herefordshire, has been carried through this hamlet, a little to the south of the village of Llêchvaen. Here was formerly a chapel of ease to the mother church of Llanhamllêch, which fell down about a century ago, and has not since been rebuilt, owing to the latter being sufficiently capacious, and centrally situated, so as to accommodate the inhabitants of all parts of the parish. The Roman Via Julia Montana anciently traversed this hamlet, in its approach to the Gaer near Brecknock, from the station in the parish of Llanvihangel Cwmdô.

LLÊCHWETHER (LLÊCHWEDDOR), a hamlet in the parish of LLANWRTYD, hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (W. by S.) from Builth, containing 328 inhabitants. It is situated, as the name implies, on the southern declivity of a barren hill, near the left bank of the river Irvon, the vale of which is much admired for its picturesque scenery. There are some mineral springs within its limits, which have acquired considerable celebrity for their anti-scorbutic qualities; and Dôlycoed House has been recently fitted up for the accommodation of the visitors. There is a bequest producing £12 per annum for the instruction of poor children of Llêchwether and Clawdd Madoc. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £64.14.

LLÊCHYLCHED (LLÊCH-YLCHED), a parish in the hundred of LLYVON, county of ANGLESEY, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (S.E. by E.) from Holyhead, containing 405 inhabitants. This parish, which is of very moderate extent, lies in the south-western part of the island; and the church is situated far from any house, in a marshy valley watered by a stream which falls into the bay of Carnarvon. The surrounding scenery is not distinguished by any peculiarity of feature, except that of a dreary and unprepossessing aspect. The road from London to Holyhead passes through the village, of which the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. The living is annexed to the rectory of Llanbeulan, in the archdeaconry of Anglesey, and diocese of Bangor. The church, dedicated to St. Ilched, is a small edifice. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children of this and the adjoining parishes, was established in 1829: it is supported by subscription, and the present number of children is seventy-five. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £176. 7.

LLEDROD ISÂV (LLETHR Y TROED), a township in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL LLEDROD, upper division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 732 inhabitants. The small river Wyrā passes through it, and falls into the sea at Llanrhŷtid. There is a separate assessment for the maintenance of the poor, the average annual expenditure being £117. 16.

LLEDROD UCHÂV (LLETHR Y TROED), a township in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL LLEDROD, upper division of the hundred of ILAR, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (S. E.) from Aberystwith, containing 481 inhabitants. The parochial church stands at the foot of the western declivity of a high and dreary common, and near the source of a small rivulet called the Wyrā. Several tumuli are observable on the adjacent hills; and there is a chalybeate spring, formerly much regarded for its sanatory properties. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £156. 4.

LLEWESOG, a joint township with Trevydd-Bychain, in the parish of LLANRHAIADR-IN-KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. by E.) from Denbigh. The population is included in the return for the parish. Formerly a joint assessment was made for this township and that of Trevydd-Bychain for the support of their poor, but now there is a general assessment for the parish.

LLOWES, a parish in the hundred of PAINSCASTLE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W.) from Hay, containing 372 inhabitants. This parish, which is only of moderate extent, is pleasantly situated on the river Wye, by which it is bounded on the south. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly diversified, and in some parts picturesque; and the higher grounds command some interesting views of the adjacent country, including the windings of the river. The living is a discharged vicarage, with the perpetual curacy of Llanddewi Vāch annexed, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8. 10., and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Brecknock, to whom the tithes of the parish are appropriated. The church, dedicated to St. Meilig, is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, and appears to have undergone extensive alterations and repairs, principally in the later style of English architecture. Mrs. Susannah Howarth, in 1704, bequeathed a small rent-charge, the produce of which is annually distributed in bread among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £161. 1.

LLWYDCOED, a hamlet in the parish of ABERDARE, upper division of the hundred of MISKIN, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. W.) from Merthyr-Tydvil. The population is returned with the parish. It occupies the upper portion of the parish, in which there are numerous coal and iron works, and the inhabitants are principally employed in these and the several iron-foundries in the neighbourhood. Hirwaun common adjoins it on the west, and it is watered both by the Cynon and Dynas streams, the latter of which has its source within its limits. A tram-road, extending from the termination of the Aberdare canal, proceeds through this hamlet, and communicates with the Hirwaun works in Brecknockshire. Close to this line of conveyance are situated the iron-works of Messrs. Thompson, Scales, and Fothergill, which, with those at Abernant, are capable, when fully employed, of manufacturing about eleven thousand tons of iron per week. A large proportion of the workmen engaged at the Hirwaun furnaces dwell in this hamlet, which is now included within the limits of the new borough of Merthyr-Tydvil.

LLWYN, a joint township with Llan and Llêch, in the parish of LLANRHAIADR-IN-KINMERCH, hundred of ISALED, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S.) from Denbigh. The population is included in the return for the parish. Formerly this township was conjointly assessed with those of Llan and Llêch for the support of their poor, but now a general assessment is made for the parish.

LLŶSDINAM (LLŶS-DINAN, or LLŶS-DINAM), a hamlet in the parish of LLANAVAN-VAWR, hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles from Builth, containing 213 inhabitants. This hamlet, the name of which signifies Dinam Palace or Court, was anciently the residence of several of the reguli, descendants of Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog, and appears to have been a place of considerable importance also with respect to its trade. In several of the ancient surveys of the manor of Builth, and in various old presentments, the weavers of "Inam," by which name this place was then designated, are noticed as a corporate body, and appear to have been assessed, and to have paid their chief-rents to the lord, separately from the inhabitants of the other parts of the manor. A tenement in this part of the parish still retains the name of "Pen-llŷs," or the palace summit, and gave to its proprietors the same designation. Here is an elegant villa, the residence of Dr. Venables. Llŷsdinam appears anciently to have constituted a distinct parish, and to have become annexed to Llanavan-Vawr only on the decay of its own church: it still, in civil matters, exercises the privileges of a separate parish, appointing its own officers, maintaining its own poor, and repairing its own highways. Since the dilapidation of its church it has paid a contribution of one-sixth of the assessments towards the repair of that of Llanavan-Vawr, and one-third towards the church of Llanvihangel-Brŷn-Pabuan, to which the inhabitants usually resort: the latter payment was probably a voluntary contribution in its origin, though it has been established by prescription and rendered compulsory. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £102. 3.

LLYSIN, a township in the parish of CARNO, lower division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 10 miles (N. W. by W.) from Newtown. The population is returned with the parish. The waste lands of this place, as well as many others in the contiguous parishes, were enclosed and allotted under an act of parliament, obtained in 1816, commonly called "The Arustley Enclosure Act."

county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, containing 100 inhabitants.

LLÛSVAEN (LLÛS-VAEN), a parish forming a detached portion of the hundred of CREUDDYN, county of CARNARVON, though locally within the county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, on the road from Abergele to Aberconway, 4 miles (W.) from Abergele, containing 585 inhabitants. This parish, which is of small extent and extremely mountainous, is bounded on the north by the Irish sea, and is crossed by the great turnpike road from Chester to Holyhead, close to the shore, which has a fine sandy beach: a considerable quantity of limestone is quarried from the rocks here, and shipped for Liverpool: the village consists of five houses only. The living is a discharged rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £12. 0. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Cynvran, is a spacious edifice, consisting of a nave, chancel, and south aisle. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. Some years ago an elegant gold ring, enamelled and of good workmanship, weighing about an ounce, and bearing the name ALHSTAN, was found upon a mountain near the church, and is now in the possession of Mr. Walker, of Chester: according to Mr. Pegge, it belonged to a military commander of that name in King Egbert's army, which invaded North Wales in 818. Another gold ring, heavier and of rough workmanship, was picked up near the same place; and, in 1826, a great number of silver coins, principally struck in the reigns of Stephen, Henry I., John, Edward I., and Edward III., and in an excellent state of preservation, was found. Upon the apex of this mountain a signal staff telegraph was erected in 1827, which communicates with Voel y Nant, near Llanasaph on the east, and Orme's Head on the west, forming part of the line of intercourse between Holyhead and Chester. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £191. 6.

LLÛSWEN (LLÛS-WEN), a parish in the hundred of TALGARH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (W. S. W.) from Hay, on the road to Builth, containing 202 inhabitants. This parish, of which the name implies a fair palace, was anciently one of the residences of the native princes of South Wales: the road from Hay to Builth passes through it. The village is pleasantly situated on the river Wye, which is not navigable here: the neighbourhood is well wooded, and the surrounding country abounds with rich and with beautifully picturesque scenery. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 14. 7., and in the patronage of Arthur Macnamara, Esq. The church is a small edifice, situated close to the bank of the river Wye: the living has neither parsonage-house nor glebe land attached to it. There is a place of worship for Baptists. Llangoed Castle, the seat of Arthur Macnamara, Esq., is situated within the parish: the mansion was erected in 1632, which date, inscribed on a stone over the ancient doorway, is still remaining. The grounds, which are very extensive, comprehend some of the most beautiful and picturesque scenery in South Wales; and the surrounding eminences, of which some are very lofty, are clothed with stately and valuable timber to their summit. The river Wye, which here separates the counties of Brecknock and Radnor, skirts the de-mesne for nearly two miles and a half, and in its winding course is sometimes hurried with impetuosity over its rocky channel, and at others flows smoothly through its deeper bed, which in some places is more than forty feet in depth: the banks are richly planted with lofty trees, under which is a beautiful walk, extending through the grounds in a direction parallel with its course. The view from the church embraces a variety of beautiful scenery: to the south it extends over a fine tract of country towards the Hay, including the beautiful village of Glâsbury, and the Black Mountains: to the west are seen the luxuriantly wooded hills of Llangoed, ornamented with the finest forest trees, of every variety; and on the opposite bank of the Wye are the hills of Radnorshire, in the parishes of Boughrood and Llanstephan. It is the intention of the present proprietor, at some future period, to erect on a more eligible site a mansion of more stately magnificence than the present edifice, and more in harmony with the incomparable beauties of the scenery, and the natural local advantages of this princely demesne. In the garden of an ornamental cottage near the church, belonging to H. Lawrence, Esq., is a tumulus, opposite to a remarkable horse-shoe bend of the river Wye. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £72. 5.

LLÛSWORNEY, otherwise LLÛS - WERNI (LIS-WORNEY), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 3 miles (W.) from Cowbridge, containing 189 inhabitants. It is pleasantly situated in the fertile vale of Glamorgan, near the turnpike road leading from Cowbridge to Bridgend, and comprises but a small portion of land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, and in the vicinity are some handsome residences. Little Nash, the seat of Mrs. Markham, and Stenbridge, are both extra-parochial: in the former was a private chapel for the accommodation of the family, but divine service has not been performed in it within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. The living of LlÛsworney is a discharged vicarage, annexed to that of Lantwit-Major, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £4. 7. 3½., and endowed with the great tithes of the parish. The church, dedicated to St. Tudvil, is not remarkable for any architectural details. There is a place of worship for Calvinistic Methodists. A Sunday school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by subscription. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £77. 15.

LLÛS-Y-COED, a township in the parish of KILKEN, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, containing 86 inhabitants. Its name implies the court or mansion in the wood, and is supposed to have been descriptive of its ancient appearance.

LLÛS-Y-VRÂN, a parish in the hundred of DUNGLEDY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 9 miles (N. E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 202 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated nearly in the centre of the county, comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, the whole of which, with only a very small exception, is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation: the soil is various, but generally productive. The surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any striking peculiarity of feature, is agreeably diversified; and the views over the adjacent country are interesting and extensive. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 0. 5., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and in the joint patronage of Sir R. B. P. Philipps, Bart., and Col. Scourfield, the former of whom has two turns and the latter one. The church, dedicated to St. Meilyr, who flourished about the middle of the fifth century, is not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £76. 4.

LLYWEL, a parish in the hundred of DEYVNOCK, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, comprising the hamlets of Traian-Glâs, Traian-Mawr, and Is-Clydach, each separately maintaining its own poor, (in one of which is situated the village of Trêcastle, forming a ward of the borough of Brecknock, from which the rest of the parishioners obtain their letters), and containing 1699 inhabitants. The name of this place, originally "Lee Wylt," or "the place of Wyllt," appears to be derived from its having been selected as a station for his army by Idio Wyllt, or the Wild, an Irish nephew of Rhŷs ab Tewdwr, to whom, in gratitude for his services in suppressing the rebellion of his turbulent subjects, that prince granted the lordship of Llywel, comprising all the lands on the east of the river Towy, from Llangadock to Abergwessin. Idio, with a view to strengthen himself against the opposition of the original inhabitants, who submitted to his authority with reluctance, married the daughter of Bleddyn ab Maenarch, Prince of Brycheiniog, and maintained a powerful force upon the heights of Llywel, which were well suited to his purpose, as a station from which he could repel any attacks either from Brecknockshire or Carmarthenshire, and from which he could easily descend at any time into the vales on either side, for the suppression of rebellions, the procuring of supplies, or the enforcement of the payment of taxes. To the occupation of these heights by Idio, and the strong position of his army, may be attributed the preservation of the lordship of Llywel from falling into the hands of Bernard Newmarch, upon his conquest of the other parts of the ancient Brycheiniog. The parish is situated in the western part of the county, on the confines of Carmarthenshire, and skirted by the river Usk. The turnpike road from London to Milford, through Brecknock, passes through the village, which is distant about a mile north-north-eastward from Trêcastle, and is also intersected by a small rivulet called Nant y Gwared; this rivulet here divides into two streams, which, however, shortly reunite. The surface is hilly and in some parts even mountainous; and from the highest elevation in this parish, called Trêcastle Mountain, and situated near its southern confines, descend numerous rivulets, which have worn themselves deep furrows, through which they flow in almost every direction. Of these, such as issue from the north side of the mountains, descend into the river Gwydderig, which, flowing through the narrow vale of Cwm y dwr, circumscribes its base on that side, and, pursuing its course westward, falls into the river Tawe. The streams which descend on the south side of these heights are received by the river Usk, which, flowing through a vale of greater breadth than that of Cwm y dwr, although the level meadow land on each side of the river seldom exceeds a few yards in breadth, continues its course in an easterly direction. The Usk, so distinguished for the picturesque beauty of its banks, has its source in a pool called Llŷn y Van, between the lofty summits of two adjacent mountains, called respectively Ban Brycheiniog and Ban Sir Gaer, the Brecknockshire and the Carmarthenshire Beacon, near the spot where this parish unites with that of Llanthoysaint, in the county of Carmarthen. A range of hills connected with the Eppynt chain rises to the north of Trêcastle, and is intersected from north to south by two valleys, through one of which flows the river Cilieni, which separates this parish from that of Llandeilo'r Van; and through the other the river Clydach, which rises in this parish, and falls into the Usk a little below the bridge on the turnpike road to Trêcastle, and gives name to the hamlet of Is-Clydach, which is situated on its south-eastern banks. The sides of the deep narrow dells, which in several parts furrow the mountains, meet almost abruptly, and, though partly arable, are in some places adorned with underwood: the various bridges in the parish, being generally on the turnpike road, are kept in repair at the expense of the county. The woollen manufacture is carried on here upon a limited scale, affording employment to a small number of the inhabitants: there are three small factories, in each of which the wool is carded, spun, and woven into coarse cloth and blankets.

The living is a vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, anciently called Llantrisant, from its dedication to three saints, viz., St. David, St. Padarn, and St. Teilo, is an ancient structure, consisting of a nave and chancel, with a strong tower at the west end, and is situated on ground of more lofty elevation than perhaps any other church in Brecknockshire, except that of Penderin: the interior displays some vestiges of antiquity in the original roof, and the ancient rood-loft is still remaining. The parish clerk, or sexton, claims and receives mortuaries on the interment of every person, except paupers, and the residents in Trêcastle, who pay fourpence in lieu of them, which claim was recognized by a terrier signed by the vicar and principal inhabitants of the parish, in 1800, and confirmed by the ecclesiastical court: these mortuaries consist of the best hat, wig, cravat, gloves, girdle, breeches, shoes, and stockings of the deceased, if a male; and if a wife, or widow, of the best hood, cap, riband, handkerchief, gloves, and shoes and stockings, for which a composition may be made at the option of the surviving relatives of the deceased. In the hamlet of Isclydach is the endowed chapel of Rhŷd y Briw, the living of which is a perpetual curacy, in the gift of the Vicar. There are three places of worship for Calvinistic Methodists, and one each for Baptists and Independents. Sunday schools are supported by the members of the established church and the several sects of dissenters. John Jeffreys, of London, in 1706, or about that time, bequeathed £5 per annum to the poor of this parish, charged upon the impropriate tithes of Merthyr Cynog, which has since become a rent-charge on a tenement called Cwmllwyvog, and a meadow called Waundŷ, in this parish, and is paid by John Lloyd Vaughan Watkins, Esq., of Pennoyre, near Brecknock, whose ancestor purchased that property. Roger Jeffreys, of Berthdù, in this parish, in 1714, charged certain lands near Rhÿd y Briw with the annual payment of twenty shillings, to be distributed among the poor of the hamlet of Isclydach. The Via Julia Montana, from Caerlleon to Carmarthen, passed through this parish from east to west; but its exact course has not been clearly ascertained, although some vestiges of it were seen near Rhÿd y Briw, about half a century ago. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor of the entire parish is £777. 1.

LOUGHOR (LLYCHWYR), a hamlet in the parish of LLANEDY, hundred of CARNWALLON, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 12 miles (N.N.W.) from Swansea. The population is returned with the parish. The road from Pont ar Dulas to Llandebie passes through this hamlet, and is, for the greater part, carried along the ridge of a hill, which overlooks a valley on each side, the declivities of which are ornamented with thick plantations and enclosures. The Loughor river bounds it on the east, and separates the parish from Glamorganshire.

Seal and Arms.

derives its names from its situation on the river Llychwr, or Loughor, the latter of them signifying "the fortification on the river Llychwr," is supposed by many to have been the Leucarum of Antoninus. This opinion is corroborated not only by the similarity of the names, and the discovery, at various times, of numerous Roman relics, among which may be mentioned a coin of the emperor Trajan, found in the bed of the river, about two hundred yards westward from the town, within the last few years, and now in the possession of Mr. Rees Jones of this place; but also by the direction of the Roman road called the Julia Strata, which from the station Nidus, at Neath, passed westward through this town, and near a place in its vicinity still called Cädley, or "the field of battle," where, at some remote period, a conflict is supposed to have taken place, of which no particulars have been related. Loughor was anciently called Tre Avane, from the great number of beavers abounding in the neighbouring rivers; Avane, or Afane, being the old Welsh, or Celtic, name of the beaver. Few historical events in connexion with it are recorded: the castle is said to have been erected by Henry Beaumont, Earl of Warwick, who, in or about the year 1099, entered the country of Gower, and, having made himself master of considerable territories, built this fortress and the castles of Swansea, Penrice, and Llanrhidian. In 1150, Meredydd and Rhÿs, sons of Gruffydd ab Rhÿs, attacked and laid waste the country of Gower, made themselves masters of the town and castle of "Aberllychwr," the former of which, according to Warrington, they levelled with the ground, after plundering the inhabitants, and the latter they completely dismantled. In the reign of Edward II. the castle was granted by that monarch to Hugh le Despencer, by whom it is supposed to have been rebuilt; but it seems never to have regained its original importance, nor the town to have entirely recovered from the desolation it had previously suffered.

The parish is situated on the western confines of the county, and is bounded on the west by the river Loughor, which separates it from the county of Carmarthen, and here discharges itself into the Bristol channel: across this river is a ferry, at a place where it is fordable for two hours before, and two hours after, low water. The present town, though of very small extent and mostly of rather mean appearance, contains a few genteel residences, of which one, called the Sanctuary, is supposed to have been anciently part of the manor of Millwood, or St. John, near Swansea, and the property of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. The river Loughor flows on the northern side of the town, and the Llyw, which falls into the former a short distance south-south-westward from the church, runs on the southern; and as the tide regularly flows and ebbs in these rivers twice in every twenty-four hours, the air is rendered salubrious, and the situation of the town is consequently deemed remarkably healthy. Some improvements are in contemplation, among which is the erection of a bridge over the Loughor, under an act of parliament recently obtained for that purpose, a measure which, from the increasing importance of Llanelly, would bring the thoroughfare between that place and Swansea through this town, and conduce materially to its prosperity, besides saving four miles in the distance between those places: the act also authorises the construction of a turnpike road from Loughor to Carmarthen; and as the Swansea Road Trust are also empowered to make a road from Swansea to Loughor, it is generally expected that this will, at no distant period, be the mail coach road to Carmarthen. The entire parish, which is divided into two parts, called respectively the parish and the borough, the former containing about two thousand acres, and the latter one thousand, and each separately maintaining its own poor, abounds with mineral wealth. Several veins of excellent coal, of considerable thickness, extend entirely through it, in a direction from east to west, and have been worked to a depth of from twenty to forty fathoms. The Adair collieries, within the limits of the parish, were recently worked under the superintendence of the Llanguennech Coal Company, and produced upon an average three thousand tons of coal per week, affording constant employment to one hundred men; but they have been discontinued. The Broad Oak colliery, within the limits of the borough, is at present in operation, producing from fifty to one hundred tons of coal per diem, and employing about one hundred workmen: it is intended to ship the coal produced at these works at a new shipping-place below the quay. Manufactures of zinc and pyroligneous acid are also carried on in the town: of the former only about one ton per week is manufactured; and the latter manufacture is likewise conducted on a very limited scale. On the western bank of the river, immediately opposite the town, are the Spitty copper works. The river Loughor, which from the ferry to its mouth, a distance of twelve miles, is called the Burry river, and expands to a considerable breadth to the west of the town, is navigable at high tides for vessels of two hundred tons' burden; and the Penclawdd canal, which opens a communication between the coal districts of Swansea, Llangyvelach, and Loughor, joins the Burry river at Aberkiddy, in the parish of Llanrhidian, near the village of Penclawdd. During spring tides there are from eleven to fourteen feet of water in the wharfs here, productive of great advantage to those engaged in the trade of the place, which is principally carried on with Ireland, the coasts of Devon and Cornwall, France, &c. There is no market: fairs for the sale of live stock are annually held on the first Monday in June and October 10th.

The government of the town, which is a borough by prescription, is vested in a portreeve, recorder, twelve aldermen, and an unlimited number of burgesses, assisted by two sergeants at mace, a layer-keeper, an ale-taster, and four constables. The portreeve is annually chosen from among the aldermen at Michaelmas, and, having qualified at the quarter sessions for the county, may act as magistrate within the borough. The sergeants at mace, layer-keeper, ale-taster, and constables, are elected at the court leet of the lord of the manor, and sworn in before the recorder and the portreeve going out of office. Loughor was formerly one of the contributory boroughs which, with Cardiff, returned one member to parliament: the right of voting was in the aldermen and burgesses at large, in number two hundred and twelve, of whom forty-five are resident. By the late act for amending the representation of the people it has been included in the newly-formed district composed of the boroughs of Swansea, Aberavon, Ken- vig, Loughor, and Neath, which is to send a representative to parliament; and the elective franchise is vested in the resident burgesses only, if duly qualified according to the provisions of the act, and in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of at least ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which were not altered by the act, is thirty-one. The freedom of the borough is inherited by all the sons of a freeman, acquired by servitude of seven years' apprenticeship to a resident freeman, by marriage with a freeman's daughter, or by gift, in which latter instance it is conferred by a jury of twenty-four burgesses, chosen indiscriminately from the burgesses at large, of whom the portreeve for the preceding year is always the foreman. The corporation are empowered by prescriptive right, recognized by statutes of the 34th and 35th of Henry VIII., to hold a court of record, every third Monday, for the recovery of debts to any amount: but this privilege does not appear to have been exercised within the last forty years, nor is there evidence of any process to hold to bail having ever issued from this court. A court baron, which may be held monthly, is held twice in the year before the portreeve, recorder, and a jury of six burgesses, for the recovery of debts to any amount within the limits of the borough.

The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. 5., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, and situated within the limits of the borough, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance; it occupies the summit of an eminence commanding an extensive prospect over the surrounding country. At a place called Groft y Capel there was formerly a chapel of ease, which has been for many years suffered to fall into decay. There is a place of worship for Welsh Methodists. A National school has lately been established here by subscription, aided by a grant of £60 from the parent society, in which about fifty children receive gratuitous instruction. Of the ancient castle there are some remains, consisting principally of a large square tower, supposed to have been the keep, and still in a tolerable state of preservation: it occupies the summit of an artificial mount, which is thought to have been originally thrown up by the Romans, and is surrounded by a double intrenchment. The remains of an ancient water course, also supposed to be of Roman construction, by which water for the supply of the garrison was conveyed from the small river Llyw, are plainly discernible to this day. Traces of the Julia Strata may still be seen upon the Carmarthenshire hills on the western side of the river Loughor, pointing directly to this place; and near the entrance to the rectory-house, and now forming a step to the style leading up to it, is a Roman milliary, which is supposed to have been originally erected on that road. In the vicinity of Cädley, and near the boundary of the parish, are two small square encampments of Roman origin, on a common called Mynydd Carn Gôch. The ancient town, which was destroyed by the sons of Gruffydd ab Rhys, is supposed to have occupied an eminence to the south-east of the castle; and the site still retains the name of the Borough: at a short distance to the west, on the marsh, stood the old church, the site of which is still called Story Mihangel. The strata in the coal districts in this parish furnish specimens of fossilized vegetable remains, among which are fern, acorns, leaves of various trees, pine and oak timber, &c., which substances have been found in that state at a depth varying from seventy to eighty feet below the surface. A celebrated performer on the violin, named Hugh, who is said to have composed many of the most popular airs in the Beggars' Opera, was a native of this place. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor of the parish amounts to £100. 14., exclusively of that for the town, which is £55. 11.

LOVESTON, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 5 miles (S. S. W.) from Narberth, containing 180 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the south-eastern part of the county, and intersected by the turnpike road leading from Pembroke to Carmarthen, comprises a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, the whole of which is enclosed and cultivated. The soil is fertile and productive: the substratum of the parish is stone coal of good quality, but it is not at present worked; and only a small quantity of culm is raised, sufficient for the immediate supply of the inhabitants. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 5. 5., endowed with £600 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Earl Cawdor. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £57. 11.

LUDECHURCH, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E.) from Narberth, containing 228 inhabitants. This parish, which is in the south-eastern part of the county, is pleasantly situated about two miles eastward from the road from Narberth to Tenby. Its surface is uneven, and the soil is of various kinds: the lands are but partially enclosed and cultivated. The substratum is limestone of very superior quality, which is worked upon an extensive scale: this stone is susceptible of a beautiful polish, and many slabs raised from these quarries have been manufactured into elegant mantelpieces, and used for other ornamental purposes: it is also burnt for manure, there being no fewer than six kilns for this purpose in constant operation, for the supply of the more northern parts of the county. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £3. 14.  $4\frac{1}{2}$ ., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Elidyr, is a neat and well-built edifice, situated in a bleak part of the parish, on a limestone rock, which has been quarried all round, leaving the sacred fabric many feet above the level of the adjacent ground. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £39. 3.

LYGAN Y LLAN (HELYGEN-LLAN), a township in the parish of HALKIN, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (S. E. by S.) from Holywell. The population is included in the return for the parish. This township, which contains the parish church, derives its name from a saint called Lukan, of whom very little is known, but whose name occurs in the Welsh calendar. Lead mines abound here, in which many of the inhabitants are employed. The late Sir George Wynne is stated to have cleared £300,000 from a single mine of lead-ore, which was discovered under a small tenement in this township.

LYGAN Y WERN (HELYGEN Y WERN), a township in the parish of HALKIN, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (S. E. by S.) from Holywell. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the road between Halkin and Holywell, and abounds with lead mines, in the working of which the inhabitants are chiefly employed.

LYTHAN'S, ST. (ST. LYTHIAN), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W. S. W.) from Cardiff, containing 103 inhabitants. It is situated on elevated ground, overlooking both sides of the Vale of Glamorgan, about a mile south of the turnpike road leading from Cardiff to Cowbridge: the common commands one of the most extensive, luxuriant, and diversified prospects in South Wales. The living is a discharged vicarage, endowed with the great tithes, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £6. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Llandaf. A school for all the poor children of this parish is supported by the Hon. Mrs. Grey, of Dyfryn House, an ancient mansion in the vicinity, formerly belonging to the Price family, the heiress of which conveyed it by marriage to the Greys. The sum of £10 was bequeathed by Mr. Thomas Williams, for the benefit of the poor. There is a cromlech on St. Lythan's common. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £60. 11.

MACHYNLLETH (MACHYNLLAETH), a market town, borough, and parish, comprising the townships of Machynlleth, otherwise Y Dre, Is y Garreg, and Uwch y Garreg, each of which separately maintains its own poor, in the lower division of the hundred of MACHYNLLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, containing 2381 inhabitants, of which number, 1657 are in the township of Machynlleth, or Y Dre, 39 miles (W. by N.) from Montgomery, and 209 (W. N. W.) from London. This place, which is of considerable antiquity, is supposed to have been the site of the Maglona of the Itineraries, a Roman station where, in the reign of the Emperor Honorius, the captain of the "Numerus Solensium" was stationed, under the Dux Britanniarum, to keep the mountaineers in subjection. Connected with the principal station, which occupied the highest part of the hill, was an outwork called Cevn Caer, or "the ridge of the city," about four miles from the present town, in the adjoining parish of Pennal, in the county of Merioneth, of which there were formerly some remains, and at which place several Roman coins have been at various times discovered. From the departure of the Romans till the time of Henry IV., few circumstances of historical importance connected with this place are recorded. In 1402, Owain Glyndwr, flushed with repeated successes, assembled the estates of the principality in this town, where he held a parliament, which solemnly acknowledged his title to the sovereignty of Wales, of which kingdom he caused himself to be formally invested with the crown. At this parliament Davydd Gam, who had married the sister of Owain Glyndwr, but was, notwithstanding, a zealous partisan and adherent of Henry IV., attended, apparently for the purpose of promoting Owain's pretensions to the crown, but with the disguised intention of assassinating that chieftain. In this attempt, however, he was happily frustrated by a timely discovery of his treachery, and, being seized and imprisoned, would have been instantly executed but for the intercession of Owain's most zealous friends and partisans. In resentment for his treachery, Owain burnt his house and laid waste his lands, and detained him in confinement at Machynlleth till the year 1412, when he was finally ransomed by his father and other vassals of the English crown. Charles I., on his route to Chester, had a bed prepared for him in a house in this town, called "the Garrison;" the bed and furniture, which have been carefully preserved, are now deposited at Esgair Llyveran, in the county of Merioneth.

The town is situated near the western extremity of the county, about a quarter of a mile from the southern bank of the river Dovey, and on the turnpike road leading to Aberystwith from the principal parts of North

Wales and also from Shrewsbury. It is romantically embosomed in mountains which encompass it on every side, and from which a beautiful view is obtained of the vale of the Dovey, abounding in highly picturesque and richly diversified scenery, with the winding course of the river, from above the parish of Cemmes to its influx into the bay of Cardigan. The streets are wide and spacious; the houses are in general neat and well built; and the whole town, which is amply supplied with water, has a regular and prepossessing appearance. A book society has been established, which is much patronized; and a news-room has been opened, which is well attended and respectably supported. The environs are pleasant, comprehending much beautiful scenery and many interesting objects. At Uwch y Garreg, a township in the parish, is Pistyll Rhaiadr, one of the finest waterfalls in the principality; though inferior to some in the beauty of the scenery immediately adjoining, it is not surpassed in romantic grandeur by any. The manufacture of flannels, principally of the coarser kind, is carried on to a considerable extent, and some webs are also made in the town and neighbourhood. In this manufacture more than forty carding-engines and seven fulling-mills are employed in the town and its vicinity. The weaving is done by the workmen at their own dwellings, and about two hundred pieces, averaging about one hundred and fifty yards each, are sent to the market at Welshpool, which is held every alternate Thursday. Lead-ore is found in the parish, and mines of that metal have been opened in the township of Is y Garreg; but they are not at present in operation: there are quarries of good slate, of which some are worked upon a moderate scale. The river Dovey is navigable to Derwenlâs, within two miles of the town, and affords a facility of conveying the produce of the quarries and mines to their destination, and of supplying the neighbourhood with various commodities. The average annual exports from this place are five hundred tons of bark, forty thousand feet of oak timber, one hundred and fifty thousand yards of oak poles for collieries, one hundred tons of lead-ore, and one thousand five hundred tons of slate. The average annual imports are, five thousand quarters of rye and wheat, one thousand tons of coal, five hundred tons of culm, two thousand tons of limestone, eleven thousand English and foreign hides, and groceries and other shop goods to the amount of £14,000 in value. The market is on Wednesday; and fairs are held annually on the first Wednesday in March, May 16th, June 26th, July 9th, August 7th, September 18th, October 10th, and November 26th, for cattle, horses, and wares: a statute fair is also held on the Wednesday before Easter. This place was one of the contributory boroughs, which, together with Llanidloes, Welshpool, and Llanvyllin, returned a member for Montgomery: the elective franchise was originally granted in the 27th of Henry VIII., and was exercised without interruption till the year 1728, when, by a vote of the House of Commons, it was disfranchised, and the right of election was restricted to Montgomery alone. But this resolution being at variance with a previous vote of that house in 1680, which confirmed the right of election, the burgesses had, by a statute of the 28th of George III., the privilege of asserting their right to vote for a member for Montgomery before any future committee of the house, and of appealing against any subsequent decision within twelve calendar months. By the late act for amending the representation of the people, this town has again been declared one of the contributory boroughs within the county, which return one member to parliament: the right of election is vested in every male person of full age occupying, either as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, a house or other premises of the annual value of at least ten pounds, provided he be capable of registering as the act demands: the number of tenements of this value within the limits of the borough, which are minutely detailed in the Appendix to this work, is between seventy and eighty. It has also been made one of the polling-places in the election of a knight for the shire. The town-hall, or market-house, a plain and commodious building, was erected in 1783, by Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart., father of the present owner of Wynnstay, who is lord of the manor, and holds courts leet twice in the year. The county court is held alternately here and at Montgomery; and the petty sessions for the hundred are held here occasionally.

The parish comprises an extensive tract of mountainous country, computed at five thousand acres, the greater portion of which is unenclosed and uncultivated, affording only pasturage to numerous flocks of sheep, that feed on the declivities of the hills: the lower grounds are fertile and productive, and peat, which constitutes the principal fuel of the inhabitants, is found in various parts of the parish. The living consists of a rectory and a vicarage, which were united under the provisions of an act of the 29th and 30th of Charles II.; the rectory, which was a sinecure, is rated in the king's books at £11.10.7½., and the vicarage at £6.6.0½.; it is locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, and in the patronage of the Bishop. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a handsome structure, in style resembling that of the later English architecture, rebuilt, with the exception of the tower, in 1827, and containing eight hundred and seventy-three sittings, of which three hundred are free, in consideration of a grant of £300 from the Incorporated Society for the building and enlargement of churches and chapels: the interior is well arranged and neatly fitted up, and the ancient tower has been raised a few feet higher, and crowned with battlements and crocketed angular pinnacles. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. National schools were established here in 1829, by John Jones, Esq., a native of this town, who gave in that year £1000 three per cent. consols. for their endowment, which sum has been augmented by a prior bequest of £200 by John Owen, Esq., for teaching children, and by a legacy of £34 from Mr. Humphrey Morris, for the same purpose. Commodious buildings were erected at the same time by subscription, occupying three sides of a quadrangle, with a projection in the centre. In these schools, which are supported partly by the above endowments and partly by subscription, ninety boys and forty girls at present receive gratuitous instruction. There are Sunday schools also in connexion with the several dissenting congregations, in which about four hundred children are gratuitously taught. Isaac Pughe and Humphrey Morris gave each two small houses to the poor; Lewis Humphrey and Humphrey Morris bequeathed each £20 for apprenticing poor children; and an unknown benefactor gave £10 for the same purpose. Thomas Pugh bequeathed £60, Rowland Owen gave £40, and Gwen Owen and John Davies £20 each, the produce of which several benefactions is annually distributed among the poor. On a hill immediately above Penyrallt House are the remains of an ancient fortification of great strength, within sight of Cevn Caer, and commanding all the passes in this part of the country. Part of the senate house, in which Owain Glyndwr assembled his parliament is still remaining: it was built with the slate stone of the country, and, from the appearance of the spacious entrance, which is still in good preservation, seems to have been an edifice of no mean extent. The old building called "the Garrison" is situated near the Wynnstay Arms, and it is supposed that there was formerly a subterraneous passage leading from this place to the fortification at Cevn Caer, in the adjoining parish of Pennal. Adjacent to the town is a field called the "Garshion," at the extremity of which is a copious spring, from which the town is supplied with water. Dôl Guog, near this town, was for some time the retreat of the celebrated Llywarch Hên, an eminent bard who flourished towards the close of the sixth, and at the commencement of the seventh, centuries: he was chieftain of a part of Cumbria, or Cumberland, but having survived twenty-four of his sons, who fell in fighting the battles of their country against the Saxons, and falling into poverty in his old age, he retired, under the protection of Cynddylan, Prince of part of Powys, to this place, where he devoted himself to the pursuits of poetry. He died at the advanced age of one hundred and five years, and was buried at Llanvawr, near Bala. Many of his compositions while in retirement at this place have been published in the Welsh Archaeologia, and in a separate volume by Dr. Pughe. Howel Swrddwal, a Welsh bard, was minister of this parish about the middle of the fifteenth century; as was also, for many years, Ievan Llawdden, an eminent poet of the Vale of Loughor, who flourished from 1430 to 1470. Dr. Davies, head master of the grammar school at Macclesfield, was a native of this town. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £995, of which sum, £505.10. is assessed on the township of Machynlleth.

MAENAN, a township, forming that part of the parish of EGLWYS-BÂCH which is in the hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.) from Llanrwst, containing, with part of the extra-parochial district of Maenan Abbey, 352 inhabitants. It is situated on the right bank of the river Conway, and forms for the most part an ancient lordship, for which courts leet and baron are still annually held in April, by the steward of Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart.: this lordship comprises the whole township, excepting only the site of the ancient abbey of Maenan, forming the extra-parochial district above mentioned, and claims all the privileges formerly possessed by the abbots, namely, exemption from tithe, &c. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £230. 7.

MAENAN-ABBEY, or MAENAN-MYNACHDÛ, an extra-parochial liberty, partly situated locally in the township of ARDDR, parish of LLANBEDR, and partly in that of MAENAN, parish of EGLWYS-BÂCH, hundred of LLÊCHWEDD-ISÂV, county of CARNARVON, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N.) from Llanrwst. The population is returned with the respective parishes. It is situated on the eastern bank of the river Conway, and derives its extra-parochial privileges from having been anciently the site of the rich abbey of Maenan, said to have been founded by Richard I., but the first authentic notice of which occurs in 1283, when Edward I., by authority of Pope Nicholas, removed the Cistercian monks of Aberconway to this place, at the same time confirming to them all the privileges they had enjoyed in their former habitation, and adding considerably to their possessions. The cause of their removal was, that Edward had selected the site of their original house on which to erect the magnificent castle of Aberconway; and probably being jealous of their communication with his new subjects, their countrymen, he soon after further removed them to the famous abbey of Vale Royal, in Cheshire. The establishment at Maenan, nevertheless, continued to flourish until the period of the dissolution, when its revenue was valued at £179.10.10. In 1563, the site of this abbey, together with the township of Maenan, was granted to Elizeus Wynne, who took down a great part of the buildings, and erected a mansion near the spot with the materials. The original edifice was equally remarkable for the pleasantness of its situation and the beauty of its architecture: a small arch is the only portion of it now standing. The inhabitants repair, for the performance of ecclesiastical rites, to the parish church of Llanddoget, in the county of Denbigh.

MAENOR-DEILO, LOWER, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.E.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 352 inhabitants. It is situated on the western bank of the Towy, the margin of which river is here ornamented on each side with several gentlemen's seats. At Capel bâch there was formerly a chapel of ease, which is now in ruins. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £175. 2.

MAENOR-DEILO, UPPER, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N.E. by N.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 323 inhabitants. The rich and beautiful Vale of Towy is seen to much advantage from many portions of the hamlet, which is ornamented with various pleasing residences of families of independent fortune. It is separately assessed for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £127. 13.

MAENOR-DEILO-VABON, a hamlet in that part of the parish of LLANDILO-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E.N.E.) from Llandilo-Vawr, containing 402 inhabitants. This place lies on the road from Llangadock to Llandilo-Vawr, which here runs along the eastern bank of the Towy. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure amounting to £105. 3.

MAENTWROG (MAEN-TWROG), a parish in the hundred of ARDUDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES, 18 miles (N. N. W.) from Dôlgelley, containing 745 inhabitants. This parish derives its name from a large upright stone still remaining at one angle of the church, which is called "Maen Twrog," and was erected to the memory of Twrog, an eminent British saint, who flourished at the close of the fifth and beginning of the sixth centuries, and to whom the church is dedicated. The village is situated in the north-western part of the county, and in the most romantic portion of the fertile and highly picturesque vale of Festiniog, on the southern bank of the river Dwyrdd, which falls into Traeth Bâch in the bay of Cardigan, and on the turnpike road leading from Dôlgelley to Carnarvon. The surrounding scenery is richly diversified with verdant meadows and luxuriant groves, beautifully contrasting with the barren and precipitous mountains by which this portion of the vale is enclosed. About a mile from the village are two fine waterfalls, one called Rhaiadr Dû, or "the black fall," and the other Llŷn y Gwynryn, both formed by the small river Velen Rhydr. The latter, which consists of six different falls, each about thirty feet in extent, is beautifully picturesque, and, as seen from the base of the rocks over which the river descends, has a sublime and romantic grandeur of effect. The manufacture of flannel and the knitting of stockings are carried on here to a moderate extent, affording employment to a portion of the inhabitants. The river Dwyrdd is navigable to the village, in which it is in contemplation to establish two fairs, one to be held annually on the 13th of April, and the other in May on a day not yet fixed.

The living is a discharged rectory, consolidated with the rectory of Festiniog, in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and diocese of Bangor. The church, rebuilt in 1814, on the site of the ancient structure, is a neat stone edifice with a square embattled tower. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A National school for children of both sexes was established at Festiniog, in 1830, in which children of both parishes receive gratuitous instruction. There are Sunday schools in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Mrs. Jones, in 1742, bequeathed £30; and Evan Lloyd, in 1691, bequeathed £20 and a rent-charge of £1, the interest of which sums, and the rent-charge, are annually distributed among the poor. The Roman road leading from Uriconium to Segontium; another from Tommen y Môr, in this parish, where the Kings of England employed in the conquest of Wales frequently encamped, to Caer Gai; and another to Sarn Helen, passed through this place. Several Roman antiquities have been found in the parish, consisting of coins, urns, and inscribed stones, of which last some are in the possession of W. Gruffydd Oakley, Esq., of Tan y Bwlch Hall, and of John Lloyd, Esq., of Pen y Glanau, who has also an extensive collection of antiquities found in different parts of the principality. Among the inscriptions in the possession of Mr. Oakley are, a bordered stone, ornamented at the extremities, and divided longitudinally into two compartments, in the upper of which are the characters >AND, and in the lower PXXXIX.; another stone, fourteen inches in length and nine inches broad, with the inscription >IVLIMANS; and a third, fifteen inches long and seven inches broad, bearing the inscription IMAV.XXXIX. The Rev. Edmund Prys, Archdeacon of Merioneth, one of the most eminent poets of his time, was rector of this parish for many years. He translated the metrical version of the Psalms of David used in the Welsh churches, one of which he is said to have versified every time he had service in this church, in which the whole were sung previously to their being published; and he also assisted Bishop Morgan in his translation of the Welsh Bible. He was born at Gerdi Bluog, in the parish of Llandecwyn, in 1544, and was interred under the communion table of this church. The poor are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £203.

MAESCAR, a hamlet in the parish and hundred of DEVYNOK, county of BRECKNOCK, NORTH WALES, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Brecknock, containing 712 inhabitants. It forms the north-eastern portion of the parish, and is bounded on the north by the river Usk, into which the Camlais brook here flows, and over which there is a bridge. The inhabitants of a portion of the hamlet resort to the parish church, while those of the upper part of Cwm Camlais frequent the chapel of Llanilltyd. A free school is endowed with £13. 6. 8.; and there are five almshouses, having an endowment of £40 per annum. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £335. 4.

MAESGWARTHA (MAES GWARTHAV), a hamlet in the parish of LLANELLY, hundred of CRICKHOWEL, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 5½ miles (W. by N.) from Abergavenny. The population is included in the return for the parish. This hamlet comprises the upper portion of the parish, and contains several limestone quarries and limekilns, the produce being sent to various surrounding districts, by means of the Brecknock canal, which passes through it. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor, the average annual expenditure being £175. 7.

MAESGWYN (MAES-GWYN), a township in the parish of NANTMEL, hundred of RHAIADR, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from Rhaiadr, containing 340 inhabitants. It forms the south-eastern portion of the parish, and was formerly called Uwch Coed. At the base of the barren eminence termed Rhiw graidd, on the north-western side, is a fine sheet of water, about a mile in circumference, called Llŷn Gwyn. Near this, and close to the left bank of the Dulais river, is Llwynbaried House, now the property of — Evans, Esq.

MAESMAENCYMRO (MAES-MAEN-CYMRO), a joint township with Brŷn-Caredig, in that part of the parish of LLANYNYS which is in the hundred of RUTHIN, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 3 miles (N. W.) from Ruthin. The population is included in the return for the parish.

MAESMAWR (MAESMOR), a joint township with Ceulan, in the parish of LLANVIHANGEL GENEU'R GLYN, upper division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. E.) from Aberystwith. The population is included in the return for Ceulan, with which it is also assessed for the maintenance of the poor: it consists of a mountainous district near the head of the river Maesmor.

MAESMYNIS (MAES-MYNYS), a parish in the hundred of BUILTH, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES,

2 miles (S. W.) from Builth, containing 265 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the northern part of the county, between the rivers Irvon and Dihonw, by the latter of which it is separated from the parish of Llanddewi'r Cwm: it is separated from the parish of Llanynis by a rivulet called the Cniddon, which flows into the Irvon, and is intersected by the turnpike roads from Builth to Brecknock and Llandovery, which unite within a mile of the church. The surface is extremely uneven, rising into hills of considerable elevation, alternated with deep and narrow valleys, of which one called Cwmbwch, from the river Bwch, by which it is intersected, and another of greater extent, through which the river Dihonw takes its course, are finely ornamented with flourishing plantations, and in other parts almost covered with underwood. Near the rivulet Cniddon is an extensive wood, called Gilvâch Dedwydd, on the southern side of which the parish church forms an interesting feature in the highly picturesque scenery which distinguishes this part of the parish. The manufacture of wool is carried on in the lower part of the parish towards Builth, but the number of persons employed in it is very small. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 1. 3., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. David, and situated on an eminence, is an ancient structure, with the remains only of a tower, which appears to have been in ruins for ages: within the walls, which are not more than seven or eight feet above the ground, an old ash tree had obtained a considerable growth, from the roots of which three young trees are now growing. The interior of the church consists of a nave and chancel, which have recently been ceiled: the ancient roof of the chancel was of oak panelled in compartments, each of which was ornamented with the device of two lions seiant, and beneath them the legend "Nor is this," in old characters; but these panels have been removed, and are now in the possession of the Rev. Charles Price, curate of the parish: near the entrance is an ancient font rudely sculptured. Situated about two hundred yards from the churchyard is the rectory-house, a commodious edifice, built by the late rector, the Rev. Thomas Bowen, on the site of a former house built in 1694. There is a place of worship for Independents. A tenement called Tŷr Twppa, in the adjoining parish of Llanynis, is charged with the annual payment of twenty shillings to the poor of this parish; and the rental of a tenement in the same parish, called Pen-y-rhiw, and now producing £13 per annum, is divided in equal portions among the poor of both parishes. The shaft of an ancient stone cross, beautifully sculptured, has been inserted in the wall of a farm-house, called Neuadd Siarmon: it is said to have been removed from Porth y Crwys, in the parish of Llanynis. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £109. 9.

MAESTREGOMER (MAES - TRE - GOMER), a township in the parish of TRÊVEGLWYS, upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

MAES - TROYDDYN, a hamlet in the parish of CAYO, higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (W. N. W.) from Llandovery. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated on the right bank of the Twrch, near its junction with the river Cothy: there are some well-wooded eminences within its limits.

MAES Y FYNNON (MAES Y FFYNNON), a hamlet in the parish of LLANTHOYSAINT, lower division of the hundred of PERVETH, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $5\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E.) from Llandovery. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated at the foot of the Black Mountains, and contains some well-wooded dingles. There are several carneddau on the eminences in this district, more especially at Tŷ Uchâv, where there are two circular ones, and contiguous is a large upright stone. This hamlet is assessed for the support of its poor in conjunction with that of Blaen-Sawdde: the average annual expenditure is £98. 15.

MAES Y GROES, a township in the parish of KILKEN, Northop division of the hundred of COLESHILL, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, containing 236 inhabitants.

MALLAEN, a hamlet partly in the parish of CAYO, and partly in that of KILYCWM, higher division of the hundred of CAYO, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. W. by N.) from LLANDOVERY. The population is included in the return for the respective parishes. It forms a part of the lofty and barren mountain called Mynydd Mallaen, on the border of Cardiganshire, on the southern ridge of which are two circular carneddau.

MALLWYD (MAEN-LLWYD), a parish partly in the hundred of MACHYNLETH, county of MONTGOMERY, but principally in the hundred of TALYBONT and MOWDDWY, county of MERIONETH, NORTH WALES,  $11\frac{1}{2}$  miles (N. E.) from Machynlleth, containing 1137 inhabitants. The name, implying the dark stone, is supposed to have been derived from an ancient monument formerly existing here, the history of which is unknown, and there are now no vestiges of it. The parish, which is very extensive, is pleasantly situated on the river Dovey, and comprises a very considerable portion of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation, together with a large extent of unenclosed and uncultivated country, in which peat, which forms the principal fuel of the inhabitants, is obtained. The village is delightfully situated in a small but fertile valley, watered by the Dovey, and abounding with finely diversified and highly picturesque scenery, formed by the various indentations of the three lofty mountains of Aran, Camlan, and Moeldyvi, which surround it like an amphitheatre. The views in every direction are interesting, and embrace many objects of varied beauty and features of romantic character, among which are some pleasing waterfalls in various parts of the parish, which, especially after floods, are seen to great advantage: of these, the principal are at Pennantigi, in the township of Cerist; at Maes Glasau, in the township of that name; at Pont Vallwyd in that of Camlan, and another near Dinasmowddwy. That at Pont Vallwyd is close to the village, and is formed by the river Dovey rushing through a narrow and rocky channel against a high slate rock in the centre of its bed, whence its waters are precipitated into a pool beneath : on one side of it the Camlan mountain rises in rude majesty, opposite to which issues a stream which is crossed above by a lofty ivy-mantled bridge of one arch, the sides of the glen being covered with underwood, and the waters of the Dovey at the same time reflecting in a variety of shades the conical head of the Aran and its dependent elevations to the north : between the opening in the mountains a distant view of the vale of the Dovey is also obtained, which adds considerably to the picturesque beauty of the scene by its light and contrasted hues. The manufacture of flannel is carried on upon a moderate scale, affording employment to a portion of the inhabitants, of whom also a few are employed in the slate quarries within the parish. The turnpike road from Welshpool to Machynlleth and Dôlgeley passes through the village. The living is a rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £10.15.5., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church is dedicated to St. Tydecho, who lived at the close of the fifth and beginning of the sixth centuries, and of whom tradition has recorded many marvellous exploits : it is situated on a spot where two counties meet ; the eastern end is in the county of Merioneth, and the western in that of Montgomery : the building is in the early style of English architecture, and is remarkable for the situation of the altar, which is in the centre, opposite to the reading-desk, to which situation it was removed from the east end by Dr. Davies, at that time incumbent, in defiance of the injunction of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury. In the churchyard are three remarkably fine yew trees, one of which measures twenty-eight feet three inches in girth, and from one stem throws out a great number of scions, which spread around it an extensive shade, and together present an appearance of sombre magnificence. There are places of worship for Independents and Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. Sunday schools are supported by subscription, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children in connexion with the established church and the several dissenting congregations. Dr. John Davies, in 1643, bequeathed a portion of land ; Edward Wynne and Griffith Lewis gave each £20 ; Robert Vaughan and an unknown benefactor, £10 each ; and William and John Parry, £5 each, the produce of all which, together with some smaller charitable donations and bequests, is annually distributed among the poor of the parish. At Cae Gwyn is a well, the water of which is in high estimation for its efficacy in the cure of diseases of the eye. Dr. Davies, author of a Welsh grammar and dictionary, was for many years rector of this parish, to which he was a great benefactor : he built the rectory-house and three bridges in the parish, at his own expense, and devoted much of his time to literary pursuits ; he translated into Welsh the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England, and assisted Bishop Parry in his translation of the bible into Welsh, published in one volume folio, in 1620 ; he died and was interred here, in 1644. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £584.

MANAVON, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of NEWTOWN, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES,  $8\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Welshpool, containing 775 inhabitants. This parish is situated in a mountainous district nearly in the centre of the county, and is intersected by the river Rhiw, and also by the road leading from Llanvair to Newtown and Montgomery : it comprises an extensive tract of land, of which a considerable portion is uncultivated, and of the remainder, one-half consists of old enclosures, and the other has been enclosed and brought into a state of cultivation under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained in 1796. The surrounding scenery is strikingly diversified ; and from the higher grounds are obtained extensive and pleasingly varied prospects. The manufacture of flannel is carried on to a limited extent. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £8.18.4., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Michael, is an ancient structure, in the early style of English architecture, appropriately fitted up for the performance of divine service : in the churchyard are two fine yew trees of luxuriant growth. In the township of Dôlgynvellyn was formerly a chapel of ease, which has been in ruins for many years. There is a place of worship for Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. A parochial school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children is supported by subscription. George Baxter, in 1658 ; John Thomas, at a period unknown ; Evan Thomas, in 1689 ; and Judith James, in 1718, gave each a certain portion of land to the poor : Rowland Evans, in 1735, bequeathed a portion of land for teaching poor children ; and William Foulkes, in 1781, bequeathed £30 in money, the interest of which was to be divided among twelve decayed housekeepers. The Rev. Walter Davies, distinguished as a philologist and antiquary, has been for many years rector of this parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £392. 3.

MANCOTT, a township in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a mile (N.) from Hawarden, containing 344 inhabitants.

MANERDIVY (MAENOR-DEIVI), a parish in the hundred of KILGERAN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (W.N.W.) from Newcastle-Emlyn, containing 850 inhabitants. This parish is pleasantly situated on the river Teivy, at the north-eastern extremity of the county, bordering upon Cardiganshire, and is intersected by the turnpike road leading from Newcastle-Emlyn to Cardigan. It comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation : the surface is finely undulated, and the surrounding scenery, which is enriched with thriving plantations, and enlivened by the course of the river, is generally pleasing and in many parts picturesque. The vicinity is ornamented with several gentlemen's seats ; and the adjoining country, which is richly wooded, affords some fine views of the vales of Teivy and Cych, abounding with features of romantic beauty. Pentre, formerly the seat of the ancient family of Saunders, and now, by marriage of the heiress of that family with the father of the present proprietor, the property of D. Saunders Davies, Esq., is a handsome and substantial modern edifice, erected on the site of the old mansion, and embosomed in flourishing plantations : the grounds, notwithstanding that they retain to a considerable degree the ancient style, are finely laid out, and, from their elevated situation command some interesting and extensive views, embracing part of the beautiful Vale of Teivy, the town of Cardigan, and the Irish sea in the distance. Fynonau, anciently the property of the Morgans of Blaenbylan, who sold it to Captain Stephen Colby, R. N., uncle of the present proprietor, John Colby, Esq., is an elegant modern mansion, erected from a design by Mr. Nash, and beautifully situated in groves and plantations: the grounds comprehend some rural and romantic scenery, and command some beautiful and extensive prospects. Clynview, the seat of T. Lewis, Esq., is also a handsome residence pleasantly situated, and embellished with scenery of interesting character. Some tin-works were formerly established here, from which a canal communicated with the Teivy below Llêchrhŷd bridge, to which place that river is navigable for small craft. The living is a rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £9, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. David, is a small neat edifice, situated near the river, but not remarkable for any architectural features. There was formerly a chapel of ease at Cilvawr, in this parish; but it has been in ruins for many years. The tithes of this part of the parish belong to W. O. Brigstocke, Esq., of Blaenpant. Dr. Erasmus Saunders, rector of Morton in the Marsh, author of "Short Illustrations of the Bible," and an excellent tract on the duties of families, was born at Pentre, in this parish. The average annual expenditure for the relief of the poor is £231. 16.

MANEROWEN, otherwise MANERAWEN (MAENOR-OWAIN), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 2 miles (W. S. W.) from Fishguard, containing 220 inhabitants. This parish, which is but of very limited extent, is situated in the northern part of the county, and is intersected by the road leading from Fishguard to St. David's, and watered by a small rivulet which runs into Fishguard bay. The lands, with the exception of a small common, are in a good state of cultivation; and the soil, which is peculiarly favourable to the growth of barley, is in general fertile and productive. The surface is varied; and the surrounding scenery, though not distinguished by any striking features, is of a pleasing character. The ancient seat and residence of John Lewis, Esq., a magistrate of the county in the reign of James II., and equally distinguished for his learning and impartial administration of the law, is now deserted and in ruins: the estate is the property of his descendant, Richard Bowen, Esq., who has erected a handsome mansion a little higher up the hill, which forms an interesting object in the scenery of the place. Slate of very good quality has been found in the parish, but the working of it has been discontinued: a small carding-mill, which is still in operation, affords employment to a few of the inhabitants. The living is a vicarage not in charge, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £200 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Minor Chapter of St. David's. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is not remarkable for any architectural details of importance. The above-mentioned John Lewis, Esq., was the intimate friend of Bishop Gibson, whom he materially assisted in editing "Camden's Britannia," more especially in those parts of it which related to the principality, of which he was a native, and in the history and antiquities of which he was profoundly skilled. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £89. 8.

MANLLEDD (MANLEOEDD), a township in the parish of LLANIDLOES, upper division of the hundred of LLANIDLOES, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES. The population is included in the return for the parish.

MANOR, a joint township with Rake, in the parish of HAWARDEN, hundred of MOLD, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 2 miles (E.) from Hawarden, containing, with Rake, 83 inhabitants.

MANORBEER (MAENOR-BÛR), a parish in the hundred of CASTLEMARTIN, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles (W. S. W.) from Tenby, containing 582 inhabitants. The name of this place is of very doubtful etymology: Giraldus Cambrensis, who was born here, calls it, in his Itinerary, Maenor Pyrr, which he interprets "the mansion of Pyrrus," who, he says, also possessed the island of Caldey. According to Sir Richard Colt Hoare, the name literally signifies "the manor of the lords," and appears to be derived from its occupation by the lords of Dyved, who were also proprietors of the neighbouring island of Caldey. By whom the castle was originally built has not been ascertained with any degree of accuracy: it probably owed its foundation to William de Barri, one of the Norman lords that accompanied Arnulph de Montgomery into Britain, and who married the granddaughter of Rhŷs ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales. The castle and manor remained in the possession of that family till the 1st of Henry IV., when they were granted to John de Windsor, but afterwards reverting to the crown, they were, in consideration of a large sum of money, granted by letters patent to Thomas ab Owain of Trellyn, from whose family they passed by marriage into that of Philipps, the present proprietor. Giraldus, in his notices of this place, quaintly says, "Demetia is the most beautiful, as well as the most powerful, district in Wales; Pembroke, that is the present hundred of Castlemartin, the finest province in Demetia, and the place I have described (Maenorbeer) the most delightful part of Pembroke." The parish is situated on the small bay to which it gives name, in the Bristol channel, and within two miles to the south of the turnpike road leading from Tenby to Pembroke: it contains a moderate portion of good arable and pasture land in good cultivation, and a small tract of hilly and barren waste; and, with the exception of such as are employed in the limestone quarries, which are worked only to a small extent, the population is wholly engaged in agriculture. The stone obtained from these quarries is shipped in small vessels, and sent into Cardiganshire: at Lydstep haven vessels of one hundred and thirty tons' burden can ride in security. Some indications of coal have been observed on the estate of John Adams, Esq.; but the attempts to work it have not been attended with success. The sands on this part of the coast are fine, especially at Lydstep haven, where they are well adapted for sea-bathing; and the beauty of its situation, and its convenient distance from Tenby, render this a favourite excursion from that watering-place. Within the limits of the parish are two small villages, called Jamestown and Manorbeer Newton. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £8, endowed with £600 royal bounty, and £1400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Master and Fellows of Christ's College, Cambridge, who are proprietors of the great tithes, which are now let on lease to John Adams, Esq., of Lydstep House. The church, dedicated to St. James, is an ancient and spacious structure, in the early style of English architecture, with a lofty square embattled tower, and is in a rather dilapidated condition. Close to it, on the south side, is a large ancient edifice, which was in all probability connected with it, but its history is unknown: it may probably have been a chantry or grange, or even some distinct religious house. There are places of worship for Calvinistic and Primitive Methodists. Manorbeer castle, distinguished as the birthplace and for some time the residence of the celebrated Giraldus de Barri, better known as Giraldus Cambrensis, is still an object of interest and attraction. The remains occupy an elevated site above the small bay of Manorbeer, of which the castle had full command: they consist principally of portions of the state apartments, the windows of which faced a spacious court, the whole being enclosed with lofty embattled walls, of which the platforms are in some places still entire; the grand entrance, through a gateway flanked with two bastions, of which that on the north side has fallen down; two portcullises, and the moat, which may be distinctly traced. On Old-castle Point, to the east of Manorbeer bay, are the remains of an ancient encampment of small dimensions, probably of Danish origin. Silvester Giraldus de Barri, commonly called Giraldus Cambrensis, was born about the year 1146, and was educated under his uncle, then bishop of St. David's, who sent him to France for the completion of his studies. On his return to England he embraced holy orders, and rose rapidly to distinction in the church: he held successively the offices of legate in Wales to the archbishop of Canterbury, and Archdeacon of St. David's, of which see he was afterwards elected Bishop; but the king, fearing to raise to that dignity a man of such talent and influence in the principality, and one so nearly allied to the native princes, his mother having been granddaughter of Rhys ab Tewdwr, Prince of South Wales, refused to confirm his election. He attended Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, on his mission to preach the crusades throughout Wales, and, during the absence of Richard I. in the Holy Land, was one of the members of the regency. Being again denied the bishoprick of St. David's, to which he had been a second time elected, and in the hope of which he had successively refused divers other sees, and the archbishoprick of Cashel, in Ireland, he retired from public office to the principality, where he spent the last seventeen years of his life, which he devoted entirely to literary pursuits: he died at St. David's, at the age of seventy-four, and was interred in the cathedral church of that place, where his monument still remains. His writings are numerous, and many of them are still extant; his Itinerary, by which he is best known, has been lately reprinted in quarto by

Sir Richard Colt Hoare, Bart., with an elegant English version, accompanied with notes and a catalogue of his writings, with a reference to the several works in which they are preserved. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £271. 19.

MARHALED, a township forming that part of the parish of LLANGERNIEW which is in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 12 miles (W.) from Denbigh. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is situated on the left bank of the river Elwy, in a very mountainous district. Hâvodunnos, an old mansion in the Elizabethan style, is said to have been anciently a religious establishment; and Pennant is another good antique family structure, still remaining here.

MARCHWIEL (MARCHWIAIL), a parish in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. E.) from Wrexham, containing 499 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the eastern part of the county, and is intersected by the road from Wrexham, which here branches off to Whitchurch and Ellesmere, is only of moderate extent: the lands are generally enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. Marchwiel Hall, for many years the property and residence of the younger branch of the family of Broughton of Broughton, and now a farmhouse, has some fine traces of the Elizabethan style of architecture, and many of the ancient carvings are remaining: it forms an interesting feature in the scenery of the immediate neighbourhood. The living is a rectory, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £12. 16. 8., and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. Asaph. The church, dedicated to St. Marcellus, was rebuilt in 1789, and enlarged and repaired in 1829: the expense of its enlargement was defrayed with the accumulated rent of a messuage called Tyddyn Daniel, which was purchased in 1626 from the crown, for the exclusive purpose of appropriating its rental to repairing the church. The present structure is a neat building, in the Grecian style of architecture. A National school, in which fifty-three children are gratuitously instructed, and which is open to all children of the parish, was erected in 1826, and is maintained solely at the expense of the present rector. James Edwards, in 1628, gave in trust to the churchwardens and their successors three pieces of land, comprising together twelve acres and two roods, the rental of which he directed to be annually distributed among the industrious poor not receiving parochial relief. Lady Jeffreys, in 1730, bequeathed £20, and an unknown benefactor £25, the interest of which sums is annually distributed among the poor not receiving parochial relief; the interest also of a sum of money contributed by the parishioners, at different times, is applied in aid of the poor's rate. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £251. 16.

MARCROSS (MARK-CROSS, or MARY-CROSS), a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (S. W. by W.) from Cowbridge, containing 93 inhabitants. The name is said to be a corruption of Mâr croes, "the cross on the sea-shore," the parish being situated on the coast of the Bristol channel. Marcross was formerly a place of considerable importance, having been distinguished by a castle, now demolished, and a monastery, said to have been subordinate to that of Lantwit-Major, and probably destroyed about the same time in the ravages of the Danes and Saxons on this coast. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £9. 10. 10., and in the patronage of the Archdeacon and Chapter of Llandaf. The church is dedicated to the Holy Trinity. Near the village are the remains of a cromlech, which tradition reports to have been an old church; it is not improbable that it was devoted to some religious purpose by the Druids. Here is a mineral spring, the water of which is stated to have been successfully applied, in a great variety of instances, to the cure of the king's evil. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £35. 14.

MARGAM, a parish in the hundred of NEWCASTLE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, bounded on the south by the Bristol channel, and situated on the line of the great western road through the county, 9 miles (S. S. E.) from Neath, containing 2902 inhabitants. The early history of this place is involved in great obscurity: it was, at a very remote period, erected into a bishoprick, which continued for five successions, and then merged in that of Llandaf. Some writers ascribe this to Morgan, or Morcant, son of the renowned King Arthur, who is said to have occasionally resided here; but the circumstance is doubtful. Its original name was Pen-ddr, "The Oak Summit," so called from a noble wood of oak that covers the breast of a mountain, upwards of eight hundred feet in height, forming a striking feature in the landscape, and deservedly admired for its boldness and grandeur, as well as for the beauty and variety of its outline. The present appellation is comparatively modern, being considered a corruption of Morgan, who was the son of Caradoc ab Iestyn, and a great benefactor to the celebrated abbey of Margam, if not its founder. Mr. Humphrey Llwyd, who is followed by several respectable Welsh antiquaries, is of the latter opinion, and states that he had seen "Morgan ap Caradoc's original charter, with nine witnesses, all very antique British names." Dugdale, and the Annales de Margan, printed in the second volume of Gale's Scriptores, both date the foundation in 1147, and attribute it to Robert Earl of Gloucester, who, according to the latter, died in this year, and was buried in the monastery. Bishop Tanner, in comparing these authorities with Speed and some manuscript accounts, which differ a little in their dates, inserts a query whether "Robert might not begin this house only, a little before his death, and William his son and successor finish it some time after?" the latter is by Camden considered to have been its founder. Notwithstanding the uncertainty of its origin, there can be little doubt that it was endowed by Caradoc ab Iestyn, lord of the adjacent lordship of Avon, with extensive grants of lands, which were confirmed by a deed under the hands of Morgan and his two brothers, Cadwallon and Meriedoc, whose descendants, for several generations, were munificent benefactors to the establishment. This appears from the charter of Thomas de Avene, dated February 10th, 1349 (as found by Dugdale, translated into English in the collection of Mr. Hugh Thomas, without mentioning where the latter obtained it), wherein he states, "after due consideration, I confirm unto the said monks all donations, grants, confirmations, and sales whatsoever, which they enjoy by the bounty of any of my predecessors, viz., whatsoever they may have by the gift of Morgan ab Caradoc; of Leison and Owen, the sons of the said Morgan; and all they have by gift of Morgan Cam and his heirs, of Morgan Vaghan and Sir Leison, the sons of the said Morgan Cam; likewise whatsoever they have by the gift of Sir Thomas de Avene, my father." A large collection of original charters belonging to this abbey is preserved with the Harleian MSS. in the British Museum, the earliest of which is a confirmatory bull of Pope Urban III., dated in 1186. It was a Cistercian abbey, dedicated to St. Mary, and is mentioned by earlier antiquaries as the first house of that kind in these parts: according to Leland it had the privilege of sanctuary. When King John exacted a levy from the Cistercian monasteries, the abbey of Margam was exempted, on account of the hospitality he had received here, on his way to Ireland. At the dissolution, its revenue was estimated at £188. 14. The site and possessions, together with the royalty of Avon water, were purchased by Sir Rice Mansel, Knt., who, about the year 1552, built a mansion partly on the site of the abbey, which continued to be the principal seat of the family until the extinction of the male line in 1750. This edifice, which subsequently underwent considerable alterations and repairs, was built of the stone of the country, with Sutton stone quoins and dressings taken from the ruins of the abbey: it presented a long front without any magnificence in the structure, and was taken down about the year 1782. The chapter-house, which is a portion of the ancient conventual buildings, is an elegant and highly admired edifice, in the form of a regular duodecagon without, but within, an exact circle, forty-nine feet in diameter: its roof was vaulted, and supported in the centre by a single clustered column branching off into twenty-four ribs; but this beautiful roof fell in the year 1799, in consequence of the outer walls having become defective, and not, as has been asserted by tourists, from the filtration of water through the joints of the stones; and the side walls, with the spring of the arches only, are now left standing. A noble mansion, in the style of English architecture which prevailed in the reign of Henry VIII., is now in progress of erection, on a scale suited to the rank and fortune of the representative of this ancient family. In the midst of the pleasure grounds is a splendid orangery, an unusual appendage to a gentleman's residence, but there is no record in existence shewing the period of its establishment. According to tradition, this celebrated collection of exotics was intended as a present from a Dutch merchant to Queen Mary, consort of William III.; but the vessel conveying it having been stranded on the coast here, the choice cargo was claimed as the property of the lord, and a house, one hundred and fifty feet in length, was built for the reception of the plants. The late Mr. Talbot, in the year 1787, built a new greenhouse, three hundred and twenty-seven feet in length, with a handsome Palladian front, and a room at each end, and, in 1800, a conservatory, one hundred and fifty feet long, with flues in the ground. There are about one hundred and ten trees in the green-house, all standards planted in square boxes, and many of them eighteen feet high: those in the conservatory, forty in number, are traced against a trellis framing, where the fruit, which is usually abundant, attains its native size and flavour. The evergreens cultivated in the grounds surrounding the orangery are healthy and luxuriant: among these a bay tree, supposed to be the largest in the world, sprouting from the ground in several branches, is the most remarkable, being upwards of sixty feet in height, and forty-five in diameter: the arbutus, Portugal laurel, and holly, flourish in an extraordinary manner, and present a rich and luxuriant appearance.

The village of Margam occupies a pleasing and retired situation, enveloped in trees, a short distance from the turnpike road, at the lower verge of that noble forest of oak to which, in ancient times, it was indebted for its appellation. A building in the form of a semilunar battery, upon the summit of the mountain, commands a view of the woody concave singularly beautiful and striking; and from the same point is also obtained a magnificent prospect of the sea and the bay of Swansea, with the distant hills of the counties of Somerset and Devon. Owing to the abundance of coal, several extensive works have been established in the parish: the first were the copper-works of the English Copper Company, the oldest association of that kind in the kingdom, who, in the year 1800, erected here the first steam-engine used in the manufacture of copper in the principality: these works usually afford employment to about nine hundred persons, and the quantity of copper annually exported amounts to from twelve to fourteen hundred tons. Extensive iron-works have been erected, at a great expense, on the property of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq., by John Reynolds, Esq., which commenced operations in the early part of 1831, but are at present discontinued: they consist of two blast furnaces, capable of yielding one hundred and fifty tons of metal per week, to which the blast is communicated by the force of a water wheel, forty-five feet in diameter, with ten feet breast, and of ninety horse power, said to be the largest in Wales. The water is brought to this wheel from the Avon by means of a magnificent stone aqueduct, primarily designed as a viaduct for a railway to convey coal to the works: it is four hundred and fifty-six feet in length, and eighty feet high, and comprises four elliptical arches, each of seventy feet span, composed of a strong grey stone raised on the spot, the whole having been erected at an expense of upwards of £7000. This noble structure, from its romantic situation across a narrow precipitous valley among the mountains, forms one of the most striking and interesting features of the county, and well deserves the attention of the tourist. The tin-works of Robert Smith and Co. are situated upon the Avon, not far from the small town of Aberavon, and employ some hundred persons. Tram-roads have been formed from each of these works, as well as from coal-pits on the banks of the river, to Tai-bâch, where the goods are shipped. A customary market is held at this place every Saturday, for the convenience of the workmen. A part of the hamlet of Hâvod y porth, on the north-western confines of this parish, is now included within the new boundaries of the contributory borough of Aberavon; and the hamlet of Kenwig Higher, and part of that of Trissient, are comprised within the contributory borough of Kenwig.

The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £1600 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of C. R. M. Talbot, Esq. The church, which is dedicated to the Virgin Mary, stands on the site of the nave of the conventual edifice: having become much dilapidated, it was restored by the munificence of the late Mr. Talbot, about the year 1810: its western front is considered a fine specimen of the Norman style. In restoring the north aisle to its original width, several ancient and interesting monuments were discovered; one without date, bearing a Latin inscription to the memory of an abbot, also the mutilated effigy of a crusader, in chain armour, which was placed within the entrance to the chapter-house. In the side aisle are monuments to several members of the family of Mansel, upon which are recumbent figures, the men in armour, and the ladies in the dress of their own times, with their children, in a kneeling posture, about the sides of the tombs, having the names and marriages inscribed over their heads. On a plate in one of the pillars is an inscription in lively Latin rhyme, to the memory of a favourite huntsman, by Dr. Friend, the eminent classical physician, which has been translated into English verse by the Rev. Bruce Knight, A.M., chancellor of the diocese, and incumbent of this parish. At Tai-bâch, at the western extremity of the parish, a chapel of ease was erected in 1827, to accommodate the increasing population: the principal contributors were, C. R. M. Talbot, Esq., the English Copper Company, John Reynolds, Esq., and Robert Smith and Co., assisted by a grant of £400 from the Incorporated Society for building and enlarging churches and chapels. A gallery has since been erected in this chapel, at an expense of £100: the whole contains between six and seven hundred sittings, of which upwards of five hundred are free. There is a spacious school-room at Tai-bâch, built at an expense of £400, by the English Copper Company, who allow one pound per week to a school-master and his wife for instructing an unlimited number of children, of both sexes. In the wood above the village of Margam stand the roofless walls of an old church or chapel; and upon the top of the mountain is a Roman monument, inscribed "BODVOC JACIT HIC FLVS CATOTI SIRNI PRONEPVS ETENAL VE DOMAV;" and there is another near Eglwys Nunyd (or the Nuns' church, formerly a convent of nuns, now a farm-house, on the road from Margam to Kenwig), with the inscription, also in Roman capitals, "PVMPEIVS CARANTORIVS." Near the chapter-house are two ancient British crosses, standing upright, supposed to be of the fifth and sixth centuries; and there are also vestiges of an ancient intrenchment upon the hill called Pen y Castel. The poor, including those of the hamlet of Kenwig Higher, are supported by an average annual expenditure amounting to £864.

MARLAIS (MARLOES), a parish in the hundred of Rhôs, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 11 miles (W. S. W.) from Haverfordwest, containing 427 inhabitants. This parish is situated on the southern shore of Muggleswick bay, a lesser portion of St. Bride's bay, the western extremity forming a small promontory, and is partly bounded on the east by a small pill, or creek, of Milford Haven. It comprises a considerable tract of arable and pasture land, which, with the exception of a comparatively small portion, is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The village is principally inhabited by fishermen, who obtain a livelihood in the lobster and crab fisheries, which are carried on here to a considerable extent, and by the sale of leeches, which are found in great numbers in a sheet of water covering from sixty to seventy acres, called Marlais Mere, and which, during the summer months, when it is dry, affords excellent pasturage for cattle. More than one-half of the parish is encompassed by the sea, and the shore is in general bold and bordered with cliffs: the depth of water, within a short distance, varies from four to fourteen fathoms. There are a few small islands, the principal of which are called Midland and Gateholm isles, situated close to the coast, but the larger one of Skomer is attached to St. Martin's parish in Pembroke. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £5, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Peter, is a small edifice, not possessing any architectural details of importance. A former structure, which was dedicated to St. Mary, and situated near the beach, was destroyed by an encroachment of the sea, which also laid waste the glebe land originally belonging to the living. Margaret Allen, by deed in 1772, gave £100, vested in the trustees of the turnpike roads in the county of Carmarthen, and producing £5 per annum, to a schoolmaster for teaching twelve poor boys of this parish, to which purpose also an unknown benefactor from Picton Castle gave £5 per annum. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £136.

MARROS, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of DERLLŷs, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 7 miles (W. by S.) from Laugharne, containing 202 inhabitants. This parish is situated at the southwestern extremity of the county, bordering on the county of Pembroke, and bounded on the south by the shore of Carmarthen bay. The surface is wild and broken; and considerable portions of the land are barren and uncultivated. Marros mountain comprises a large tract of stony sterile ground, and the whole district presents a rugged and dreary aspect. Iron-stone and coal are thought to abound here, but no works have yet been established for procuring these minerals, for the transport of which the situation of the place on the shore of Carmarthen bay affords every facility. The coast is composed of a fine sandy beach, a few miles in length, and well adapted for sea-bathing from the shallowness of the water for a considerable distance from the shore. There are several neat and respectable residences scattered over the lower part of the parish. The living is a vicarage, consolidated with Kiffig, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £8 per annum private benefaction, by the Vicar of Laugharne, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Vicar of Laugharne. It was formerly only a perpetual curacy, annexed to the vicarage of Laugharne, but, in consequence of its endowment and consolidation with Kiffig, it was erected into a vicarage.

The church, dedicated to St. Laurence, is not distinguished by any architectural details. Sir John Carew, Bart., made a bequest to the poor, but the amount cannot be ascertained, neither is it known whether it consisted of money or land. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £28.

MARTIN'S (ST.), a hamlet in that part of the parish of ST. MARTIN, HAVERFORDWEST, which is in the hundred of RHÔs, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES,  $\frac{1}{2}$  a mile (N. W.) from Haverfordwest. The population is included in the return for the parish. It is bounded on the east by the West Cleddy river, on the north by a stream which flows into that river, and on the south by an extra-parochial common called the Poor-field.

MARTLETWY, a parish in the hundred of NARBERTH, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (S. E.) from Haverfordwest, containing 725 inhabitants. This place is situated on the Eastern Cleddy, at its junction with the Western Cleddy, and at the commencement of the noble harbour of Milford, which is formed by the union of those rivers. The parish comprises a moderate portion of good arable and pasture land, which is enclosed and cultivated, and a considerable tract abounding with coal and culm, which is worked to a great extent upon the estate of Sir John Owen, Bart. The produce of the collieries is shipped for the supply of distant parts, from a place called Land-shipping, on Milford Haven, where an excellent quay has been constructed for that purpose. In this parish was the ancient family seat of the Owens, who by marriage became proprietors of the noble estates originally belonging to the family of Wyrriot. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4, endowed with £200 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Lady Mansfield, who is also owner of the great tithes of the parish. The church is dedicated to St. Marcellus. There are places of worship for Baptists, Independents, and Methodists, to all of which are attached Sunday schools. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor is £166. 13.

MARY'S (ST.), otherwise MAENCLOCHOG (MAENC-CLOCHOG), a parish comprising the hamlets of MAENCLOCHOG and VORLAN, each of which maintains its own poor, the former in the hundred of KEMMES, and the latter in that of DUNGLEDDEY, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, and containing 466 inhabitants, of which number, 427 are in the hamlet of St. Mary's, or Maenclochog, 10 miles (N. by W.) from Narberth. This place derives its name "Maenclochog" from a large stone, several tons in weight, so nicely poised upon three small upright stones, as to vibrate on the slightest touch, and, upon its being struck, to sound like a bell. This curious relic was destroyed by some of the inhabitants, who, induced by the vain expectation of finding some hidden treasure, blew it up with gunpowder. The parish, which is situated in a mountainous district, comprises a considerable extent of land, the greater portion of which is unenclosed and uncultivated. Part of the Precelly mountain, which is the highest in South Wales, is within its limits: the ancient Welsh name of this mountain is Preswylva, signifying "a place of residence," and is derived from its having been the resort of the natives, as a place of security, in the intestine wars by which this part of the principality was agitated during the earlier periods of its history. This mountain was anciently well clothed with forest timber, affording shelter to such as took refuge in its recesses, but now presents a bare and sterile aspect, dreary in its appearance, and exhibiting some small vestiges of ancient encampments, which were probably those constructed by the natives. The village, which is of considerable size, occupies the summit of a bleak and barren eminence; and the inhabitants, with the exception of such as are employed in agriculture, are engaged in working some quarries of slate of good quality, which is found in the parish. Fairs are annually held on March 10th, May 22nd, August 5th, and the first Monday after the 29th of October; they are large cattle fairs, and are in general well attended. The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of Hugh Webb Bowen, Esq. The chapels of Llandilo and Llangolman were formerly chapels of ease attached to the vicarage, but they have been endowed, and subsequently augmented with Queen Anne's bounty, and are now perpetual curacies, the two districts having been erected into distinct parishes. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, and situated in the centre of the village, is a neat edifice, rebuilt by subscription within the last forty years. A school-room has been erected in the churchyard, and is now occupied by one of Mrs. Bevan's circulating charity schools, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children. St. Mary's well, in this parish, is stated to afford relief to such as are afflicted with rheumatism. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £65.17., of which sum, £63.7. are assessed on the hamlet of Maenclochog.

MARYCHURCH (ST.), a parish in the hundred of COWBRIDGE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles (S. S. E.) from Cowbridge, containing 150 inhabitants. This parish, which, from the dedication of its church to St. Mary, is by the Welsh called Eglwys Vair, comprises within its limits the remains of an ancient castle, to which is attached an old chapel, the porch and frontispiece exhibiting some fine specimens of architecture, though executed by a native nearly two centuries since. It is pleasantly situated in the south-eastern part of the county, on the right bank of the river Thaw, and comprehends a moderate extent of arable and pasture land, of which by far the greater portion is enclosed and in a good state of cultivation. The soil, of which the substratum is limestone, is in general fertile; and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in agriculture. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly wooded and richly diversified, and the adjacent country presents many features of rural and picturesque character. The living is a discharged rectory, with that of Llandocho annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5.6.8., and in the patronage of the Marquis of Bute. The church is not remarkable for any architectural details. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £86.8.

MARY (ST.) HILL, a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (N. W.) from Cowbridge, containing 257 inhabitants.

ants. This parish, which lies in the south-eastern portion of the county, and on the left bank of the river Ewenny, derives its name from the dedication and elevated situation of the parish church. It is not of any great extent, but within its limits is comprised a portion of the lordship of Ruthin, though locally in the hundred of Cowbridge, which anciently constituted one of the numerous petty sovereignties with which the principality formerly abounded, all exercising jura regalia, until abolished in the reign of Henry VIII. The lands are principally enclosed and cultivated, and the downs are celebrated as affording pasturage for sheep of a superior breed, of which the wool is highly esteemed. The surrounding scenery is greatly diversified; and the views from the higher grounds embrace many objects of interesting character, among which the downs, forming in several parts bold undulations, interspersed with immense masses of rock, have a very singular and striking appearance. A fair is held here on August 26th, on a fine open heath. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £5.11.3., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of Sir John Aubrey, Bart. The church, dedicated to St. Mary, is situated on the brow of a lofty hill near the left bank of the river Ewenny; and from the churchyard, which is kept in fine order, are some beautiful and richly varied prospects to the north-east. Mrs. Elizabeth Rees gave £13.10; Miss Mary Gammage gave £20, secured on the Bridgend turnpike trust; and Mrs. Martha Jones and others bequeathed £10, for which the churchwardens hold a deed poll, the produce of all which benefactions is distributed among the poor of the parish. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £63.7.

MATHREY (MERTHYR), a parish in the hundred of DEWISLAND, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W. by W.) from Fishguard, containing 860 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the north-western part of the county, is bounded on the north by St. George's channel, and is intersected by the turnpike road leading from Fishguard to St. David's. In the northern part of the parish, bordering on the coast, which is for the most part bold and abrupt, the depth of water varying from seven to fourteen fathoms near the shore, are some considerable slate quarries, affording employment to a portion of the inhabitants. The village, which is situated on the summit of a hill, was formerly a place of more importance than at present, and had a weekly market and an annual fair, granted by letters patent in the reign of Edward III.; the former has been long since discontinued, but the latter is still held on October 10th, and is numerously attended by the inhabitants of the surrounding district, for the purpose of hiring servants; and another fair is held, on November 22nd, at Nevin, a village on the coast. The living is a discharged vicarage, with those of Granston and St. Nicholas annexed, in the archdeaconry and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4.7.6., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Bishop of St. David's. The rectory constitutes the Golden prebend in the cathedral church of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £25.14.4½., and in the patronage of the Bishop, under whom the tithes are held on lease by Sir John Owen, Bart. The church, dedicated to the Holy Martyrs, and situated in the middle of the village, is an ancient structure, not distinguished by any architectural details of importance. The sum of £ 10 per annum is paid by Sir John Owen, Bart., towards the support of a school in this parish, for the gratuitous instruction of poor children. A perfect cromlech, or Druidical altar, consisting of a table stone seventeen feet in length, and apparently resting upon six upright columns, but only supported by four, is still preserved at Long House, in the village of Trêvin, or Trêvdyn, a manor belonging to the bishop of St. David's, where was anciently an episcopal palace, said to have been erected by Bishop Martin, to which Long House was formerly the grange. The ancient mansion of the family of Harries, of Priskilly Forest, is now the property and residence of John Hill Harries, Esq. The whole of the coast exhibits vestiges of ancient earthworks, evidently thrown up by the early piratical invaders who infested this part of the principality. Mr. Edward Llwyd communicated to the Royal Society of London an interesting account of an extraordinary swarm of locusts which visited this place in 1693, and of which the particulars are fully detailed in the second volume of the Philosophical Transactions. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £433. 16.

MAWR (HIGHER), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N.) from Swansea, containing 423 inhabitants. It forms the north-western part of the parish, where the ground is rugged and mountainous. Some traces of an ancient Roman road are still visible in this district, which abounds with coal. Lewis Thomas, Esq., gave a messuage and tenement, called Tîr Bâch, the rental to be distributed among the poor of this and the adjacent hamlet of Lower Mawr. A separate assessment is made for the support of the poor: the average annual expenditure amounts to £120. 6.

MAWR (LOWER), a hamlet in the parish and hundred of LLANGYVELACH, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 6 miles (N.) from Swansea, containing 384 inhabitants. A few respectable residences are scattered over this hamlet. The poor are maintained by a separate assessment: the average annual expenditure is £177. 12.

MEISTYRRHOSE LOWRY (MAESDRE-RHÔS-LOYWDDU), a township in that part of the parish of LLANDEWI-YSTRADENNY which is in the hundred of KEVENLEECE, county of RADNOR, SOUTH WALES, 1 mile (N. E.) from Penybont, containing 336 inhabitants. It occupies the lower part of the parish, where the Cymmarn stream falls into the river Ithon, which is here crossed by a bridge. The name denotes the fenny nature of the ground, a large common, much reduced by cultivation, having formerly existed here near the junction of those rivers.

MEIVOD, a parish partly in the lower division of the hundred of LLANYVLLIN, partly in the upper division of that of DEYTHUR, and partly in the hundred of POOL, county of MONTGOMERY, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. E. by N.) from Llanvair, containing 1861 inhabitants. The name of this very extensive parish, implying a "lowland champaign dwelling," is obviously derived from its situation in a vast tract of fine open country, in the north-eastern part of the county. Though evidently of great antiquity, and forming a portion of Powys Wenwynwyn, or the moiety allotted by Meredydd ab Bleddyn to his grandson Owain Cyveiliog, it appears to have been distinguished only as having been the place of sepulture of several of the Princes of Powys; and, till within the last few years, the village consisted only of a few thatched cottages, thinly scattered, and of very mean appearance. By some historians this place has been identified with the Roman station "Mediolanum," but the difficulties of ascertaining precisely the exact site of that station are in no degree diminished by fixing it here, and the hypothesis has accordingly been abandoned by the most distinguished antiquaries. The parish, which extends for nine miles in length and four in breadth, is situated on the river Vyrnwy, which is formed by the junction of the rivers Banwy and Avon Llanwddyn, which unite at this place, where it first begins to expand its waters, which, previously to their entering the vale, were confined by the depth of the banks and the rapidity of the current; from this circumstance it derived its original name Evyrnwy, or "the spreading river," now written Vyrnwy. Two other streams intersect the parish, the Brogan and the Colwyn, and finally join that river. The lands were partially enclosed under the provisions of an act of parliament obtained in 1787, and portions of several townships have been subsequently enclosed by the unanimous consent of the different proprietors. The surrounding scenery is pleasingly varied, three parts being bounded by low hills well wooded, and at the other end the views extend over a tract of level country, distinguished chiefly for its rural beauty, which is terminated by the Breiddyn hills: the soil, though various, is generally fertile, especially on the banks of the Vyrnwy. Lead-ore was thought to exist in the parish, and some attempts were made a few years since to procure it, by sinking shafts and driving levels, in the township of Main; but the undertaking was not attended with success, and the works have consequently been abandoned. Some fine veins of potters' earth have been found, and the rocks in the parish abound with barytes and other minerals. The village, which is situated on the turnpike road leading from Aberystwith, by Camm Office and Llanvair, to Oswestry, has, within the last few years, become a place of considerable importance, and may be regarded as one of the handsomest of the smaller towns in the principality: the houses are of stone, roofed with slate, and neatly and well built; and the place has a highly interesting and prepossessing appearance. It enjoys considerable traffic from its being on the great thoroughfare by which the western parts of the country are supplied with lime and coal. A post-office, subordinate to that at Oswestry, has been established here; and fairs are annually held in the village on the first Friday in February, the last Tuesday in April, the first Tuesday in August, and on September 21st. Courts leet are also held in the spring.

This parish is said formerly to have composed the archdeaconry of all Powysland. The living is a vicarage, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, rated in the king's books at £15. 14. 2., and in the patronage of the Bishop. The rectorial tithes, which anciently belonged to the abbey of Strata Marcella, or Ystrad Marchell, near Welshpool, are appropriated to the Dean and Canons of Christ Church, Oxford, between whom or their lessees, on the one hand, and the vicar on the other, they are equally divided. The history of the church is involved in considerable perplexity: according to some accounts it would appear that, exclusively of the present edifice, there were two others, the ruins of which Mr. Pryce of Llanvyllin, in a letter to Mr. Babington, dated April 12th, 1701, acknowledges to have seen; but, from their contiguous situation, an opinion has been entertained that they were probably only different portions, or a subsequent enlargement, of the original building, dedicated respectively to their several founders, and forming distinct chapels in the same church. The first church was dedicated to St. Gwyddvarch, an anchorite who lived on the brow of a hill in this parish, still called Gallt yr Ancr, and from whose warning voice, directing the workmen where to build the sacred edifice, for which they had chosen an improper site, said to have been repeatedly heard in the valley at midnight, uttering the words "Yma i vod," some etymologists have derived the name of the parish. The second, which was contiguous to the first, was dedicated to St. Tysilio, an eminent saint, who flourished towards the middle of the seventh century, and who is said to have been the second son of Brochwel Ysgythrog, whose palace was at Shrewsbury. The exact time when, and the person by whom, this church was built are not known; but in the chronicles of Caradoc of Llancarvan it appears, that Madoc ab Meredydd, Prince of Powys, was interred "yn eglwys Tysilio yn Meivod," in the year 1159; and subsequent writers state that Gruffydd Maelor, eldest son of Madoc, and lord of the lower moiety of Powys, was also buried in this church, in the year 1190. The church dedicated to St. Mary, and the only one at present remaining, is supposed to have been founded by Madoc ab Meredydd, against which opinion it is objected that he was buried in the church of St. Tysilio, four years after the consecration of this church, which ceremony took place in the year 1155; but that may be easily accounted for, as the church of St. Tysilio had been the general place of sepulture not only of his ancestors, but also of most of the princes of the races of Mervyn and Conwyn. The present church is a spacious structure, in the Norman style of architecture, comprising a double-roofed nave, and an aisle on the north side, with a low square tower, and appears to have been originally much larger than at present: on the north side are evident traces of the foundations of a transept, which may probably have been either the church of St. Tysilio, or the portion of the original building dedicated to that saint. Near the font is an ancient tombstone without any inscription, rudely ornamented with sculpture, in basso relievo, of a Catherine wheel surmounted by a sword, and embellished with knots and other rude ornaments. In the chancel window, within the last few years, was a legend in ancient characters, commemorating the two saints of the churches that have disappeared, and probably preserved out of their ruins, and, with other portions of stained glass, inserted in this window by John Roger, rector of this parish at a period unknown. There are places of worship for Independents and Welsh Calvinistic and Wesleyan Methodists. A school for the gratuitous instruction of poor children was endowed by Mr. William Pugh, in 1714, with £3 per annum, which endowment has been since augmented with £9 per annum, arising from the sale of timber growing upon a farm in the township of Peniarth, bequeathed to the poor by the Rev. Richard Derwas, a former vicar of the parish. There are four almshouses in Pentre Parroc, in this parish, the inmates of which, though they have no exclusive endowment, partake of certain benefactions in land by various persons, the produce of which is annually distributed among the poor. On the summit of the hill called Gallt yr Ancr, or "the anchorite's hill," on the brow of which St. Gwyddvarch had his cell, as noticed above, are some traces of a British fortification, the history of which is not known; and on the side of the same hill is Bedd y Cawr, or "the grave of the Giant." A dyke, which in some places was double, formerly extended from Allt y Main to Ceunant Mawr, in this parish, for the defence of the pass into the vale of Llanvyllin, by Bwlch y Cibau. Some vestiges of British fortifications and encampments may be seen on Hên Allt, in Trêv-nannau, at a place called the Gaer, and near Clawdd llesg. There are several springs in the parish, some of which are impregnated with medicinal properties. In the township of Teitrêv there is a well called Fynnon Darogan, or "the well of divination," protected by a cupola, which has stood for many years: the water, though very salubrious, has no medicinal qualities. In the same township is Fynnon y Groftydd, the water of which is strongly sulphureous, and has been found highly efficacious in the cure of cutaneous diseases. In the township of Trêvedryd is Fynnon y Clawdd-llesg, consisting of two springs close to each other, of which one is slightly impregnated with hepatic air, and the other has no appearance of any mineral property whatever; it has been much resorted to in the spring by persons afflicted with scrofula, who have found relief by exposing the affected part to the action of the water on its issuing from the rock. Till within the last few years it was customary for the young people of the parish to assemble at this place, on the eighth Sunday after Easter, to drink the water, and afterwards to retire to some green spot and spend the remainder of the day in dancing: a similar practice prevailed near a fountain of clear rock water on Gallt y Main, at the other extremity of the parish, whence, after drinking the water, the company retired to a fine green fenced on four sides like a Roman camp, and called Brÿn y bowliau, where they spent the rest of the day in athletic exercises. The origin of these customs is altogether unknown, and the practice has for some years been totally discontinued. Cynddelw, a poet laureate of the twelfth century, and a native of this parish, in a poem in honour of St. Tysilio, published in the Archæologia, notices the church of this place, which he describes as situated adjoining to that of St. Gwyddvarch, eulogizes Caradoc, whom he calls archdeacon of the church, as a munificent patron, and celebrates the churchyard as the cemetery of princes. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor amounts to £878. 16.

MELIDEN, a parish in the hundred of PRESTATYN, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES, 5 miles (N. by E.) from St. Asaph, containing 720 inhabitants. This parish, which is supposed to derive its name from the dedication of its church; is situated at the north-western extremity of the county, and on the shore of the Irish sea. It comprises an extensive tract of rich arable and pasture land, which is in a high state of cultivation: the surface is in general flat, and the whole district, extending to Rhuddlan, is remarkably fertile; the soil is favourable for the growth of all kinds of grain, but more especially for wheat, the quality of which is not excelled in any other part of the principality. There are a few respectable residences scattered over the parish, among which is Nant, an ancient mansion of a branch of the Conways of Brŷn Euryn, near Llandrillo in Rhôs. The surrounding scenery, though pleasing, is not distinguished by any peculiar features; and the only views possessing interest are those which extend over the Irish sea, at the time of flood tide, when vessels are proceeding towards the river Dee; but at ebb tide many sand-banks present themselves, and the coast is in general low and sandy. The living is a perpetual curacy, locally in the archdeaconry, and in the diocese, of St. Asaph, endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £400 parliamentary grant, and in the patronage of the Treasurer in the cathedral church of St. Asaph, who is impropriator of the tithes. The church, dedicated to St. Melid, is not remarkable for any peculiarity of architectural detail. Edward ab Thomas, in 1684, bequeathed a rent-charge of £40 to the poor of the parish. In the hamlet of Prestatyn, in this parish, are some vestiges of an ancient castle, called Plâs Prestatyn. The average annual expenditure for the maintenance of the poor amounts to £235. 11.

MELINDWR (MELIN-DWR), a township in that part of the parish of LLANBADARN-VAWR which is in the lower division of the hundred of GENEU'R GLYN, county of CARDIGAN, SOUTH WALES, containing 555 inhabitants, the population having increased nearly twofold since the census of 1821. The situation of this township in the vale of the Rheidol is extremely picturesque, more especially at Pont y Pren, where the dark rocks rise on one side nearly four hundred feet above the bed of that river. Through a chasm among these a mountain stream issues, forming a fine cascade, and turning a small mill, which can only be approached by a rude bridge composed of the trunk of a tree. This district is well wooded, and there are some lead mines. The poor are supported by a separate assessment, the average annual expenditure amounting to £170. 10.

MELINEY, or MELINAU, a parish in the hundred of KEMMES, county of PEMBROKE, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W. by S.) from Cardigan, containing 492 inhabitants. This parish is situated in the northern part of the county, close to the road leading from Cardigan to Fishguard, and is intersected by the great road from the former to Haverfordwest. The greater part of it is enclosed and cultivated, and the remainder consists of barren heath and stony common, forming a portion of the Precelley mountain. The soil in that part of the parish which is enclosed is tolerably fertile. The surrounding scenery, though not greatly diversified, is enriched with some branches of the river Nevern, which flow through the parish; and the adjoining country is not destitute of interest. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Cardigan, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £10, and in the alternate patronage of Thomas Lloyd, Esq., who is lord of the manor, and the freeholders in the parish, who have the next presentation. There are some ancient mansions in various parts of the parish, within the limits of which also are some remains of a circular encampment, called Penybenglog, defended by a single rampart. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £140. 7.

MERFORD, a joint lordship and township with Hoseley, in the parish of GRESFORD, partly in the hundred of BROMFIELD, county of DENBIGH, and partly in the hundred of MAELOR, county of FLINT, NORTH WALES,  $4\frac{3}{4}$  miles (N. E. by N.) from Wrexham, containing, with Hoseley, 325 inhabitants. These places anciently constituted two lordships: that of Merford extends to the south bank of the river Alyn, and the road from Chester to Wrexham passes through it. The portion included in Flintshire was constituted part of that county by act of parliament in the reign of Henry VIII., and is surrounded on every side by parts of Denbighshire. There is a place of worship for Wesleyan Methodists. In this lordship is the "Roft," an ancient British camp, forming the most elevated point of an eminence commanding extensive prospects over the Vale Royal of Cheshire, the city of Chester, the forest of Delamere, and the hills of Lancashire, Derbyshire, Shropshire, &c. This encampment is rendered nearly inaccessible, on the north and west, by the almost perpendicular steepness of the hill: on the east its enclosed area was protected by three ditches, now nearly filled up; but its defences on the south, consisting of three deep fosses, are still visible. In the north-eastern corner is a very elevated mount, or exploratory camp, from which is obtained a view into nine different counties.

MERIADOG (CEVN-MERIADOG), a joint township with Wigvair, in that part of the parish of St. ASAPH which is in the hundred of ISDULAS, county of DENBIGH, NORTH WALES, 1 mile (S.) from St. Asaph. The population is returned with the parish. It is situated on the left bank of the Elwy, and the road from St. Asaph to Denbigh passes through it, close to that river. Here are some curious natural caverns, extending a considerable distance into the limestone hills, having the roofs, in some places, forty feet high, and containing various fossil remains. Among other objects of interest have been found the skull of a remarkably large animal, with the teeth perfectly sound and enamelled, and nearly as large as a cricket-ball; and the tongue of another, equal in size to that of a deer, with the form and grain remaining quite perfect, though completely petrified, and as hard as the limestone rock in which it was found. Nearer the river Elwy, and at the base of these hills, there is an extensive limestone rock, naturally perforated into an immense arch, twenty-one yards in length and thirty-six feet in height, through which a road proceeds, and is capable of admitting the passage of a large waggon loaded with hay.

MERIONETHSHIRE, a maritime county of North Wales, bounded on the west by the bay of Cardigan, being that part of the Irish sea which separates the two great promontories of North and South Wales; on the north-west, by Carnarvonshire; on the north and north-east, by Denbighshire; on the east and south-east, by Montgomeryshire; and on the south, by Cardiganshire and the æstuary of the river Dovey, or Dyfi. It extends from  $52^{\circ} 31'$  to  $53^{\circ} 2'$  (N. Lat.), and from  $3^{\circ} 20'$  to  $4^{\circ} 28'$  (W. Lon.); and includes an area, according to Evans' Map of North Wales, of four hundred and thirty thousand statute acres, or upwards of six hundred and seventy square miles. The population, in 1831, was 35,609.

This county derives its name, in Welsh written Merionydd, Meirionydd, and Meirion, from a cantrev of ancient Wales, called Meirion, which was incorporated with it, at its southern extremity, on the settlement of its present limits in the reign of Henry VIII., and which gave name to the ancient province of Meirionydd: this cantrev received its appellation from its having been the portion of Meirion, grandson of Cunedda, the latter a prince of North Britain who came into North Wales, in the fifth century, to rescue it from some Irish invaders; and having succeeded in his enterprise, he divided the recovered territory among his sons and grandsons: this is the only county of North Wales which retains its ancient name, with the addition of the word shire. In the time of Cæsar, the present county of Merioneth formed part of the territory of the Ordovices, and after the Roman conquest it was included in the district called Mervinia, a subdivision of the great province of Britannia Secunda. The Roman station Heriri Mons is placed by Stukeley near Bala, in this county, though by others it is thought to have been situated at Tommen y Mûr, near Festiniog: Caer Gai, in the vicinity of Llanuwchllyn, near Bala, and Pennal, on the southern border of the county, near Machynlleth in Montgomeryshire, are also considered to have been the sites of Roman settlements. The Roman Via Occidentalis ran the whole length of the county, from south to north, entering it from the station Loventium, in Cardiganshire, and passing by the large encampment at Pennal, and the station Heriri Mons, to that of Segontium, on the shore of the Menai. A branch of the southern Watling-street also traversed it from the station Mediolanum, in Montgomeryshire, by Caer Gai, near Bala, to the Via Occidentalis at Heriri Mons. In the division made by Roderic the Great, this county was included in the kingdom of Aberfraw, or North Wales, excepting only the eastern and north-eastern parts of it, forming the ancient cantrevs of Mowddwy, Edeyrnion, and Glyndyrdwy, and part of that of Dinmael, which belonged to the kingdom of Powys. Though sometimes the scene of internal struggles, Merionethshire, from its remote and almost inaccessible situation, in the wars of the ancient Britons with the Saxons, Danes, and Normans, was never the scene of action until near the extinction of Welsh independence. Henry II., having assembled the choicest troops from every part of his extensive dominions, in the year 1165, entered the Welsh territory at Oswestry, while the power of all Wales was collected at Corwen, in this county, to oppose him. By cutting down the woods in his progress, to prevent surprise, notwithstanding some opposition which he met with from detached parties of the Welsh soldiery, Henry advanced to the Berwyn mountain, at the north-eastern extremity of Merionethshire, where he pitched his camp in order to refresh his forces. The English were stationed on the acclivity of the hills, and the Welsh, presenting a dark and formidable front, were posted on the summit of the opposite mountains, each army appearing unwilling to commence the attack: but the situation of the English monarch soon became critical, for the Welsh, watching every movement, and neglecting no opportunity for intercepting his supplies, reduced the English army to the utmost distress for want of provisions and forage: these difficulties were still further increased by sudden and heavy rains, which rendered Henry's position in such a broken and uneven country almost untenable, and at last the waters, descending from the hills in sweeping torrents, compelled him to retreat into England with great loss of men and stores. In 1404, Harlech castle was suddenly seized by the valiant Owain Glyndwr, on his raising the standard of revolt against the newly-acquired authority of Henry IV.; but four years after it was retaken by an English army sent to suppress this rebellion. After the accession of Edward IV. to the throne of England, this castle, then in the possession of David ab Ievan ab Einion, a firm friend of the Lancastrians, was held for that party for several years, in spite of entreaties and menaces: finding the governor determined to continue the resistance, the king at last sent an army against him, under the command of William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, who, after encountering numerous obstacles in conducting his forces through these alpine regions, at length invested the fortress, which, however, was not surrendered until after a long siege, and then only on the most honourable terms: this appears to have been the last post defended on behalf of the house of Lancaster. At the close of the war, Dinasmowddwy and its neighbourhood became the resort of numerous felons and outlaws, who formed themselves into desperate bands of plunderers, by one of which, Lewis Owen, Esq., of Llwyn, near Dôlgelley, Vice-Chamberlain and Baron of the Exchequer of North Wales, was openly attacked and murdered, in 1555, on his way to the assizes at Montgomery; but by the most vigorous measures this evil was at length abated. Early in the civil war of the seventeenth century, Harlech castle was strenuously defended for the king by Sir Hugh Pennant, until, the garrison becoming mutinous, it fell into the hands of the parliamentarians: it was afterwards again in the possession of the royalists, but was finally taken, in March 1647, by a parliamentary force under General Mytton. Dôlgelley, having been originally garrisoned for the parliament, was besieged by a small party of royalists, who, however, were dispersed, and their leader made prisoner.

A great portion of this county (viz., the hundreds of Edeyrnion and Penllŷn, and the small ancient hundred of Mowddwy,) is in the diocese of St. Asaph; the rest is in that of Bangor; and the whole is included in the province of Canterbury: the portion comprised within the first-mentioned diocese is in the archdeaconry of St. Asaph, and deaneries of Mowddwy, and Penllŷn and Edeyrnion; and that in the diocese of Bangor, is in the archdeaconry of Merioneth, and deaneries of Ardudwy, Estimaner, and Tal y Bont: the total number of parishes is thirty-six, of which twenty are rectories, five vicarages, and the rest perpetual curacies. For purposes of civil government it is divided into the hundreds of Ardudwy, Edeyrnion, Estimaner, Penllŷn, and Tal y Bont and Mowddwy, which last two, on account of the small size of Moddwy, have been united. It contains the market and assize towns of Bala and Dôlgelley; the market, sea-port, and sea-bathing town of Barmouth; the market and sea-bathing town of Towyn; the sea-port and sea-bathing town of Aberdovey; and the market towns of Corwen, Dinas-mowddwy, and Harlech. One knight is returned to parliament for the shire, who is elected at Harlech: the polling-places within the county, under the late Reform and Boundary Acts, are Harlech, Bala, Corwen, Dinas-mowddwy, Dôlgelley, and Towyn. This county is included in the North Wales circuit: the Lent assizes, and the Epiphany and Midsummer quarter sessions, are held at Bala; the Midsummer assizes, and the Easter and Michaelmas quarter sessions, at Dôlgelley: the county gaol is in the vicinity of Dôlgelley; and the county houses of correction, or bridewells, are at Bala, Corwen, and Dôlgelley. There are twenty-three acting magistrates. The rates raised in the county for the year ending March 25th, 1830, amounted to £16,760, and the expenditure to £16,383, of which, £14,543 was applied to the relief of the poor.

Nearly the whole of the county is occupied by wild and barren rocks and mountains; and though the latter are not so high as those of the adjoining county of Carnarvon, yet many are very lofty, and others of less towering height are, by their precipitous and craggy sides, rendered both picturesque and sublime objects. Contrasted with the gayer scenes of a highly cultivated country, the scenery of Merionethshire would be considered bleak and dreary; but a variety of objects, forming innumerable contrasts, render it strikingly pleasing and romantic; for, besides the grandeur of its maritime views and its lofty mountains and inaccessible crags, the enjoyment of a tour through this county is heightened by the diversified appearance of its lower hills, of several small level plains, and of numerous romantic valleys; while the whole district is interspersed with woods, lakes, rivers, torrents, cataracts, and all the varied decorations of nature in her wildest garb. From a line entering from Montgomeryshire, and running north-westward by Bwlch y groes, near Aran Vowddwy, to Drws y Nant, between Bala and Dôlgelley, and thence across the mountains to Llŷn Trywerin and Llŷn Morwynion, and terminating near the head of the valley of Festiniog, the rivers descend in opposite directions, on one side eastward, and on the other westward; and a farm-house on this line, called Pant gwŷn, is so situated that the rain which falls on the western side of the roof flows into Cardigan bay at Barmouth, and that which falls on the eastern side into the Irish sea at Chester bar. The principal streams on the western side of this parting ridge are, the Dovey, which flows south-eastward through the rich valley of Machynlleth; the Maw, which flows through Ganllwyd, and is joined by the Wonion, which runs from Drws y Nant through the Vale of Dôlgelley, the united streams emptying themselves into the sea at Barmouth; and the Traeth bâch, which runs westward, through the Vale of Festiniog: the principal on the opposite side is the Dee, which rises under a hill near the head of Bala lake, and flows north-eastward through the beautiful Vale of Edeyrnion, and thence eastward through the romantic vales of Glydyvrdwy and Llangollen. The Vale of the Dovey far excels in extent and fertility those of any of the other streams, which circumstance is attributed by geologists to the difference in the qualities of the strata surrounding each. The principal and most elevated chain of mountains is the Berwyn range, which, commencing in the south-eastern part of Denbighshire, forms the lofty summit of Cader Verwyn, near the north-eastern extremity of this county, and stretching south-eastward presents numerous lofty peaks, and includes the mountains called the Arans and the Arenigs. The loftiest heights of the chain are, Cader Idris, which raises high its trifurcated summit to the south of Dôlgelley, near its south-eastern extremity, and from which it makes a rapid descent to the sea-shore at Sarn y Bwch; Aran Mowddwy and Aran Penllŷn, to the south of Bala mere; the Arenig mountain, to the westward of Bala; and Cader Verwyn, above mentioned. In point of elevation these mountains hold a middle rank between the towering peaks of Snowdon and the humbler swells of the Plinlimmon range: the height of the first above the level of the sea is two thousand nine hundred and fourteen feet; of the second, two thousand nine hundred and fifty-five; of Arenig, two thousand eight hundred and nine; and of Cader Verwyn, two thousand five hundred and sixty-three. The vegetable produce of the mountains is fern and furze, or gorse, upon the lower and drier outskirts; heath upon the loftier summits of argillaceous schistus, having its roots in shallow peat upon clay or rammel; and rushes, and a variety of mosses and other alpine aquatic plants, on the humid slopes and hollows, upon various depths of peat. These wastes abound with grouse, and the town of Bala, situated in the midst of them, is a place of great resort for sportsmen. The numerous lakes are very small, excepting that of Llŷn Tegid, or Bala mere, which is the largest in the principality, being nearly twelve miles in circumference, and has been fathomed in various places to the depth of from fifty-five to one hundred and twenty yards: the town of Bala is situated at its northern extremity. Some of the principal of the smaller lakes are, Llŷn Talyllyn, near the foot of Cader Idris, on the southern side of that mountain; Llŷn Bodlyn and Llŷn cwm Howel, near Cors y Gedol; Llŷn Raithlyn, near Trawsvynydd; Llŷn Cynwch, Llŷn Elider, Llŷn Teewyn uchâ and isâ, Llŷn y cwm bychan, Llŷn Arenig, &c. Bala mere is remarkable for a peculiar kind of fish called gwyniaid, the salmo lavaretus of Linnæus; Llŷn cwm Howel, for a deformed species of trout; and Llŷn Raithlyn, for a singular variety of perch. On the sea-coast are various marshes scattered along its whole extent, and the waste unenclosed sands of the Traeth Bychan, at the northern extremity of the coast of this county, occupy several thousand acres. Different embankments have been made on the land skirting this marsh, thus securing some hundreds of acres from inundation at spring tides, to which they were before liable; and the sandy æstuary of the Traeth Bychan, a little to the north of it has been wholly embanked and enclosed. The sea is thought in remote ages to have made great encroachments on the shore of this county, a supposition accredited by tradition and various existing evidences. Sarn y Bwch, above mentioned, is a ridge of huge stones covered by the tides, but appearing at low water: it stretches westward into the sea, from near the mouth of the river Dysynni, in the vicinity of the church of Llangelynin. Another similar line, but of much greater extent, extends south-westward from a point on the coast to the south-west of Harlech, and is called Sarn Badrig, or the "ship-breaking causeway," from the accidents which occur to vessels approaching this sunken reef unawares at full or half tides: this is about twenty-four feet broad. Sarn signifies a causeway, or pavement; and a monkish legend relates, that the latter was miraculously formed by St. Patrick, to facilitate his passage between Britain and Ireland: by some, these ranges are considered as the work of art, but by others merely as rocks in their natural position. By such as entertain the former opinion Sarn y Bwch and Sarn Badrig are asserted to have met each other, and to have formed against the sea the barrier of a rich tract of land, called Cantrev Gwaelod, or the "Low-land Hundred," the catastrophe of the inundation of which is recorded in ancient verse in a very old manuscript, called "the Black Book of Carmarthen;" and the names of several towns that were overwhelmed are yet preserved in the traditions of the Welsh. This event is said to have taken place about the year 500, at the time when Gwyddno Garanhir, father of Elphin, the patron of the Welsh bard Taliesin, was lord of the territory, owing to the negligence of a drunkard named Seithennin, who in the night left the sluices of the embankment open. In the sea, about seven miles to the west of Aberystwith, there is a collection of loose stones, called Caer-Wyddno, the fort or palace of Gwyddno; and adjoining to it are vestiges of what is supposed to have been the southern embankment of Cantrev Gwaelod. The depth of water over the whole extent of the bay of Cardigan is not great; and on the recess of the tide, stones bearing Latin inscriptions, and Roman coins of various emperors, have been at different times found at some distance within high water mark; and in different places in the water are observed prostrate trees. The Vale of Towyn, in the south-eastern part of Merionethshire, seems to have been restored by the sea some time after the inundation of Cantrev Gwaelod: a considerable part of it, formerly of value only as a turbarry, has been drained and embanked by the exertions of the late Edward Corbet, Esq., of Ynysmaengwyn, and converted into meadows of the richest quality.

In the larger valleys, and near the sea-shore, the climate is mild; but on the mountains it is cold and tempestuous, and on some of the higher summits the snow sometimes remains until June, though in the vicinity of the sea it soon disappears, even in the depth of winter. The soils are various, and those of the low lands are very fertile. The prevailing kind is peat or moss, which is found at all elevations, but of the greatest depth on levels and in hollows favourable to its production: it occurs of less depth on gentle slopes, upon clay or rammel, being such substrata as do not admit the filtration of water: this latter is generally covered with a coarse matted herbage, which characterizes what is provincially called rhossy land. Till, a hungry light mould, tinged by the orange oxyde of iron, is common on the mountains. Ferny soils, or hazel mould, is frequently found on the lower hills, producing fern, broom, and the larger ulex or gorse, besides various kinds of underwood. All the smaller valleys traversed by rapid streams have a light gravelly soil, which becomes gradually more fertile in approaching its lowest levels: the light soils of the Vale of Dovey owe their superior fertility to their receiving from one side deposits from the soft shaly mountains of Montgomeryshire and Cardiganshire, while that of every other valley in the county is derived only from mountains of clay-slate, or of primitive siliceous substances. Free loams, well adapted for the general purposes of tillage, abound in the Vale of Edeyrnion, in the vicinity of Corwen; and lighter soils on the marine level, or semi-vale, of Ardudwy, on the western side of the county. The wastes on the sea-coast consist of extensive sands.

The quantity of land under tillage was computed, before the late continental war, at less than fourteen thousand acres, so that the inhabitants chiefly depended upon Montgomeryshire and Denbighshire for a supply of grain, of which Bala was the principal mart: a few cargoes of rye from London and Liverpool were also brought to Barmouth. But a great and favourable change has since taken place in the agriculture of this county; and there is scarcely even an upland farm upon which a sufficient quantity of oats and barley for the consumption of the occupier is not grown. Fallowing is scarcely ever practised, the common farmers considering it much too expensive and unprofitable an operation. The fields in the more elevated situations, having no other divisions than those made by low fences of sods and fragments of stone walls, cannot be brought under culture for wheat or any other winter crop, as it would be entirely devoured by sheep, which have the unlimited range of the whole farm from November until the Lent crops are sown, when they are turned out into their mountain walks. Oats are the species of corn principally cultivated: this grain is generally sown for three, and sometimes more, years successively, but with very inferior profit; after which the land is commonly sown with grasses, and depastured for five or six years, and then again brought under the same course of tillage: various species of white oats have been in cultivation for the last thirty years; and the hardy black oat, which was formerly the only sort sown, is now only partially grown, in situations where the land is of inferior quality: the latter, however, is more suited to the climate, and its straw is a highly nutritious food for cattle. In the narrow valleys of Merionethshire, which, like its streams, run generally from north-east to south-west, most barley is grown on the side having the southern aspect, and oats chiefly on the opposite side; the latter, which is called all haul, that is, "a place forsaken by the sun," having also generally a springy soil, while the opposite side has a dry gravel and hazel mould: the inhabitants of the northern aspects have a phrase current among them, that "the shade never went to the sunshine to borrow oatmeal." Besides oats and barley, which are the most common crops, wheat is grown on the best soils, and rye on temporary enclosures of small pieces of the waste lands, which are pared and burned, and after the crop is gathered are again thrown open. In the uplands, all the kinds of grain that are there grown were formerly, in most places, cut with the reaping-hook, instead of the common and more expeditious method of cutting with scythes, which is now practised. Potatoes are every where commonly grown, in the eastern parts of the county with great care, but in the western districts, and more especially in the Vale of Ardudwy, in a more negligent manner. Fruit trees are profitably cultivated throughout the whole of the county. The artificial grasses are of the ordinary kinds, and are extensively cultivated: the seeds are produced in the county, with the exception of those of clover, which are generally procured at the large fair held at Wrexham in March, and from professed dealers in such commodities. Various valuable species of grasses are indigenous, such as white clover, dog's-tail, &c. The enclosed and unenclosed grass lands, which together occupy by much the greater portion of the county, are for the most part appropriated to the rearing of lean cattle, to be sold to the graziers of richer districts, who fatten them to supply places of great consumption. In these hilly regions are also produced great quantities of butter, of which about three tons per week are sent in firkins to Chester, during the six summer months, from the neighbourhood of Bala, besides a supply to Denbigh, Holywell, and other weekly markets: some is also sent by sea to Liverpool. Much cheese is also made, but it is of a very poor quality, all the richness of the milk being extracted by the butter, and in lieu of it they saturate the curd with rennet to such a degree as to render it quite spongy, and of a very strong flavour: many of the poorer class prefer this kind of cheese, of which several tons are annually sold at the fair at Dôlgeley: it is seldom coloured with annatto. Artificial irrigation is practised in different places, and on a more particularly extensive scale on the estate of Athelstan Corbet, Esq., of Ynysmaengwyn, in the Vale of Towyn. Lime is used as a manure within a convenient distance of the Gwerclas and Hâvod rocks, near Corwen, the only places in Merionethshire which produce white lime, and where about fifty thousand bushels are burned annually. The argillaceous limestone, found in different parts of it, derives its chief value as a manure from being burned with peat, the ashes of which become intermixed with the lime. Great quantities of peat ashes are applied to the land in every part of the county; and sea-thong (alga marina), and the fucus of various kinds, are also gathered in considerable quantities on the sea-coast after storms, and extensively employed as manures. The kind of plough in most common use is the old large heavy plough of North Wales, the same that is still used in the counties of Anglesey and Carnarvon. The cattle are remarkably small, and have few particularly good qualities, except their extreme hardness and consequent cheapness of rearing: those on the mountains are generally black, but much less in size, and less uniform in character, than the Anglesey breed. The sheep are of a small hardy kind peculiar to the mountains of Wales, having generally white faces and legs, and sometimes horns: the smaller weigh from seven to nine lb. per quarter, and yield a fleece of from three quarters of a lb. to a lb. and a half; the larger weigh from nine to twelve lb. per quarter, and carry from a lb. and a half to two lb. of wool. The wool is of a very mean clothing quality, being mixed with coarse long hairs, called by the manufacturers kemps, and by the Welsh sythvlew: this breed is, however, found to be susceptible of great improvement, as is more particularly seen in the flocks of different farmers in the parishes of Tallyllyn and Llanvihangel: hardly any sheep of other breeds have been introduced. In this county are reared great numbers of the diminutive and exceedingly hardy ponies called merlins: they obtain their whole support, during winter as well as summer, from the coarse herbage of the mountain wastes, where they breed promiscuously, and from which they are never brought down until they are three years old and fit for sale. Those bred on the Berwyn mountains are then driven within a ring fence, and such as are considered the best for sale are separated from the rest, which latter are again set at liberty, and the former are driven for sale at the fair held at Llanrhaidr yn Mochnant. Great numbers of these spirited little animals are employed in carrying on their backs the produce of the manufacturers of the county, when purchased by salesmen; and their use is almost wholly confined to their native districts. Another breed, somewhat larger than these, and probably raised by an intermixture with the English horses, is occasionally seen, and is hardy, handsome, and exceedingly active in climbing the slippery steep slopes of the mountains. The large heathy mountains, more particularly those of the Berwyn range, swarm with a species of wild bees, and on a fine day these wilds may be traversed for miles without hearing the least noise save the monotonous hum of these busy insects. The woods were formerly very scanty, and of little value; but in modern times the native woodlands have received much attention, and extensive plantations have been made by different proprietors. The Vale of Edeyrnion, near the borders of Denbighshire and Montgomeryshire, and the vicinity of Bala, have been greatly ornamented with plantations of modern formation: in other parts of the county most of the vales are well wooded; and although the bleak exposure of the mountains is inimical to the growth of forest trees, yet there are various situations and soils in which timber sometimes acquires a very large growth: some verses, in celebration of a noted oak tree, formerly growing at Ganllwyd, in the parish of Llanddwylau, and which, when felled, measured six hundred and nine cubic feet, are still sung to the harp by the peasants of this county, by whom it was held in great veneration: many magnificent trees, produced from acorns of this monarch of the forest, are scattered in different places, some of the finest being on the Tan y Bwlch demesne. This county being, next to Carnarvonshire, the most mountainous of North Wales, its waste lands are very extensive; but most of them have been appropriated and many of them enclosed under different acts of parliament. Some mountains are enclosed up to their very summits; but many others are quite unsusceptible of improvement: the most improvable wastes are the marshes on the sea-coast. The principal fuel of the county is peat, of which it contains great abundance, almost every farm having its appropriated turbary: such as have no common-right buy this article by the load. On the sea-shore, between Towyn and Aberdovey, is found a bed of excellent peat, which extends to an unknown distance under the waters of Cardigan bay: to arrive at this peat it is necessary to remove several feet of sand deposited by the sea; and, owing to the saline particles contained in it, the flame soon corrodes culinary vessels exposed to its action.

The mineral productions of this county are various, consisting chiefly of lead and copper ores and slates; and its geology is interesting, although it has received but little illustration. To the westward of a line extending from the æstuary of the Dovey up the course of that river to its source, near Aran Mowddwy, thence along the stream of the Twrch from its spring to Bala mere, and from that place along the Dee to its confluence with the Trywerin, and then up the latter river to its own source and that of the Conway, the Merionethshire mountains are for the most part of the primitive siliceous kind, rugged, steep, and barren; and eastward of the same line they are chiefly composed of primitive argillaceous schistus. The peaks and summits of the Berwyn range, like those of the Snowdon chain, are composed of rocks of the trap formation, which are succeeded on the north-west by slates of various kinds, extending to Snowdon: argillaceous schistus also appears on the south-east of this chain, extending into South Wales. A line of dark-coloured argillaceous limestone extends from Cader Ddinmael, near Cerrig y Druidion, on the southern border of Denbighshire, south-westward across this county, being observable successively at the tremendous ravine called Glyn-diphwys; at Llwyn y ci, near Rhiwlas; on the borders of the river Trywerin, near Llanuwchllyn; at Llanvachreth, Braich y bedw, Blaenau, Hêngwrt uchâ, Caer Ynwch, Minfordd near Tâllyllyn, and lastly at Bwlch côch, near Cader Idris. A narrow tract of similar limestone extends in a nearly parallel direction, on the opposite side of the Berwyn chain, being found at Rhiwarth, Bryn Melyn, Cwm Hyved, Bwlch y Groes, and Cwm Tyllyddian, near Llanymowddwy, all on the eastern border of the county: some of the same kind also occurs at Rhiwaedog, near Bala. At Gwerclas, near Corwen, there is a detached rock of white limestone. The porous appearance of some of the rocks on the sides of Cader Idris has led some travellers to suppose that mountain, or at least some parts of it, to be of volcanic origin; and this opinion seemed to receive strong corroboration from the appearance of a large hollow, high in the mountain, now filled with water, and forming a lake overlooked by a steep cliff, greatly resembling the crater of a volcano: it is, however, now believed that no traces of volcanic matter are to be found. The upper part of the steep cliff above mentioned forms the summit of the mountain, and consists chiefly of immense columns of highly crystalline greenstone, similar to those forming the Giant's Causeway in Ireland, rising at a considerable angle from beneath a collection of broken rocks which lie between their base and the lake. The height of these cliffs is about one thousand one hundred feet, of which at least the lower half is occupied wholly by the columns of greenstone: similar, but smaller, columns appear above, and are interstratified with slates, greatly resembling primitive clay slate, lying at right angles with the columns of greenstone. The southern flank of the mountain consists chiefly of slates lying, at almost every possible angle, in different places; while on the north of the summit, between the lake at its base and the town of Dôlgeley, is an immense range of stony mountains, extending nearly from east to west, consisting chiefly of greenstone, which is in most places columnar, but in a few slaty. The profile of these rocks, in the distance, resembles steps, the intervening hollows of which are sometimes partially filled by slates: some of the greenstone of this range encloses crystallized carbonate of lime, thus assuming the character of a porphyritic rock: in many places it is observable that the carbonate of lime has been decomposed, leaving cavities; which circumstance, together with the decomposition of the iron, forming an ingredient of the hornblende which abounds in many places, has given to the rock a cellular and rusty appearance. The peaks of the other principal summits of the Berwyn chain are similar in the general character of their geological formation to that of Cader Idris, excepting those situated eastward of Bala lake, where the hills and mountains are wholly composed of primitive schistus, that is, such as does not contain iron pyrites, or any traces of impressions of organized bodies. Shivery schistus, or shale, occurs in different parts of the county, as also do quartz, mica, and spar, in connexion with the slate strata. The Berwyn range of mountains has hitherto been found richer in lead than in copper. Ores of the former metal and of black jack are found in this county at Vigra or Buddugre, near Pont Ddû, in the parish of Llanaber; at Moel Isbri, in the parish of Llanelltyd; in the vicinity of Dôlgeley; at Bwlch y plwm, near Traeth Mawr; at Graig wen, near Dinas-mowddwy; at Melin llên y pair, in the parish of Towyn; and at Brÿndinas, near Dyfryn gwÿn, also in the vicinity of the last-mentioned place. A mine of sulphate of copper has been worked at Aberdovey, at the south-western extremity of the county; and great quantities of sulphate and some carbonate of copper at the Buddugre, or Vigra, and Clogiau mines, near Dôlgeley, which adjoin the second of the lead mines above-mentioned. These copper mines are valuable, the ores being rich, and are worked with spirit: the matrix is semi-indurated whin, intersected by veins of quartz; and as the ores are intimately blended, as it were, in the solid substance of the rock, the success of working them was originally much more uncertain than regular-sided rake veins. A gentleman, resident in Dôlgeley, learning that the ashes of the peat procured from a turbary near Dôlvrwynog, in the parish of Llanvachreth, could not be applied with advantage as a manure, suspected the cause, and by chemical tests found that they contained copper. He thereupon employed men to cut and stack the peat which produced these ashes, and constructed kilns for burning it: the ashes he shipped for Swansea, where they were made to yield excellent copper. From this circumstance it has been supposed that the surrounding mountains teem with copper-ore, which, through the medium of springs, or otherwise, had impregnated the peat of the hollows below with a solution of sulphate of copper. In the rocks in the neighbourhood of this turbary are various works for procuring copper, and vast quantities of copper-ore were procured some years ago at Benglog, in the same parish. In the Berwyn range, slates for the roofing of houses and other buildings are raised at Maen-Gwynedd, near Cader Verwyn; Dinas-mowddwy; Moel Grychan, near Aberllynvi; and Peniarth Uchâv, between Cader Idris and the sea. The quarries at Festiniog, near the north-western extremity of the county, are in a branch of the Snowdon mountains, and produce slates of an excellent quality, which are shipped at Traeth Bychan, near the spot where they are raised: these, like the Carnarvonshire slates, bear different names according to their size: the "ton stones" weigh, upon an average, two tons per thousand; and the "singles," half a ton. The great proportion of argillaceous earth in the composition of the argillaceous limestone renders it of inferior value, both as a cement and a manure, so that it is only worked on account of the absence of better materials: great quantities of the white limestone, near Corwen, are quarried and burned.

The chief manufactures are those of webs, and knit woollen stockings and socks. The former is carried on in the town of Dôlgelley, and in the surrounding country, to the distance of twelve miles, as also in the Vale of Dovey; and in these districts almost every little farmer is a manufacturer of webs, and few cottages are without a loom. These webs, called by the London drapers Welsh plains, or cottons, are a sort of thick white cloth, made in pieces of from ninety to one hundred and twenty yards long, two pieces constituting a web. The same branch of manufacture is also carried on in the western part of Montgomeryshire, and the south-eastern part of Denbighshire: but the quantity of webs produced in Dôlgelley and its neighbourhood is far greater than in either of the other districts. The Dôlgelley webs may be divided into two classes,—the coarsest, which are three-quarters of a yard wide; and the finest, seven-eighths of a yard: these, as well as those made in the district of which Machynlleth is the centre, are indiscriminately termed by the drapers strong cloth, to distinguish them from those of the Glyn district, near Oswestry, which are termed small cloth, because they are about one-eighth of a yard narrower, although of the same length. This manufacture has long prevailed in the county of Merioneth, as appears from acts of parliament passed in the 1st and 3rd of James I., and from two orders of the Privy Council of Charles I., one to the magistrates of the county of Merioneth, in the year 1635, complaining that the Welsh cottons made at that time were of inferior quality to those formerly made, a circumstance injurious to the interest of the London merchants trading to France; and the other to the Lord President of the Marches, in 1637, limiting the length of the webs, and prohibiting the use of fell and lambs' wool in their manufacture, ingredients which are now found of great value, and in time of peace are imported to Barmouth, in great quantities, from Leghorn, London, and Dover: the warp is now made of the coarse fleece wool of the country, while the woof is a mixture, containing about one-third, and sometimes one-half, of lambs' wool. Until about the commencement of the present century, the only market for these webs was held weekly, on Thursday, at Shrewsbury, where they were exposed to sale in a hall belonging to the drapers' company of that town, into which no buyers but of that particular fraternity were admitted. But since that period the manufacturers have been exempted from the effects of that monopoly, by means of professed dealers, who travel over the country and buy the produce of their looms generally at their own houses: these are frequently the agents of drapers, who grant them a percentage on their purchases. The town of Bala is the centre of the stocking manufacture, and the chief market for the sale of its produce: the boundary of the district in which it is carried on, commencing with Corwen, on the Dee, extends by Bettws into Denbighshire, where it proceeds by Ysptyty-Ivan and Llanrwst, and, including the south-eastern extremity of Carnarvonshire, passes by Penmachno to Festiniog in Merionethshire, and thence by Llanuwchllyn and Bwlch y Groes, along the northern side of the Berwyn hills to its commencement at Corwen: this line comprises a mountainous tract of about eighteen miles in length, and twelve in breadth. The stockings and socks are of all sizes and colours, and of various degrees of fineness: the number of pairs annually sold at Bala is calculated at nearly two hundred thousand, besides woollen wigs and gloves. The Merionethshire hosiery is universally recommended by medical practitioners, being, from the peculiar quality of the wool of which it is manufactured, particularly soft and warm. Besides the native manufactures, there is a woollen cloth manufactory at Dôlgelley, in which town also are dressed great quantities of native sheep and foreign lamb and kid skins, which are sold to the glovers of London, Worcester, Denbigh, and other places. Barmouth is the chief port of this county, and its harbour has received great improvement from an embankment of stone to secure its entrance, completed in 1802, at which time a new quay was also constructed. Aberdyvi, or Aberdovey, at the mouth of the river Dovey, possesses a harbour which might also be rendered very commodious, but was almost unfrequented until within the last few years, during which it has risen to an importance rivalling that of Barmouth. The principal articles of export are cattle, sheep, webs, stockings, dressed skins, ores of lead and copper, poles for the collieries of South Wales, bark, slates, and butter: the chief imports are corn, lamb and kid skins from Italy and other foreign countries, and the various kinds of ordinary shop goods.

The principal rivers are the Dee, the Maw, or Mawddach, and the Dovey, or Dyv, which are joined by numerous mountain torrents on every side, independently of various smaller streams, flowing directly to the sea: the chief of the latter are the Dwyryd and the Dysynni. The Dee has its source a short distance above Llyn Tegid, or Bala lake, which it soon enters a little below the village of Llanuwchllyn: issuing from this extensive sheet of water beneath the town of Bala, it takes a north-north-easterly direction through the beautiful Vale of Edeyrnion, and afterwards an easterly course by the town of Corwen, and through the picturesque Vales of Glyndyrvdwy and Llangollen, into the south-eastern part of Denbighshire: near the church of Llangar, a mile above Corwen, it is augmented by the Alwen, which descends along the northern border of this county from the south-western part of Denbighshire. The Maw rises in the mountains of the northern part of the county, and flows first southward and then south-westward, by the village of Llanvâchreth, to the vicinity of the village of Llanelltyd, where it is joined from the east by the Wonion: the latter stream, which is about equal in magnitude to the Maw, rises near the source of the Dee, at a place called Drws y nant, and winds through a narrow valley, in a less turbulent stream than is usual with rivers having a mountainous origin, passing by the town of Dôlgelley, about a mile below which it joins the Maw, the united streams then expanding into a fine æstuary, stretching south-westward until within a short distance of the sea, when it turns westward to Cardigan bay, forming at its mouth the harbour of Abermaw, or, as it is called by the English, Barmouth: this river is navigable to within two miles of Dôlgeley. The Dovey rises at the foot of Aran Mowddwy, and flows southward through the rich vale to which it gives name, passing by the small town of Dinasmowddwy, a little below which, on entering the western part of Montgomeryshire, it changes its direction to south-west: near the town of Machynlleth the Dovey becomes the southern boundary of Merionethshire, and discharges its waters into the sea through a broad æstuary at Aberdovey. The Dwyryd has its source in the mountains on the northern confines of the county, and, gradually losing its character of a mountain torrent, as it emerges into a more level district, flows in beautiful meanders through the celebrated Vale of Festiniog, and, passing beneath the rich groves of Tan y Bwlch Hall, falls into the æstuary of Traeth Bâch, which opens into Cardigan bay, at the mouth of the inlet called Traeth Mawr: the latter, extending inland northward, forms for some distance the boundary between this county and that of Carnarvon, and receives, at its head, the torrent of the Glâslyn, up which the line of separation is further continued. The Dysynni descends in a very irregular course south-westward from the foot of Cader Idris and the lake of Talyllyn, and flows into the sea through a small æstuary, a little to the north of Towyn. The roads of Merionethshire, notwithstanding its vast extent of mountain wastes, have shared in the gradual improvement displayed in those of most other parts of the island during the last fifty years. Formerly, almost every valley or dale had its road winding along the bottom of it, which at its highest extremity ascended the mountains almost like a flight of steps; but the modern roads commence the ascent at the lower end of the vale, and attain the summit by a gradual rise along the sides of the hills that enclose it: some of the mountain passes yet, however, present great difficulties to the traveller. An abundance of hard siliceous stone is obtained from the mountain ranges, forming excellent materials for making and repairing the roads, the travelling on which is now as easy as the extreme hilly nature of the county will admit. The mail-coach road from London to Holyhead, by Birmingham and Shrewsbury, enters the north-eastern part of the county from Llangollen, in Denbighshire, passes through Corwen, and soon after quits it again for the south-western part of Denbighshire. The road from London to Montgomery, Welshpool, Harlech, and Carnarvon, by way of Worcester, or by Shrewsbury, enters from Llanvair, in Montgomeryshire, and passes through Dinasmowddwy and Dôlgeley, and by Trawsvynydd, Tan y bwlch, and Pont Aber Glâslyn, into Carnarvonshire: a branch from this, at Welshpool, reaches Bala by way of Llan-vyllin. Two roads branch from the Holyhead road, at Corwen and Dwyryd, or Druid, respectively, to Bala, whence the line of communication thus formed is continued to Dôlgeley. From the latter town an important line of road extends through Barmouth and Harlech, and across the Traeth Bâch sands, to Trêmadoc in Carnarvonshire.

The relics of antiquity are numerous and interesting, more particularly those of remoter ages. On the small plain near Cors y Gedol, in which are situated the small lakes of Llŷn Bodlyn, Llŷn Cwm Howel, and Llŷn Irdin, are numerous Druidical remains, forming a rare group of this class of antiquities, and comprising two circles formed of loose stones, one of which is about fifty-six feet in diameter, and the other of smaller dimensions. Half a mile southward from these, on the side of a hill, are two carneddau, or monumental heaps of stones, of extraordinary size; and to the eastward is a large cromlech, formed by two incumbent stones, one placed over the edge of the other, resting upon five erect stones somewhat inclined. Near this is another carnedd, upon which are two large cromlechs, the tabular stone of one of which is twelve feet long and nine broad. Four stone columns, from ten feet to twelve feet eight inches high, are situated in the vicinity of these cromlechs; three of them have fallen, but one yet retains its erect position: several kistvaens, or stone chests, lie scattered around. Near the fifth milestone, on the road from Harlech to Barmouth, are two cromlechs, near each other, singularly situated on carneddau of loose stones. The vicinity of Harlech abounds with monumental remains, more particularly such as are supposed to have been connected with the Druidical superstitions: on the steep ascent of an almost precipitous hill, and on its summit, are several circles, formed of loose stones, some of which are single, others concentric, while others again intersect each other: most of them, like those of Cors y Gedol, comprise also upright stones, one of which is in most cases situated in the centre. Craig y Ddinas, a conical hill, situated near the group of Druidical ruins first described, has its summit surrounded by a vast collection of rough stones, forming rude ramparts for the defence of the small plain which it encloses: this is generally considered to have been an ancient British fortified post, of a period as early as the Roman invasion; and on another elevated site, at a little distance, is Castell Dinas Corddin, an intrenched camp with an advanced work, supposed to be of equally remote antiquity. On the summit of a lofty rocky eminence, overlooking Nannau, the seat of Sir Robert Williams Vaughan, Bart., near Dôlgeley, there is also a very ancient British post, defended by a rampart of loose stones, called Moel Ofrwm, "the Hill of Sacrifice." Traces of Roman occupation are very numerous, of which the following are the most remarkable: near Pennal, on the banks of the Dovey, in the vicinity of Machynlleth, is a place called Cevn Caer, "the Ridge of the City," where Roman coins have been frequently found, and where there are yet extensive remains of a large and strong Roman fortification. In the vicinity of Rhiw Gôch, in the parish of Trawsvynydd, are the remains of a small fort, very singularly situated on a circular isolated rock, supposed to have been a Roman station, from the regularity of the facing stones of the remaining walls, and from the circumstance of the discovery of numerous coins and urns: its name, Castell Prysyr, signifies "a castle built in haste," which may account for the buildings being destitute of cement. In the adjacent enclosed country, in the parish of Maentwrog, there is a large Roman encampment, commanding a number of passes. At the south-eastern end of the town of Bala is a large artificial mount, called Tommen y Bala, supposed to be of Roman formation, and afterwards the site of a British fortress; and in the vicinity of Llanuwchyllŷn are the remains of a Roman fort called Caer Gai, where various coins of that people have been discovered. Many other Roman coins have been found near Llanbedr, and at Dôlgelley and Harlech, at which latter place has also been found a golden torques: another of these rich and elegant ornaments has also been found on the mountain of Cader Idris. The Via Occidentalis, now called Sarn Helen (supposed to be a corruption of Sarn Leon, or Sarn y Lheng, the legionary way), entering from Cardiganshire, might formerly be traced on the banks of the Dovey, near Pennal, where it communicated with the station there situated: it may yet be traced between Dôlgelley and Trawsvynydd, at Pen y stryd, or "the head of the street," though now covered with turf, and only perceptible in consequence of its elevation above the ground on each side: near it are numerous tumuli. Beyond the station Heriri Mons, at Tommen y Mûr, it must have entered the county of Carnarvon between Pont-Aberglâslyn and Bethgelart. The branch of the southern Watling-street, already mentioned, entered this county from the vicinity of Llangynog, and passed by Trûm y Sarn to the Roman station at Caer Gai, near Bala, beyond which it is plainly visible, and is called Sarn hîr, or "the Long Causeway:" crossing the mountains by the pass called Bwlch y Buarth, it proceeds to Tommen y Mûr. On a mountain called Migneint, near Rhÿd ar Helen, within a quarter of a mile of the Sarn Helen, are some remarkable monuments, called Beddau Gwyr Ardudwy, "the Graves of the Men of Ardudwy," in which ancient division of the country they are situated: these graves are at least thirty in number, and local tradition states them to be sepulchral monuments of some persons of note, slain here in a battle fought between the men of Dyfryn Ardudwy and some of Denbighshire. In the vicinity of these graves are several circles of stones, the largest of which is about fifty-two feet in diameter, as also a large carnedd, with two upright stones, the whole of which appear to have been surrounded by one very large circle. In a field also near the course of the Sarn Helen, in the vicinity of Trawsvynydd, is a large rude upright stone, called Llêch Idris; and near it is a stone bearing a Latin inscription, called Bedd Porws, or "Porus' Grave." Near the village of Llanbedr are two rude upright stones, of the kind called by the Welsh meini gwyr, or "the stones of heroes." Near Corwen is a British fortified post of more modern date than those above mentioned, called Caer Drewyn; and the site of the encampment occupied by the Welsh forces, at the period of the invasion of the principality by Henry II., may yet be traced by a rampart of earth, situated between the church of Corwen and the village of Cynwyd. The remains of the buildings of the Cistercian abbey of Cymmer, in the parish of Llanelltyd, the only religious house in this county at the time of the Reformation, form a picturesque ruin, known to the Welsh under the name of Mynachlog y Vaner, and frequently called Vaner Abbey. There are yet striking remains of the castle of Harlech; and at a place called Sychnant, about three miles from Corwen, are some remains of a mansion which belonged to the celebrated Welsh hero, Owain Glyndwr. The principal seats are, Arthog, near Dôlgelley, that of R. Fowden, Esq.; Brÿn y Gwîn, near Dôlgelley, that of Hugh Reveley, Esq.; Caerynwch, also near Dôlgelley, that of R. Richards, Esq.; Cors y Gedol, between Barmouth and Harlech, that of E. Mostyn Lloyd Mostyn, Esq.; Dôlgûn, near Dôlgelley, that of T. H. Lewis, Esq.; Garthyngarad, near Dôlgelley, that of E. Owen, Esq.; Glân y Llŷn, belonging to Sir W. W. Wynn, Bart.; Glânwilliam, near Maentwrog, the seat of W. Oakeley, Esq.; Hèngwrt, near Dôlgelley, that of G. H. Vaughan, Esq.; Llwyn, near Dôlgelley, that of T. Hartley, Esq.; Nannau, near Dôlgelley, that of Sir Robert Williams Vaughan, Bart.; Palê, near Bala, that of the Rev. Mr. Lloyd; Peniarth, that of W. Wynne, Esq.; Penmaen Dovey, near Towyn, that of J. Vaughan, Esq.; Rhagatt, near Corwen, that of E. Lloyd, Esq.; Rhiwlas, that of Richard W. Price, Esq.; Rûg, near Corwen, that of G. H. Vaughan, Esq.; Tâlgarth, that of C. T. Thurston, Esq.; Tân y bwlch Hall, that of W. Gryffydd Oakeley, Esq.; Vronheulog, that of John Davies, Esq.; and Ynysmaengwÿn, that of Athelstan Corbet, Esq. The better class of houses are frequently built of blasted stone and schistus, much of the latter of which will bear to be regularly squared. A few modern farm-yards are well planned and of good construction; but the rest are of a very mean description. In the vicinity of the schistose hills and mountains the fences are commonly walls of loose stones, built without mortar. Servants hired by the year usually commence their term of service on the 12th of May. The common bread of the inhabitants is oatmeal cake: this is made by mixing oatmeal with a due proportion of lukewarm water, rolling out the dough into thin round cakes, and baking them upon iron plates suspended over the fire, commonly called bake-stones: rye bread, and bread made from muncorn, or rye and wheat blended, are also in ordinary consumption. Some of the most remarkable of the numerous waterfalls are, Rhaiadr Dôlmyelnyllŷn, about five miles from Dôlgelley; Pistyll Cain, or "the Fall of the Cayne," about two miles further distant from the same place; and Pistyll Mawddach, or "the Fall of the Mawddach," in the vicinity of the latter. In the channel of the Cynvel, a tributary of the Dwryd, rises a singular columnar rock, called Pulpit Hugh Llwyd Cynvel, or "Hugh Lloyd of Cynvel's Pulpit."

MERTHYR, a parish in the lower division of the hundred of ELVET, county of CARMARTHEN, SOUTH WALES, 4 miles (W.) from Carmarthen, containing 246 inhabitants. This parish, which is situated in the south-western portion of the county, is intersected on the west by the river Cywin, which falls into the Tâf at Llanvihangel Abercowin; and on the south by the turnpike road leading from Carmarthen to St. Clear's. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry of Carmarthen, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £4. 17. 1., and in the patronage of the King, as Prince of Wales. The church, dedicated to St. Martin, is a small plain building, undistinguished by any architectural details. There are places of worship for Presbyterians and a class of dissenters who assume no particular denomination. Some remains of an ancient monument, supposed to be of Druidical origin, are discernible; and within the parish is a farm, once the residence or the property of George Lloyd, a Welsh judge, called Derllŷs, which is supposed to have given

MERTHYR-CYNOG, a parish, comprising the hamlets of Upper Dyfryn Honddû, Lower Dyfryn Honddû, Yscir-Vawr, and Yscir-Vechan, each of which is separately assessed for the maintenance of its poor, in the hundred of MERTHYR-CYNOG, county of BRECKNOCK, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (N. N. W.) from Brecknock, containing 833 inhabitants. The name, signifying "Cynog the Martyr," is derived from the erection of a church to the honour of Cynog, son of Brychan Brycheiniog, who is said to have been murdered on a mountain called the Van, in this parish, towards the close of the fifth century, and to have been canonized after his death. The parish is situated principally between the rivers Yscir and Honddû, by the former of which it is intersected on the west, and by the latter on the east, and is traversed on the same side by the turnpike road leading from Brecknock to Builth. The surface is chiefly mountainous, though occasionally alternated with valleys and low grounds, comprising a portion of arable lands, and, towards the sides of the rivers, some rich meadows, affording excellent pasturage. The prevailing scenery is strikingly varied, and in many parts beautifully picturesque: the winding vale of the Honddû abounds with features of pleasing character, and with objects of romantic appearance. Near the chapel of Llanvihangel Vechan the Vanolen is prominently conspicuous, rising almost precipitously in the vale to a very considerable height, and crowned near its summit with a cottage of pleasingly picturesque appearance; on the left is a beautiful knoll, luxuriantly wooded, towards the summit of which, on the right, is a projecting rock, from the fissures of which grows a yew tree, adding a romantic character to the landscape. Beyond the rich woods near Castle Madoc, the remainder of the vale is chiefly arable, but is agreeably softened by a few verdant meadows near the margin of the river. At the extremity of the dell called Cwm llogyn commences a range of mountains, which constitute more than one-half of the parish, extending on one side to the boundary of the hundred of Talgarth, and on the north to the hundred of Builth. Along this whole tract there is scarcely a house, except at the head of the river Honddû, where are a few small cottages, called "Pentre Blaen-Dôl-Honddû. The right of common forms a very important object to the occupiers of small farms on the hills, who, raising little more corn than what is sufficient for the supply of their families, depend greatly on the rearing of their flocks. The village is situated in a cheerless mountain dell, accessible only by a dreary road along a high ridge between deep dingles, watered by two branches of the river Yscir, over which there is a neat bridge of one arch, called Pontvaen.

The living is a discharged vicarage, in the archdeaconry of Brecknock, and diocese of St. David's, rated in the king's books at £7. 10. 5., endowed with £400 royal bounty, and £800 parliamentary grant, and in the alternate patronage of Marquis Camden and John Lloyd Vaughan Watkins, Esq. The tithes and advowson were given by Milo Fitz-Walter, Earl of Gloucester, to the priory of Malvern, after the dissolution of which establishment they devolved to the crown, and were sold in the reign of James I. In 1646, they were the property of Sir Francis Fane, a zealous loyalist, and were, on that account, perhaps, sequestered by the parliament, who ordered an annual payment to be made out of the rectorial tithes of £50 to the vicar of Merthyr-Cynog; £40 to the officiating minister of Llanvihangel-Nant-Brân; £40 to the minister of Llandilo-Vawr; and £10 to the minister of Dyfryn Honddû chapel; all which places were then comprehended within, or considered to be dependent upon, this parish: at the Restoration this property reverted to the rightful owner, and the grants made by the parliament became void. Of the several places above named, the chapel of Dyfryn Honddû alone remains within the limits of the parish. The church, dedicated to St. Cynog, is a neat ancient structure with a square tower at the west end: the churchyard is surrounded with stately trees, of which only two or three are yews. There are places of worship for Independents and Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. Edward Gwyn, of Pant y Cored, in 1760, charged a tenement called Dôlwydd with the annual payment of £2 to the poor, to be distributed on the 20th of December. On the bank of the Honddû is a small farm, called Mynachtŷ, which name is derived from its having been the residence of the monks of Malvern, for the purpose of superintending their possessions in this parish, and of transacting the business relating to them: at the east end of the building is a stone, about five feet long, marked with a rude cross, the head of which is inscribed within a circle; and in the porch is another of the same size and character, having the head of the cross within a square: they are both considered as relics of the fifth or sixth century. A hill in this parish, called Alltarnog, bears distinct marks of a British encampment, of elliptical form and about two hundred yards in circuit, originally defended on the north by three ramparts, and on the south inaccessible from its precipitous declivity: it is supposed to have been occupied by the descendants of Maenarch, prior to the erection of their mansion in the Vale of Honddû. The poor are maintained by an average annual expenditure amounting to £451. 10.

MERTHYR-DOVAN (MERTHYR-DYVAN), a parish in the hundred of DINAS-POWIS, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 8 miles (S. W.) from Cardiff, containing, with Highlight, 130 inhabitants. This small parish, bordering on the Bristol channel, is in general hilly, and the inhabitants are exclusively employed in agriculture. The living is a discharged rectory, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, rated in the king's books at £4. 17. 3½., endowed with £200 royal bounty, and in the patronage of R. F. Jenner, Esq. The church, dedicated to St. Dovanus, is situated in a valley watered by a small stream which passes near Cadoxton, and falls into the Bristol channel at Barry Island. Highlight is an extra-parochial district, the property of C. K. K. Tynte, Esq., for ecclesiastical purposes attached to this parish, the inhabitants attending divine service here. The late Mr. Richards, of Barry, left £40, and the late Rev. Mr. Powel, £50, directing the interest to be given weekly to the poor in bread. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £84. 1.

MERTHYR-MAWR, a parish in the hundred of OGMORE, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 1½

mile (W. S. W.) from Bridgend, containing 147 inhabitants. It is situated on the right bank of the Ogmore, near its mouth, forming the only portion of the hundred lying on that side of the river, and a little south of the turnpike road between Cardiff and Swansea. A part of the parish to the south is occupied by low barren sand hills, but it probably takes its name from a lofty and extensive elevation composing the greater part of it, and at the eastern foot of which, near the bank of the river, stands its small and pleasant village, with the church. This manor, together with the castle and lordship of Talavan, was given by Robert Fitz-Hamon, on dividing the ancient kingdom of Glamorgan among the Norman knights and others who assisted him in its subjugation, to Sir Richard Syward. Leland says, "Martyr Maur, a fair Manor Place of Stone, stondith on this West Ripe, a mile above Ogor mouth:" in his time it belonged to the Stradlings. Near the church is an elegant modern mansion, surrounded by a thriving plantation, the seat of the late Sir John Nicholl, Knt., Dean of the Arches, by whom it was erected. The living is a perpetual curacy, in the archdeaconry and diocese of Llandaf, endowed with £200 private benefaction, and £800 royal bounty, and in the patronage of the Archdeacon of Llandaf. The church is dedicated to St. Teilaw. The river Ogmore discharges itself into the Bristol channel on the southern side of this parish: on its eastern bank are the remains of Ogmore castle, an account of which is inserted in the article on Ewenny. Slight vestiges of an old chapel, commonly called Cappel St. Roque, are discernible. The average annual expenditure for the support of the poor is £94. 3.

MERTHYR-TYDVIL (MERTHYR-TUDFYL), a market town, parish, and newly created borough, in the upper division of the hundred of CAERPHILLY, county of GLAMORGAN, SOUTH WALES, 24 miles (N. N. W.) from Cardiff, and 175 (W. by N.) from London, containing, according to the last census, 22,083 inhabitants. This place derives its name from Tydvil, or Tudvyl, daughter of Brychan, Prince of Brycheiniog in the fifth century. Brychan, having towards the close of his life retired with part of his family into this neighbourhood, was attacked by a party of Saxons and Irish Picts, who put him to death, together with his son Rhûn Dremrudd, and his daughter Tydvil. A church was soon afterwards erected near the scene of slaughter, in honour of the murdered Tydvil, and received the appellation of Merthyr Tydvil, or "Tydvil the Martyr." Concerning the earlier history of this place, now so important for the richness of its mineral produce and the vast extent of its manufactures, very few events of general interest are recorded. It continued till the middle of the last century an obscure village, noticed only in the Welsh annals as containing within its limits a border fortress called Morlais castle, erected by Gilbert Lord of Glamorgan, for the protection of his estates in this part of the principality against the attacks of the tenantry of the adjacent territories of the lord of Brecknock, by whom they were frequently invaded. The uncertain and ill-defined limits of these contiguous lordships generated perpetual feuds between their respective owners; and the erection of the castle added materially to the acrimony with which the hostilities were conducted. In the reign of Henry I., the castle
